NEWS AND COMMENTS.

THE Full Bench of five Judges have answered the reference in Empress vs. Nilmadhub Mitter in the negative. The question reserved was in these terms—

“whether, having regard to the facts stated by Baboo Kally Nath Mitter, and to the terms of the confession itself, that confession was rendered inadmissible in point of law, by reason of certain of the answers of the prisoner having been given in Bengali but recorded in English.”

It was argued for two days by Mr. Woodroffe on the part of the prisoner and the Advocate-General and the Standing Council on behalf of the Crown, and the Judges discussed it among themselves for another two days and delivered on Thursday their unanimous opinion thus:—

“The only fact which it is necessary to mention beyond that stated by the learned Judge is that the document, the admissibility of which is in question, was put in on Monday as being a document made under the provisions of Section 164, Criminal Procedure Code, and admissible in evidence without proof under the provisions of section 80 of the Evidence Act, and that Baboo Kally Nath Mitter was not called until the following Friday. Several questions have been raised and argued before us as being necessary to the decision of the general question whether the document upon the facts proved at the trial was properly admitted as evidence against the prisoner. They were: first, Does section 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code apply to a statement made by a person in custody to a Magistrate in Calcutta in the course of an investigation made by the police in the town of Calcutta under the circumstances of a criminal committal in Calcutta? Secondly, if it does not, was the document in question properly admitted upon the evidence of Baboo Kally Nath Mitter under the provisions of sections 21 and 26 of the Evidence Act? Thirdly, if section 164 does apply to this case, was the statement of the prisoner recorded in accordance with the provisions of that section coupled with section 364? And fourthly, if it was not so recorded, is the defect cured by section 533 of the same Act? The first question depends on the construction to be placed on section 1 of the Criminal Procedure Code. That section, so far as it is material to the present question, is as follows: ‘In the absence of any specific provision to the contrary, nothing herein contained shall affect the police in the town of Calcutta.’ Section 104 deals with statements made to a Magistrate in the course of an investigation under Chapter XIV of the Act, and the point for consideration is whether the investigation in the course of which the statement in question was made, was an investigation under that Chapter.

The investigation was by the Calcutta Police in the town of Calcutta, and unless there is some specific provision making section 1 applicable to the police in Calcutta, the section does not apply, as the statement was not made in the course of an investigation under the chapter. The chapter is headed ‘Information to the police and their power to investigate.’ It is clear that many sections of the chapter cannot refer to Calcutta, and the only section which must apply to the police in Calcutta is section 155, but we do not think that section is sufficient to amount to a provision that the whole chapter is to apply to the police in Calcutta, or to give them any power to make investigations under it, and it follows that the present case is not in any way affected by section 164 of the Code, and as a necessary consequence by section 364 or section 533. The second question then arises, whether the document in question was properly admitted under the provisions of the Evidence Act. Baboo Kally Nath Mitter was called, and he stated that he questioned the prisoner in English, that the prisoner understands and speaks English, and sometimes answered him in English, sometimes in Bengali; that when the answers were in English he wrote them down, when in Bengali he wrote them in English, and read over what he had written to the prisoner, that the whole document contains the prisoner’s deposition, and the prisoner signed it in his presence. If the contents of the document did not amount to a confession, the document itself would be relevant as an admission under section 21 of the Evidence Act, and though it is a confession, it is relevant and may be proved, unless it is excluded by section 26 of that Act. That section is as follows: ‘No confession made by any person whilst in the custody of a police officer, unless it be in the immediate presence of a Magistrate, shall be proved as against such person.’ At the time when the prisoner made the statement he was in the custody of the police, but it was made to and in the immediate presence of Baboo Kally Nath Mitter, who has stated what is undoubtedly the fact, that he is a Magistrate for Calcutta, and consequently it is obvious that the confession is not excluded by section 26, and thus being so, and it being proved that the whole of the statements contained in the document were either the actual words spoken by the prisoner, or were accepted by him as representing the true meaning of the whole he had said, and as the whole document is signed by him with his own hand, the whole of the admissions contained in the document were strictly proved to have been made by him, and were admissible against him under the Indian Evidence Act. In this view of the case, the 3rd and 4th questions become immaterial in the present case, but we wish to guard ourselves from being supposed to hold that when answers are made by an accused person in one language and written down in another, unless it is shown that it was impracticable to write them in the language in which they were spoken, section 164 would be complied with; on the contrary, we think that when such a proceeding is adopted, the statement of the accused would not be recorded under that section read with section 364, and we have very great doubts whether the defect could be cured under the provisions of section 533. The question as to whether or not section 164 has force in Calcutta was not raised at the trial. The document was put in by the prosecution, and admitted in accordance with the practice which has been followed since the passing of the Criminal Procedure Code of 1882, at the Sessions held in Calcutta. In this Court the point has for the first time been raised, and argued by the Crown. On the whole, for the reasons given in our answers to the first and 2nd questions, we think that the confession was in the present case admissible in point of law, and we answer the question reserved by the learned Judge in the negative.”

The prisoner was sentenced yesterday—not capitally but to transportation for life. Mr. Woodroffe applied for permission to appeal to the Privy Council, Mr. Justice Wilson took time to consider the order.

THE proposed municipal law for new Calcutta has attracted the attention of Parliament. In the House of Commons, on Monday evening, the 14th May, Mr. Arthur J. Williams, M.P. for South Glamorgan, asked the following question, of the Under-Secretary of State for India:—

“1. Whether it is the fact that the new Calcutta Municipality Bill, now before the Bengal Legislative Council, contains novel features unknown to like legislation in the United Kingdom; for example:—

a. Giving the power of voting under the Municipal franchise to the Calcutta Chamber of Commerce and the Calcutta Trades Association, the members of which bodies already possess the right of voting in their private capacity as citizens and b. Multiplicity of votes, it being alleged that voting, according to property qualification and by the cumulative system, obtains in English Municipal franchise procedure.

2. Whether it is the fact that the proposed measure is unpopular with a large majority of the inhabitants of Calcutta, owing, partly, to the inclusion, on arbitrary grounds, of certain suburban places within the future Municipal limits of Calcutta, although such places are already included in a Local Municipality; and

3. Whether the Secretary of State will instruct the Viceroy in Council not to sanction the Bill until the inhabitants of Calcutta have had an opportunity, by deputation or otherwise (advantage to be taken of such opportunity before the close of the present session) of expressing to the Secretary of State their objections to the measure as at present framed.”

Sir John Gorst replied:—

“The Calcutta Municipality Bill, which contains provisions of the kind referred to by the Hon’ble Member, has been for two years under discussion in the Bengal Legislative Council; and the inhabitants of Calcutta have had ample opportunities of expressing their objections to the measure, and making representations to the Secretary of State if they thought fit to do so. No such representations have been made, and the Secretary of State has no reason for interfering with the discretion which the Governor-General possesses, under the Indian Councils Act, of assenting to, or withholding his assent from, the Bill after it has passed the Bengal Legislative Council."

THE Sanitary Commissioner of Madras reported against wet cultivation within municipal limits as dangerous to health. He says that it not only gives a great surface for evaporation but sends up into the air organic matter which is hurtful to public health. Dr. Laing, therefore, proposed to Government to limit the cultivation within a specified distance of towns and villages. Lord Connemara is not prepared to order a new law, but has referred the Doctor to Sec. 228 of Madras Act IV of 1884 which authorizes Municipal Councils to take action in the direction proposed. The new Calcutta municipal bill just passed in the local legislature, by sanctioning extension of area, invites danger they are attempting to avoid in Madras.

IN exercise of the prerogative of mercy and on advice of the sentencing Judge, the Lieutenant-Governor has favorably considered the representation on behalf of Meher Ali, convicted and sentenced to death for murder of his son-in-law Sheik Hurree. He is not to be hanged but to be transported for the term of his natural life.

POOR as he was and earning his daily bread, Hurree has left his wife Meher Jan and two young children wholly unprovided for. The Deputy Commissioner took compassion on them and raised a fund of Rs. 230 among Europeans, and he proposes to pay Rs. 8 a month to the poor bereaved family.

THE next Sessions of the Calcutta High Court is announced for Monday, the 2nd July next.

SIR CHRISTOPHER RAWLINSON, formerly Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Madras, died in London on March 29, in the eighty second year of his age. Educated at the Charterhouse and at Trinity College, Cambridge, he took his Bachelor's degree in 1828 and proceeded M. A. in 1831, and was the same year called to the Bar at the Middle Temple. Appointed Recorder of Portsmouth in 1840, he left that post in 1847, for a judicial appointment in Singapore. After three years in the Straits Settlements, he came in 1850 to Madras as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. In 1859 he retired on a pension. He was a judge of the good old type—alive to every movement touching the good of the community, social, kind to the natives, and thoroughly impartial.

MR. R. LEYCESTER Upton, Solicitor to the Government of India, is charged with the duty of Agent to the Governor-General in Council for the affairs of the late King of Oudh and for the purposes of Act XIX of 1887, from the afternoon of the 15th May 1888.

MR. C. C. STEVENS, Commissioner of the Chota Nagpore Division, goes on 3 months' leave, Mr. Magistrate J. A. Hopkins from Nuddea, as different a man as possible, acting for him in the meantime. Nuddea is, however, relieved for a quarter of its incubus.

THE Burdwan Raj estate Killah Kujung, in the district of Cuttack, is to be surveyed. It has an area of 229,008 acres 3 roods and 8 poles. The order is issued by the Lieutenant-Governor under sec. 3 of Act V of 1875, and extends to the demarcation of the boundaries of tenures, mouzas and fields. The work is entrusted to the Collector of Cuttack, as Superintendent of Survey, and to Mr. R. B. Smart, Revenue Surveyor, Mr. H. M. Reilly, a Manager of the Burdwan Raj, and Baboo Harish Chandra Sarkar, the local manager, as Assistant Superintendents of Survey.

CHOLERA having abated in the Raniganj Sub-Division, the prohibition has been withdrawn against the emigration through that Sub-Division to the labor districts.

THE leading London dailies and British journalists generally, whether of the metropolis or the country, have subscribed for a mural tablet to be placed in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral, to the memory of the seven journalists who were sacrificed in the Soudan in the campaigns of 1883, 1884 and 1885. It is now ready and may be seen at the Graphic office before exhibition to the public, being a brass tablet 6ft. 6in. high by 3ft. 9in. wide, mounted on a red marble slab, inscribed with the names of Edmond O'Donovan, Daily News, Frank Vizetelly, artist, Frank Power, Times, John Alexander Cameron, Standard, Leger Algernon Herbert, C. M. G., Morning Post, William Henry Gordon, Manchester Guardian, and Frank J. L. Boberts, Reuter's Agency.

ASSISTANT Surveyor Yusuf Sharif, and two daffadars belonging to the Quarter Master General's Department, Intelligence Branch, who were with Major Yate's delimitation party, and remained behind at Herat in February last, have just reached Quetta, having completed a survey of the Taunani and Zamindawar districts on their way back to India.

WHAT an evidence is afforded by the following of the loneliness of the bustling, busy, crowded life, of the day in England!

"A gentleman advertises in the Times for a chum who will exchange stories and help to pass time cheerfully. The chum is to be up to long walks, must have leisure, and a purse sufficient to meet the moderate expenses involved in the pursuit of cheerfulness."

This is not the first instance of appeal to the press in personal difficulties of the kind. No wonder, the British cannot do without his newspaper.

THERE is reason to anticipate that the display of determination by the Kashmir Darbar, and the advance of reinforcements to Gilgit, will lead to the collapse of the Hunza and Nagar rising without further bloodshed. The Raja of Nagar has sent a messenger to Bakhshi Mulraj, the Kashmir commandant at Gilgit, offering to apologize for his recent misconduct. The Darbar will probably take this opportunity of settling what might have been a troublesome affair.

THE Government of India has passed orders for transferring the Bangalore Fort to the Mysore Durbar. When the rendition of Mysore took place, the fort contained an arsenal, and was occupied by British troops, it was in consequence retained, like the Civil and Military Station, within the limits over which British officers exercise jurisdiction. But the Ordnance stores have been removed to Agram, and all troops have been withdrawn; consequently the Government of India no longer requires the fort; and as, by its situation, it can be more conveniently supervised by the authorities of the Town of Bangalore than those in the Civil and Military Station, it was decided, after discussing the question thoroughly, to hand it over to the Maharaja. Opportunity has been taken at the same time to effect another rectification of the boundary of the Station, by bringing within it the Residency house and grounds. They have all along been occupied by the Resident, and it is not known what was Sir James Gordon's reason for drawing the boundary of the Civil and Military Station outside the Residency park. No practical inconvenience has, it is believed, been experienced; but it is obviously the proper arrangement that the same officers who, under the Resident, have jurisdiction in the Station, should also be able to exercise it in the Residency.

IN an able leading article distinguished by commendable sobriety of feeling, the Rust Gostar offers to explain Dewan Raghunath Rao's extraordinary statement at the Madras railway platform which has been telegraphed to his discredit to all parts of India. The gist of the statement is this:—

"The Maharaja being of a distrusting nature easily swallowed every thing that they [mischief-mongers] represented against the Minister, and at last an idea was put into his head that, unless and until the Dewan Bahadur publicly contradicted all those writings then appearing in the Pioneer on the Indore affairs, he should be considered as their author. The Maharaja's suspicion was roused by the Dewan Bahadur's flatly refusing to accede to his wishes. After that, a complete estrangement took place between them which culminated in the Minister's tendering his resignation. It was, however, not accepted by the Maharaja who sent his officials to induce the old man to stay. He was persuaded to withdraw his resignation, and the wheel of administration rolled on quietly for some time longer. But the intriguers did not desist, and at last scored their triumph over the Minister. He then found himself in a very delicate position and was constrained to resign again. At this time, unfortunately, his health failed him and a severe attack of fever brought on by excessive hard work enfeebled him to a very great extent. His medical advisers insisted upon his taking complete rest, and rest being out of the question as long as he remained at Indore, he sent in a letter in continuation of his resignation, requesting the Maharaja to relieve him of his onerous duties within a certain time he had named therein. A reply came to the effect that His Highness would neither accept his resignation nor permit him to leave Indore, but would leave it to him to do what he thought best. The day fixed for his departure having arrived, he left Indore after seeing Her Highness the Dowager Maharanee in the absence of the Maharaja who had gone a-shikaring. This accounts for the expression he employed at Madras which was telegraphed to the Bombay papers, namely that he had neither resigned, nor been discharged nor permitted to leave Indore—an expression which was harshly criticised by some of our Bengalee contemporaries."

If that is all, we are sorry for our harshness. But it was brought on by the Dewan by his own glib tongue. His own flippant language painted him a truant old boy—runaway from his master without leave.

WITH respect to the appointment of a successor, our contemporary says:—

"A Cabinet Council was held at the Lal Baug, presided over by H. H. the Maharaja, to make a selection out of the following five names that were submitted to him:—Rao Bahadur Ranji Vithal, of Gwalior; Mr. Dhondo Shamrao Gurud, of Bombay; Khan Bahadur Kazi Shahbuddin; Rao Bahadur V. J. Kirtane; and Mr. Justice Dhurandhar, of Indore. The deliberations of the Council were opened by His Highness imposing certain conditions upon the appointment, some of which were that the Minister should not ask for powers; that he should not interfere with what His Highness did or thought; that he should obey His Highness's orders, &c., &c. The conditions were accepted, it is said, by two or three of the nominees, with the result that the Minister's portfolio was handed over to Rao Bahadur Kirtane on six months' probation."

SRINAGAR 4th—Cholera has again slightly decreased here. 376 fresh cases and 187 deaths have been reported in the city, during the last 3 days. The deaths are principally amongst the old cases. In the valley also the disease is somewhat declining.

THE chief of the Bombay Police—Sir Frank H. Souter, Kt., C. S. I., C. I. E.,—died at Ootacamund of heart disease. At the funeral, the Governor of Madras acted the chief mourner. The Commander-in-Chief, Sir Charles Sargent, the personal staffs of the Governor and Commander-in-Chief, the Army Headquarters' Staff, the Members of Council, the Secretaries to Government, the Heads of Departments, the Inspector-General of Police, including lesser lights brought up the rear of the procession. If earthly honors can soothe the dead, Sir Frank's eternal rest ought to be peaceful. Places of birth and death are important factors in some men's lives. Sir Frank Souter dies more honored than if he had taken his last farewell in his own field of glory. His choice of locality for exit, if it was matter of choice on purpose, was a decided hit. Perhaps some portion of the post mortem eclat was due to the handle he had secured to his name.

A GREAT sensation has naturally been caused by the accounts, which have appeared in the press, of a lamentable disturbance which was caused at a wedding party in the Parsee temple in town. The Statesman comes out with what appears to be the true facts:—

"A fracas of a very unpleasant nature occurred, we are sorry to learn, at the Parsee Fire Temple on Monday evening last, during or immediately after the performance of a marriage ceremony thereat. It is the custom of this small but much respected section of the Calcutta community, to issue invitations on such occasions to every member of the community, without respect to their position in what is called society. The custom is so pleasing in itself, that it wants neither defence nor apology, and on Monday afternoon last, the whole Parsee community of less perhaps than 100 persons, were present in the Temple to offer congratulations to the bride and bridegroom on their union, and make public prayers for their prosperity and happiness. Small as the society is, there are not wanting in it however, those heart-burnings and private enmities that are found everywhere; while their existence was shewn in a very painful manner on this occasion, when the service being over the families were dispersing from the Temple which they owe to the liberality and kindness of the late Rustonjee Manockjee, now represented amongst us by our venerable old friend Manockjee Rustonjee his son. Some jealousy we fear has been excited in the community by the appointment of Mr. R. D. Mehta to the position of an honorary Magistrate, and as Mr. Mehta was leaving the Temple, some one seems to have thrown an egg at him, striking him in the face and spattering its contents all over his person. That this outrage was really committed, there seems to be no doubt whatever. Mr. Mehta too hastily believed it to have been offered by Mr. Padshah, upon whom both he and his father at once turned, the latter in his excitement striking Mr. Padshah with a stick very heavily across the head, while the former in his anger was betrayed into language which unhappily is but too common amongst all classes in this country.

Mr. Padshah seems to have been seriously hurt, and as he has declared explicitly that he neither committed the outrage nor knew who did it Mr. Mehta has acted rightly in offering an apology for the assault without reserve. It was hardly justifiable we think in these circumstances, to give publicity to statements that were so purely ex-parte as those in the letter published in the Indian Daily News. A precisely similar letter was addressed to ourselves, but was suppressed by us on the ground that such charges, if preferred at all, ought to have been preferred before a magistrate, when Mr. Mehta would have had an opportunity of shewing the provocation that he had received. The letter made not the slightest mention of the fact, that Mr. Mehta had been greatly provoked, and he is held up before the world as having made an entirely gratuitous assault upon a person who had offered him no offence whatever. It requires more philosophy than most of us possess to receive with meekness the discharge of an egg full in one's face and over one's clothes, and although Mr. Mehta's best friends must regret his exhibition of so much anger under the provocation—'Let him that is without sin amongst us, cast the first stone at him.' The letter ought never to have been published, but as the matter is over, we shall say no more about it."

We are truly sorry for both sides, specially the victim of the terrible assault delivered unawares. We hope Mr. Padshah has by this thoroughly recovered.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

WE are glad to notice that the recruitment of coolies and their condition in Assam have engaged the attention of both the Local and Supreme Governments. Whatever of colour there may be in the unsifted representations of the ignorant men, or in the sensational reports of political emissaries or party journalists, there are doubtless many abuses. These must, in the nature of the thing, exist. It is the duty of humane Governments to prevent them so far as may be, and of all humane men to help in the good work. The law on the subject was passed some years ago. In the interest of both labour and capital, it needs change. But no law will ever protect the poor without purity of administration. It is there where the shoe most pinches. What security for liberty or property, for instance, can there be in a country in which justice is administered by magistrates like Extra Assistant Commissioner Boruah, who the other day convicted fourteen men of theft, without evidence and against every reasonable presumption? Mr. Boruah, apparently not satisfied in his own mind as to what was doing, did not send the poor coolies to prison, but levied a fine of Rs. 5 on each man. His very leniency however puts the men out of the benefit of appeal. We do hope the Chief Commissioner of Assam will do the poor fellows the justice they are denied in his courts.

WHATEVER the abuses of coolie recruiting for plantations at home or colonies abroad, never during the worst period, before public attention was roused to the subject, was the system so bad and unblushing as that which is at this very moment being pursued in the Northern hills in British India, for enlisting native recruits for the army. The matter formed the subject of an editorial note in the Morning Post of Allahabad not long ago, but failed to attract the attention of the press or public. As the victims are practically dumb and helpless, we consider it a duty to revive the subject. We do this the more readily as we have come to know that the writer is no Allahabad Cockney but a gentleman of the North; in fact, we have been assured by himself of the truth of his statement, to wit:—

The Government have been recently, that is during the last three or four years, been adding to their military strength, by raising 2nd Battalions to all their Goorkah regiments in the service. But, on account of the extreme difficulty that has been experienced of obtaining the genuine Goorkah recruits from Nepal, they have been compelled to have recourse to and substitute enlistment of the descendants of Goorkahs and other Paharies who live in Ghurwal and in and about the vicinity of Almorah, Srinuggur, &c., &c. This has particularly been the case with the 3rd Goorkas, better known as the Kumaon Regiment. This battalion is, we believe, to be located in new cantonments somewhere in a direction due north of the station of Nujeebad on the Oudh and Robilkhund Railway, at a place named Kala Danda, which is a short distance in the hills in the interior above Kotdwarra. So far so good. Now the 3rd Goorkahs, if we have not been wrongly informed, contains a larger percentage of Ghurwallis than any of the other Goorkah Regiments, and so as to obtain the required number of men to bring the second battalion up to its required strength, recruiting parties have been sent out into the interior to enlist Ghurwallis, particularly in that portion of the district which lies to the North of the road which runs from Almorah in the direction of Paori and Srinuggur. These recruiting parties have been spread about in this portion of the district and have, whilst engaged in beating up for recruits, been guilty of bullying, harrassing and terrorizing the villagers in their immediate neighbourhood. Their method of procedure is as follows. Having obtained the names of all the likely young men in the various villages adjacent to their parties, these are written down in a list as having actually enlisted, and this is done without the consent of the young men themselves, their parents or other relatives. These young recruits or, we should rather call them by their proper military designation, conscripts, are marched before the officer in command of the recruiting party, who, deluded by the misrepresentations of his own men, utterly refuses to pay any heed to the representations made by them.

We hope the Government will make the necessary inquiry and stop this unheard of conscription without even the colour of authority, and against all law.

NOTICING a report from Hyderabad of Abdul Huq's determination to throw himself on the mercy of the Nizam, and make restitution of the money that he received in payment of the shares in the Deccan Mining Company that he induced His Highness to buy last year, the Advocate of India is doubtful of the efficacy of so late a repentance. Our contemporary again kills two birds with one stone, though East Bengal imperspicacity may not see it, or seeing may be morally too self-conscious to admire the sportsmanship :

"If instead of blustering, with the help of able lawyers at two thousand rupees a day, he had made submission to the Nizam when he was first asked for an explanation, he would probably have been able to smooth over the affair without any great personal sacrifice. Oriental masters are not very stern; and he might have thrown a gloss over his little peccadilloes by a judicious expenditure of a few of the many lakhs which he has made in the past six years. He might even have served his cause by purchasing a Bombay journal, if he were a wise man. Now it is too late. The Nizam has been angered by his attitude of defiance, and is not to be placated by a tardy submission, which, indeed, will be construed generally as a wish to end further inquiry into his doings."

At Hyderabad they will probably smile at our contemporary's remark, and put it to the score of British superstition. What is time at Hyderabad, or truth, either? Native Princes are at once long-suffering and easily appeased. We are not surprised, therefore, to hear that the first step towards white-washing Huq and his restoration to favour, so far as these lie with the Nizam, has been taken.

It will be remarked how deftly—pace the Dacca moralist—the Advocate touches up its neighbour the Gazette.

SINCE the last report, Abdul Huq has been more liberal in his offer towards compromise. He takes back the 12,500 shares he sold to the Nizam's Government last year, and repays £151,631, thus: He gives 7 lacs in cash, transfers 4 lacs due to him by the Arab Jemadar, and for the balance mortgages to the Nizam's Government all his Bombay property, and all without prejudice to any action the Government may be advised to adopt regarding himself or the mining concession. He has now permission to leave Hyderabad to arrange the matter at Bombay.

THE Bangalore Post gives the following notice of the General Willoughby who has been expelled from Madagascar. When five years back the French invaded the island, they found him in high favor. He was then sent to Europe to induce any of the Powers to come to the rescue of Madagascar. He failed to obtain allies or patrons, and on his return was coldly treated by the Queen and the ministry. The French who now gained a footing in the country, were not slow to follow the Malagasy against a man whom they might have reason to fear. Various charges were brought against Willoughby. But nothing came of the jealousy of the intriguers at court or the malice of the invaders, beyond the temporary disgrace of Willoughby. After a time, the prejudice against him wore away. A reaction even showed itself. He was taken back to favor. But again there was withdrawal of royal favour. And now he has been actually dismissed—doubtless, at French instigation if not dictation.

The history of French ascendancy in the island, is of a piece with the whole history of European colonization and conquest. In 1883, the island was suffering from the Colony fever. M. Jules Ferry, acting as the organ of the chivalrous French nation, aggravated the misfortune by sending over an expedition for its conquest. The people naturally resisted, and the French did not find the campaign a walk over. However, at length, Civilization triumphed. Madagascar submitted—ceding Diego Suarez Bay and £800,000 for expenses of war, and accepting a French Protectorate. Towards the end of 1886, differences again broke out, without leading to a rupture, however.

INDIA has lost a remarkable man in the death of Bhagvan Lal Indrajī. A Pandit of the old class, he commenced life as a practitioner of Hindu medicine, but a lucky accident diverted him to the study of numismatics and paleography, in which he acquired lasting distinction and did good service to letters. That accident was his meeting with another medical practitioner—the famous Bhau Daji. The latter, though a graduate in European medicine at the Grant College, had been driven, by its uncertainty and insufficiency, to inquire into indigenous drugs and native methods of treatment. Here was a natural point of contact between the two sons of Æsculapius. It was doubtless from his intimate communication with the practitioners of indigenous medicine, that Dr. Bhau Daji derived those hints which enabled him to make important therapeutic discoveries in the treatment of leprosy and other diseases. Dr. Daji was, however, not only great in his profession, but he was still more celebrated as an antiquarian, and he introduced his young Vaidya friend to a taste for his own archæologic pursuits. Into these Indrajī plunged with an absorbing passion, devoting himself in especial to the patient study of Indian paleography. He gave his friend invaluable help in deciphering copper plates and rock inscriptions. After Daji's lamented death, he pursued his researches on his own hook, and before long acquired a European reputation. But with a generosity of disposition rare in the East as in the West, he never missed an opportunity of acknowledging his obligations to the deceased. He never pretended to be aught else but a disciple. And this in no conventional compliment. All his contributions to the museums and learned societies are inscribed with his name and designation as the pupil of Dr. Bhau Daji.

At a recent meeting of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, one of Bombay's most distinguished citizens, Mr. Javerilal Umiahsunker Yajnik read a paper on Pandit Indrajī's career.

WE have never been slow to acknowledge the deficiencies and defects of the Native Press, and have frequently rebuked, without compunction, our erring brethren. We have of late been positively humiliated by the attitude of a part, not the least numerous nor least active, of our Press. But a great and invaluable institution should not be discredited for the sins of its representatives for the time being. After all, there are papers and papers, in the Native Press as in the European. We cannot, therefore, let the systematic wholesale depreciation of native journalists, even by papers of the stamp of the Bengal Times, go without challenge. The question of our contemporary, "What man with a shred of self-respect, or discrimination pays heed to what a Native editor writes?" is easily disposed of. We answer, Dr. Pollen, of Sind, for one. That accomplished and learned member of the Civil Service, has lately been lecturing on the Native Press. In the course of his sage discourse, he pays en passant a well-merited compliment to a well-known journal of that Presidency, the Indian Spectator. We are the more free to recognise the justice of Dr. Pollen's commendation that, in the great sphere of Social Reform, which that paper has made its chief speciality, we do not sail in the same boat. We think it necessary to mention this fact, in order to anticipate the suggestion too often made, in a certain quarter, that we mutually exchange compliments. From its start, the Indian Spectator was distinguished for ability and smartness, but as it grew in years and experience it mellowed down to a wise moderation of tone, coupled with all legitimate firmness and sincerity of utterance, which contrasted with the loud effervescence of many of the Indian press, native or European. Of course, every paper has its own loves and hates—its hobbies and whipping-boys. Its writers are unsurpassed for caustic rallery, but the employment of wit is usually restrained by good sense and prudence, and the paper never descends to mere invective or vague abuse of Government or political opponents. It is a party paper, to be sure, but it has the courage as well as honesty to condemn natives when the occasion, in its judgment, requires such condemnation. Thus, it is seldom that in the desert to which the native press has, of late years, run, we come upon such a refreshing oasis as this remark, to wit—

"There is a class of men whose patriotism consists in opposing every suggestion that does not emanate from themselves. Unhappily, they have the ear of the masses, and this makes progress all the more difficult."

That probes a real sore in the heart of our society which is ruining its health. It is not only that we have such a class of men, but our loudest patriotism is tainted with this pusillanimity. It was time that honest men combined to put this sort of trafficking in public affairs down.

Better still, as evidencing not only independence but superior powers of observation, is the following:—

"We are afraid Ahmedabad has too many pleaders for its peace of mind. And having poor business in Court, which they do but poorly, they busy themselves with public affairs, sometimes without knowledge, and often with the object of showing themselves wiser than others. This is more or less the case all over the country. It is true, we think, that India profited in this respect by the experience of other nations. France has suffered grievously from this ascendancy of advocates; the United States have but recently freed themselves from the evil. Public opinion in Great Britain, too, has suffered under the influence of too much special pleading; but although the legal element is very strong in the British Parliament of our own day, we doubt if it influences the conduct of public affairs to an undue extent. The lawyer, as such, is a doubtful force in the House; his advocacy is often instinctively distrusted. The man of law in India is certainly no way better than his brother among better educated communities; and though, of course, there are lawyers and lawyers, still, as a rule, our legal friend is too eager to make out his case. He can abuse under cover of argument, and the layman, who has not his tongue, is generally powerless before such an opponent. We say this especially in reference to the worse kind of mofussil pleaders. From these we should like India to be saved. The country may tide over floods and fires periodically, she may put up with epidemics at times; but a plague of pleaders is what India can no longer stand if she is to get on. The pleaders have hitherto had it too much their own way. Let the other professions be fairly represented on our Municipal Boards and elsewhere. And perhaps the best way to do it is to keep these professions on a footing of equality with the legal. The graduate in Arts, Engineering or Medicine ought to be intellectually the equal of the graduate in Law, able to hold his own in debate and in all concerns of public life."

That is outspoken certainly, but true every word of it.

WIT which depends for its point on a verbal analogy, is not the despised thing that some have affected to regard it. Nearly all humorists, including the best, from Shakespeare to Lamb and Hook, have indulged in it, more or less. There have been some pretty examples of the kind. But it is confessedly a low form. For want of better occupation or capacity, a poor victim of the caecothes scribendi in England has been spinning out the following poor joke with, rather than on, the names of English newspapers and periodicals of the day:—

"In the early part of this the Nineteenth Century of the Christian Era, a citizen of the World strolled at night, along Pall Mall on his way from Belgravia to Whitenall accompanied only by the Echo of his footsteps. An old Engineer and soldier of the Queen, he had traversed by Land and Water the greater part of the Globe, and had since his Broad Arrow days fought under more than one Standard. Taking out his Tablet he stood and wrote as follows:—"The study of Public Opinion offers a wide Field for the intelligent Spectator and Examiner on the Times." At this moment a Watchman, who had been a close Observer of his movements, approached and said 'come, my noble Sportsman, you must move on!' 'And what if I refused?' demanded the other, standing like a Rock with his back against a Post unmovable as Temple Bar, - 'to be Brief with you, my friend, I shall in Truth stay here a Week if I think proper.' 'Well, rejoined the Cruel, 'I am the appointed Guardian of this thoroughfare All the year round, and I protest against your making any Sketch or Record here,—are you a Builder?' Instantly a grasp of Iron was laid on his arm. 'Do you wish me to Punch your head?' asked the Traveller. 'Oh no,' replied the other all of a Quiver 'pray don't, I was only in Jest."

That is a trying and rather formidable effort, which brings to mind Johnson's famous condemnation. Both writer and readers are objects of pity, indeed, the one to be condemned to that dull cobweb-weaving—the others to be constrained to read the production. What solemn trifling! It has not even the recommendation of an aid to the memory, seeing that important papers like the Daily News, Vanity Fair, Graphic, &c., and nearly all the magazines are left out. Indeed, it were hardly worth while making the catalogue more exhaustive. It would be a worse infliction. As a vehicle for stringing facts together for easier recollection, the process can never compete with verse, which is so largely employed for the purpose in the copious languages of the East. Punning—and the literary effort quoted above is little better than punning, of a sort—may be permissible. But punning, without proper provocation and on this scale, is simply Love's Labour lost. A general disposition to this sort of dissipation would be ominous of a sure corruption of literature, such as has taken place in the East.

AMERICA is go-ahead, and no mistake—in folly no less than in wisdom. The vanity and frivolity of the French capital have long been proverbial. But there might, it appears, be a lower deep beyond the depths of Parisian degradation, and that was reserved for the "mashers" and "dudes," the beaus and belles of the Transatlantic Republic. Not long ago, we heard that, instead of the old fashioned kid-skin cases, human skin gloves were much in request—not in the Fiji Islands, but in the heart of Christendom, in the cities of Puritan New England. Next, we were told that the Christian heroes of fashion affected rattlesnake cravats. And now

"The latest craze among the fashionable ladies in America according to a Chicago newspaper, is to wear a diamond embedded in one of their front teeth. This remarkable development of feminine vanity is said to owe its origin to a favourite burlesque actress in New York, who thought it would be very delightful indeed to flash dazzling gleams of light upon her admirers every time she opened her mouth. The diamond—of course a very small one—is fixed in a false front tooth two-thirds the size of the natural incisor, a corresponding portion of which is cut away and the false tooth 'pivoted' on to the real one. Were the gem embedded in a natural tooth, it would speedily cause it to decay. The tooth selected for adornment is always the most prominent; and the lady to whom the credit of this brilliant inspiration is due is said to have created a very great sensation upon her first appearance with a diamond in her mouth. The New York dentist who aided her to achieve this triumph says he has just received half a dozen orders for front teeth set with diamonds."

Talk after that of the barbaric East? Why, as the wealth of Ormus and of Ind has been long since eclipsed by the fields of gold and mountains of silver of America, so the barbarian of these parts of the globe has been carried over across the Pacific to the New World. Where, in Asia, is there anything to match the truly barbaric use of gems of these American ladies? The analogue of that new fashion of the far West is not to be found in what is condescendingly called by European writers the semi-civilisation of India, China, Japan or Persia. It has rather to be sought in the elaborate toilette of African savagery in which the women file their front teeth into thin cones.

Nothing is so bad that some good may not be got out of it. Absurd and shameful as this fashion is, it may be utilised as a convincing exposure of a grave popular error. It is the universal belief in the East, that the diamond taken into the stomach acts as a virulent destroying poison. Not is the notion confined to Asiatics. Anglo-Indians, if not Europeans at Home, share the notion. It was in the belief in the toxic action of diamond dust that Colonel Phayre, at the advice of Dr. Seward, charged the late Mulhar Rao Gaekwar, the ruling Maharaja of Baroda, with attempting his life by the administration of that poison. That belief was certainly endorsed by the Government of Lord Northbrook, when they prosecuted and tried the sovereign of that Maharatta State.

LAST Saturday, at the Town Hall, Captain Harsey addressed a number of native gentlemen on the subject he has now taken in hand—the confiscation of a temple property at Benares. He expected a larger audience, but many who were fully expected, did not turn up, and after waiting for full one hour, he laid his case before the meeting. He was cheered from time to time, and at the conclusion, a hearty vote of thanks was proposed and carried. The Government had better look into the grievance of which he complains, unless they do not mind to have another Laidman business in their hands.

SIR RIVERS THOMPSON will be better remembered in Bengal for his memorial portrait in the Town Hall of this city, than for the wisdom he displayed in the government of these Provinces. His remarkable good fortune followed him to the last. Surely, it was a happy accident that a renowned Scotch Academician should have been at hand at Calcutta to take his portrait voted by his admirers. The result is a fine work of art. Mr. James Archer has presented him in the best light conceivable, and yet the likeness is so vividly perfect that, after it was finished at Belvedere, a high native official, mistaking it for the reality, respectfully bowed to it. The Memorial Committee, at their meeting of Monday presided over by Sir Alexander Wilson, properly resolved to expend a portion of the Fund in photographic copies of the oil-painting. They will be distributed here and a number of copies sent to Sir Rivers. The memorial casket

Holloway's Ointment.—Go where you may, in every country and in all climes persons will be found who have a ready word of praise for this Ointment. For chaps, chafes, scalds, bruises, and sprains, it is an invaluable remedy; for bad legs, bad breasts, and piles, it may be confidently relied upon for effecting a sound and permanent cure. In cases of puffed ankles, erysipelas, and rheumatism, Holloway's Ointment gives the greatest comfort by reducing the inflammation, cooling the blood, soothing the nerves, adjusting the circulation, and expelling the impurities. This Ointment should have a place in every nursery. It will cure all those manifold skin affections which, originating in childhood, gain strength with the child's growth.

is ready and is to be sent to him at once. Sir Alexander significantly drew the attention of the meeting to the fact that more than half the subscriptions came from the natives. The Committee, after providing for all expenses, still hold a balance of about Rs. 8,000. This sum is not to be expended here, but is to be placed at the disposal of the subject himself of the memorial—to furnish himself with a memento of his rule of the Bengal Province. Lady Mayo wished a portion of the memorial Fund of her murdered Lord to be expended in repairing her house. Sir Rivers has expressed no such wish, but the Committee are honest practical men, and they will not withhold from even a pensioned Cæsar what might be his due. Sir Rivers is free to choose his own memorial at Home.

ONE of the successful students at the last Entrance Examination of the Calcutta University, is the minor Maharaja Sree Ram Chandra Bunj Deo of Mourbhanj. He is the first prince of Orissa who has earned the distinction. It proves him a worthy scion of a family distinguished for intelligence, and shows that he has good teachers. All will depend upon how he progresses hereafter, and whether he preserves his nationality. What is the good of an Indian Prince looking and living like an Indo-Portuguese?

A CANADIAN lady has just sued a man for 2,000 dols. for kissing her on the cheek. She alleges that the shock was so great as to incapacitate her from performing household duties for two weeks. That is a good modest woman, with a commendable self-respect and appreciation of personal integrity, but why does she demand dollars in satisfaction, instead of walking up to the magistrate and calling for a good flogging for the base invader? Perhaps there were legal difficulties, under the Western dispensation damages of all kinds being appraised at their respective money values. In that case, she should not have gone to court at all, but appealed to a relative or friend to horse-whip the fellow in public. It is obviously cowardly in a man to employ force against a woman, and sheer barbarous stupidity to exact vi et armis an amenity which loses all value if not cheerfully given. Such a reprisal, however proper as an expression of the indignation of society and useful for the protection of womankind, would hardly satisfy the honor of the injured lady. There is, indeed, no reparation for her. We speak as Orientals, of course, and Hindus, and have scant hope of sympathy from Western peoples. It will be enough if we are understood.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, JUNE 9, 1888.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION.

If we have sharply criticised the Public Service Commission's decision on the question of an Indian competition for the Civil Service, it is from no want of appreciation of the generally liberal tenor of the rest of its recommendations. Indeed, as we have already said, the Commission's proposals are well calculated to widen the sphere of native employment, and, if adopted in the main, will go far to redeem the hopes raised by its appointment. Viewed as a whole, the document marks an era in our history, while it offers no mean indication of the liberal tendencies of the present administration.

The extended employment of natives of India in higher administrative charges, hitherto exclusively reserved for the Civil Service, is proposed to be effected by a variety of methods. The competition for the highest offices is, indeed, restricted to London, but the number of such offices is proposed to be reduced, with the view of adding the remainder to the Provincial Service. The appointments reserved by law for the Covenanted Civil Service, are those enumerated in the Schedule attached to the Statute 24 and 25 Vic., Chapter 54. A portion of these appointments are recommended to be excluded from the Schedule, viz., the following:—

(1) Under-Secretaries to the several Governments in India.

(2) One-third of District and Civil and Sessions Judges or chief judicial officers of Districts; and in the Punjab one-third of the officers aforesaid after deducting the proportion (one-fourth) reserved for Military Officers.

(3) One-third of the Joint and Assistant Judges in the Bombay Presidency.

(4) One-tenth of Magistrates or Chief Magisterial Officers of Districts (including Deputy Commissioners); and in the Punjab and Assam, one-tenth of the officers aforesaid after deducting the proportion (one-fourth) reserved for Military Officers.

(5) One-sixth of Joint-Magistrates in all Provinces.

(6) One Member of the Board of Revenue in the Madras Presidency; in the Lower Provinces of Bengal; and in the North-Western Provinces; and one of the Financial Commissioners in the Punjab.

(7) One (where there are more than one) of the Secretaries to the Board of Revenue (or Commissioners who constitute the Board of Revenue) in the Madras Presidency; in the Lower Provinces of Bengal; and in the North-Western Provinces; and one Secretary to the Financial Commissioner of the Punjab.

(8) One of the Chief Revenue Officers of Divisions in all Provinces except Bombay and Assam.

(9) One-tenth of Collectors of Revenue or Chief Revenue Officers of Districts; and in the Punjab and Assam one-tenth of the officers aforesaid after deducting the proportion (one-fourth) reserved for Military Officers.

(10) One-sixth of Deputy or Subordinate Collectors where combined with the office of Joint-Magistrates in all Provinces.

(11) One-sixth of Assistant Collectors or Assistant Commissioners; and in the Punjab and Assam one-sixth of the officers aforesaid after deducting the proportion (one-fourth) reserved for Military Officers.

This is no small measure of liberality. 108 appointments reserved in the Schedule will be removed from it—a number in excess of the proportion of one-sixth of the same appointments thrown open under the Statutory Rules.

The restriction of the competition examination to London will operate, indeed, harshly against the free admission of Natives of India to the Imperial Service. This evil, however, will be considerably counteracted by the Commission's proposal with respect to the age of candidates, which is that the minimum and maximum limit of age for Native candidates at the open competitive examination held in England, should be 19 and 23 years respectively.

The Provincial Service as proposed to be constituted for the more extensive employment of Natives of India, will occupy, in fact, the position of the present Covenanted Civil Service. Without the opprobrious degradation now belonging to the Uncovenanted, recruited equally from candidates passed at the London competition, and Natives who have not passed that competition, and being placed on a footing of social equality with the Imperial Service, it will afford adequate scope to native ambition, and occupy a position, in their estimation, of higher honor than the Statutory Civil Service.

The Miscellaneous Departments of the administration are also recommended to be officered more largely by Natives of India. The chief administrative offices being generally recruited from candidates passed at the London competition, all other offices subordinate to them, and at present exclusively filled by the same class, are recommended to be amalgamated with the Provincial Service. The effect of this will be the same as that of the foregoing proposals, viz., the placing of the Provincial Service on a wide basis and a footing of sufficient dignity.

That the Commission has been in a position to make these liberal proposals, is not a little to its credit. It had to encounter powerful opposition and prejudice against native interests. Sir Rivers Thompson may be taken as a fair type of the Anglo-Indian official, and how did he view the prospect of wider employment of the people in the higher offices? He was strongly disposed to maintain an invidious race distinction in the recruitment for the civil appointments. He went so far as to fear that, if the age limit were raised, it would have the effect of inundating the Service with natives. The Commission's answers to his objections are conceived in a proper and just spirit, and reflect great credit on its integrity and firmness. "This suggestion" [viz. for a separate competition for Natives], says the report,

"does not commend itself to the Commission. In the first place, it involves a differential mode of treatment which would certainly be distasteful to the Native community, whose desire is to be permitted to compete on equal terms with the educated youth of England. In the next place, the adoption of any suggestion which involves separate standards of examination for Europeans and Natives is open to many of the objections which have been taken in the evidence before the Commission to the Statutory Service, and to which reference will be made in the following Chapter of this Report. Not the least prominent of these is the fact that persons appointed otherwise than by a common test and under a common standard are liable to be regarded as not possessing the same qualifications. Moreover, the system of allotting a certain number of appointments to be competed for by Natives and Europeans respectively is a departure from the principles of the Statute of 1833 and the Queen's Proclamation, inasmuch as it involves an artificial exclusion of candidates on grounds of race from appointments for which they may be in other respects the best qualified persons. It has indeed been suggested that if increased facilities are given to Natives in connection with the open competition in England, it is desirable to fix such a limit in order to guard against Natives gaining admission to the service by the competitive examination to an extent which may prove a source of difficulty or embarrassment. But when the disadvantages are considered under which Natives labour in competing in a foreign language, in a foreign country, in subjects of study peculiarly English, and against the flower of English schools and colleges, the hypothesis involves so violent an improbability that it may be dismissed without serious discussion.

In short, the Commission is of opinion that the competition in England should remain open as heretofore, without restriction or distinction, as by the present law provided, to all natural-born subjects of Her Majesty, of whatever race or colour or creed or place of birth, who can satisfy the preliminary conditions prescribed in the rules framed by the Civil Service Commissioners, and that selection should be made impartially and indifferently from among the candidates according to their order of merit as ascertained in one and the same examination."

The same firmness has been shown in deciding upon the conflicting evidence adduced before the Commission on the vexed question of the eligibility of natives to the District Magistracies. The point is of such interest that we are sure the public will be glad to have the Commission's decision of it placed before them in its full details. We have therefore no hesitation in quoting the report in extenso :—

"Stronger objections have been raised in the course of the enquiries of the Commission to the employment of Natives in district charges than in high judicial offices, and many witnesses have advised that they should be altogether excluded from offices of the former description. In view of the fact that the District Officer is the direct representative of the Executive Government in all Departments of the administration, that he is primarily responsible for the peace of the district, that he is occasionally called on to deal with religious riots and disturbances of a dangerous kind, that he is head of the police, that his work necessarily brings him into frequent contact with officers of other Departments in whose co-operation its success must largely depend, that the District Officer is invested with the control and training of the junior officers of the Imperial Service, and that in times of war the Government has to rely upon the District Officer for the supply of military transport, for keeping open communications, and for other arrangements in connection with the army in the field, it is argued that he should be an officer of the Covenantated Civil Service. More especially is this said to be the case in regard to districts in which there is a more or less considerable European non-official community or where troops are quartered or important military establishments located.

On the other hand it is argued that it is unfair to allege that Natives of India are not qualified to hold offices their fitness for which has not hitherto been tested and no adequate training ground for which has up to the present time been supplied; that in dealing with riots and disturbances, with the supply of transport, stores and recruits in time of war, and other matters of general administration, the District Officer has to rely almost entirely upon Native agency; that European gentlemen readily enough accept employment under Native control in Native States, Native Armies, as tutors in Native families and managers of Native estates; that there are many districts in which there are no troops and few Europeans, and where no difficulties of collision are likely to arise; and that when Natives have been largely employed in offices of control in other Departments, they have not only not been found wanting but have discharged their duties with marked efficiency.

After a careful consideration of the arguments which have been brought forward on the subject, the Commission is unable to proceed on the general assumption that Natives are unfit for district or other executive charges. They have as yet had no sufficient opportunity of showing their capacity in this respect in the higher executive administration, and the generality of this assumption is not warranted by experience in Departments in which Natives have already been tried. Moreover, it is stated that Natives of India, when placed in charge of districts in Native States, which have been temporarily under British management, have in some cases performed their duties to the entire satisfaction of their superiors and have proved themselves most efficient officers. The same may be said of many Native officers who have held Sub-Divisional charges in British India. Under these circumstances the Commission considers that due opportunity should be afforded to Natives to prove their fitness for holding the executive charge of districts, and the proposals of the Commission to remove certain district charges from the Schedule of the Statute have been made with this view. As regards the Subordinate Secretariat appointments which it is proposed to exclude from the Schedule, it is only necessary to observe that, as these appointments are invariably made by selection, the effect of their exclusion is merely to widen the area from which the most highly qualified agency can be chosen."

The Commission had smaller opposition to contend with as regards the larger admission of native officers to the judicial branch of the Service, and it is gratifying that these offices will be more largely filled by the Natives of the country, although the Commission is perhaps justly unable to throw them open entirely to them. We have nothing to complain on this head. It is sufficient that the marked ability showed by natives in the highest judicial offices, as well as the aptitude for judicial duties displayed by them in the subornate judiciary, which is almost exclusively composed of the native element, is recognised. It is sufficient that the claims of successful native officers will be adequately met by more extensively employing them for High Court and District Judgeships, and we do not complain if the judiciary is not to consist exclusively of natives.

THE PURNEA MAHOMEDAN RAJA'S LAWSUIT.

A GREAT book has been declared, on high authority, to be a great evil. If so, what shall be said of a great litigation, directly involving several families and indirectly many more, maybe hundreds of employes and thousands of tenants on an estate? Of course, here, as everywhere else, the law of compensation reigns. If stubborn litigation ruins the parties and exhausts many others into the bargain, it prospers others—the lawyers, of sorts, and their myrindons, more or less recognised, accessories before, during, and after the fact—beaters of the game and so forth. But a great preface is no less an evil, and we must not spin the preliminary yarn farther, but plunge at once in medias res.

An emphatically great lawsuit has come to an end in the High Court. We refer to the big Purnea case, which has just been disposed of by a Divisional Bench consisting of Messrs. Justice Norris and Beverley.

Raja Fakrooddin was the proprietor, in the District of Purnea, of Pergunnah Surajpur, divided into Deolri Khagra and Deolri Kissenganj. He died leaving two sons Didar Hossein and Akbar Hossein. Didar Hossein received as his share Deolri Khagra and Akbar Hossein got Kissenganj. Didar left a son Enayet Hoseain—Enayet left a son Atta Hossein—a Jubilee Nawab. He enjoys now half the Pergunnah Surajpur. Akbar Hossein died leaving three widows—Zahoorun Nissa, Goolchamun and Domni. Zahoorun Nissa had a brother named Meer Hossein Reza. On the death of Zahoorun Nissa, Meer Hossein Reza came to enjoy her share of Deolri Kissenganj. Hossein Reza died leaving three sons—Mahomed Reza, Ahmed Reza and Enayet Reza. Ahmed Reza better known as Raja Ahmed Reza—the father of the Plaintiffs and Defendants—died possessed of 6 annas 1 gunda + 11 gundas of Deohri Kissenganj, and leaving two sons Syed Hyder Reza and Syed Sufdar Reza by his wife Ranee Afzulun Nissa. He also left four sons by his wife Ranee Roshan Jahan. Of these four, two sons—Asgar Reza and Delawar Reza still survive.

Raja Ahmed Reza married Afzulun Nissa in 1854, but in 1851 the Raja purchased the 11 gundas share in the name of his Mooktear Kasem Ali, who subsequently transferred it to Ranee Afzulun Nissa. Raja Ahmed Reza, during his lifetime, was in possession of the 11 gundas. Afzulun Nissa died before Ahmed Reza. Her mother Mehru Nissa acted as the guardian of Hyder Reza and Safdar Reza and, as such, affixed her seal to various documents on their behalf. On the death of Ahmed Reza, Hyder Reza and Sufdar Reza took possession of and enjoyed the 11 gundas as their own. Hyder Reza mortgaged half of the 11 gundas to Nawab Looft Ali Khan, of Patna, and eventually sold the same to him for the sum of 5½ laes. Syed Asgar Reza and Delawar Reza being minors, the Court of Wards had charge of their estate. Asgar Reza on becoming of age instituted a suit before the Sub-Judge of Purnea, Babu Balak Chand, against Hyder Reza, Sufdar Reza and Nawab Looft Ali Khan, to have it declared that the 11 gundas which was purchased by Kasem Ali with Ahmed Reza's money and which eventually stood in the name of Afzulun Nissa, formed part of the estate of Ahmed Reza, that the sale by Hyder Reza to Nawab Looft Ali Khan was bad in law, and that they were each entitled to one-sixth share, according to Mahomedan law.

The case before the Sub-Judge lasted for nearly six months. It cost the Plaintiffs about Rs. 49,000 and Nawab Looft Ali Khan Rs. 60,000. The case of the Plaintiffs was that the purchase of 11 gundas by Ahmed Reza in the name of Kasem Ali was a benamie transaction, and that the transfer by Kasem Ali to Afzulun Nissa was also benamie. Hyder Reza and Sufdar Reza did not appear. The case of the Nawab Defendant was that the purchase was not benamie nor was the transfer benamie, and as a matter of fact the 11 gundas was a gift by Raja Ahmed Reza to his wife Afzulun Nissa, that during the lifetime of Raja Ahmed Reza the property was treated as separate property of the wife. The Nawab mainly relied on a deed executed by Ahmed Reza shortly before his death, in which he specified what his properties were, and distinctly declared that this 11 gundas belonged to his minor sons, Hyder and Sufdar.

Babu Balak Chand, in a very lengthy judgment, decided the case against the Plaintiffs, and held that the purchase by Ahmed Reza was not benamie; and that the Nawab was purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. Asgar Reza appealed. Messrs. Woodroffe, Evans, M. Ghose and Mohesh Chunder Chowdhry and two other Pleaders appeared for the appellants. Messrs. Advocate-General, G. Gregory, A. F. M. Abdur Rahman, C. Gregory, Moonshie Mahomed Yusuf and two other Pleaders represented the Nawab respondent.

The case came on before Norris and Beverley J. J. on April 23. Mr. Woodroffe very ably opened the case and continued for another 7 days. Mr. Evans followed him for a day. Mr. Woodroffe endeavoured to shew that the transaction was benamie and the 11 gundas formed part of Ahmed Reza's estate. He relied on the well-known Privy Council Gossam case and cited a number of authorities. He also argued that the deed executed by Ahmed Reza before his death was not understood by him and it was imperatively in law, either as a will or a deed of gift, according to Mahomedan law.

Mr. Advocate-General Paul opened the case for the Respondent. He took 5 days. He was at his best. It was a real treat to hear him. He treated the case as a whole. He pointed out that Hyder and Sufdar, who had not appeared, had been colluding with the Plaintiffs. He cited authorities to shew that the transaction ought to be taken out of the ruling in Gossam's case, that it was not a benamie, that the deed was a declaration by Ahmed Reza, that the 11 gundas was the separate property of Hyder Reza and Sufdar Reza and the gift by Ahmed Reza to his wife was valid according to Mahomedan law, as possession by the husband has been held to be possession by the wife, and that the declaration of Ahmed Reza proved that the 11 gundas belonged to Hyder and Sufdar. The subject matter of the suit was treated by Ahmed Reza as the property of the sons. Mr. G. Gregory followed Mr. Paul. The case took about a fortnight to consider their judgment, and on May 26 before delivering judgment, Mr. Justice Norris addressed Mr. Evans and said that if their Lordships had made up their minds that the gift to Afzulun Nissa by Ahmed Reza was valid according to Mahomedan law, Afzulun Nissa having predeceased Ahmed Reza, under the Shea law Ahmed Reza would be entitled to $\frac{1}{4}$ of his wife's estate, Could the Plaintiffs succeed in getting their share out of Ahmed's $\frac{1}{4}$ th on the present plaint? Mr. Evans argued that they could, and that the court ought not at that stage to dismiss the suit and compel the Plaintiffs to institute another suit to recover their share. Mr. Paul replied that the plaint as framed was entirely inconsistent with the point raised. Their lordships agreed with the Advocate-General and Mr. Justice Norris delivered a most able and exhaustive judgment, dismissing the appeal on the facts. The cost in the appeal court on both sides was between Rs. 3,000 to 4,000 a day, and the case lasted for seventeen days.

ROMANCE OF THE MUTINY.

A NEW MYTH EXPOSED.

IN a leading article, in the issue of the Statesman of the 23rd December, is the following statement with regard to the family of Wajid Ali Shah, the Ex-king of Oudh, which requires correction and contradiction. The statement I allude to runs thus: "There is one point that should be specially remembered in favor of Prince Kamal Kadr. His mother (Fakr Mahal) it was who saved the lives of Mrs. Orr and Miss Jackson in Lucknow during the mutiny. The story is told in most histories of the Lucknow siege and we need not recapitulate it. Suffice it to say that in no place in India did any of those faithful few who rescued European lives at the risk of their own, have a more difficult task to perform than the mother of Prince Kamal Kadr at Lucknow. Her Daroga (Wajid Ali) was awarded a lakh of Rupees for his conduct; but this lady at her own request has never received anything to this day." I am in a position to utterly deny the truth of the whole of this statement concerning the assistance rendered to Mrs. Orr and Miss Madeline Jackson and Miss Louisa Orr, and should much like to know in what histories of the events of the mutiny in Lucknow in 1857, it is stated that it was through the exertions of Fakr Mahal that the lives of the above mentioned ladies and child were saved. With regard to the circumstances to which the statement alludes, the letter of Mrs. Patrick Orr has already been quoted in these pages. But over and above all that, I have only about a fortnight ago had a conversation with one of the three ladies who were saved, and this is the information on this point she gave me.

We owed our safety and our lives (said the lady) solely to the kindness and exertions of Darogah Wajid Ali. With regard to Fakr Mahal it is my firm belief she would have had us killed but for his intercession and good offices and likewise, because she was too much engaged at the time with other more important state affairs. She caused the strictest watch to be kept over us so as in every way to preclude all possibility of our escape. During the whole time we were in captivity, we used to be daily visited and a report made to her that we were all three present. The escape of Miss Louisa Orr was effected in this manner. The child had been unwell with fever and a report to the effect had been conveyed to Fakr Mahal. It was soon after this that information was sent to Raja Maun Sing by Darogah Wajid Ali that advantage would be taken of this circumstance and that an endeavour would be made to effect the escape of the child at last. For this purpose a very brave but ugly woman, a gwalin of the name of Geendia, was induced to play a part. This Geendia was the wife of a follower of Darogah Wajid Ali. Everything having been prepared and Fakr Mahal's suspicions having been allayed by the constant reports of the ill-health of Miss Louisa Orr, early one morning, her face and hands being painted and she herself wrapped up in a sheet and a rezai thrown over her, she was placed on the shoulder of this woman who immediately set up crying and left the house and premises of the Darogah, who anxiously watched her progress from a window to see what would happen. He likewise sent two well-armed retainers to follow the woman at a distance. The woman passed several guards and sentries, acting her part to admiration and repeating to them the story that her child was dangerously ill and that she was going to a celebrated Hakeem for advice and medicine. The last guard she had to pass stopped her and insisted on seeing the child. The two retainers precipitately beat a retreat. But Geendia raised a loud cry and violently vituperated the men saying that they might if they liked undo the wrapping round her child but she was certain that the exposure to the chill early morning air would kill her outright and that the death of her child would be on their head. She did not appear to be anything else but the simple gwalin she represented herself to be. She simulated her grief and distress for the child so successfully that this guard also permitted her to pass without any further enquiry or investigation, and she then made her way to Raja Maun Sing's Head-quarters outside the city, without any more molestation, and delivered up her burthen in perfect safety. Miss Orr was then taken into the Raja's female apartments and dressed in an entire suit of native clothes, and on the first convenient opportunity conveyed to the British lines then before Lucknow.

Fakr Mahal, so far from affording them protection and genuine help, or aiding in the rescue of these three ladies, did her best to prevent them from escaping from the clutches of the rebels. So I do not understand how the Statesman on the part of Fakr Mahal can now claim a reward or pension for her, for an act of kindness in which she had neither hand nor part. On the contrary, it would behove the Government of India to search out the poor woman Geendia or, if she be dead, her heirs, and give them something. For, although Darogah Wajid Ali received one lac of Rupees for his part of the business, this poor woman, to the best of my knowledge and belief, never received one pic of the Indian Government for her heroic service.

HUMAYUN.

XIII.

At last Humayun was granted the favour of an interview with the Shah of Persia. The meeting was apparently on terms of perfect equality, and in every way suitable to his own grandeur and the dignity of his guest. However, about this affair, a stain rests on the character of the Shah of Persia. For, before he would enter into conversation with his refugee guest, he expressed his desire that Humayun should adopt the Persian cap. Such a desire, under the circumstances, was tantamount to a command. Humayun, with much grace, accepted his position and placed the cap on his head with an appropriate compliment to his host.

During his stay in Persia, Humayun had to submit to many indignities from the Persian monarch, and the sole reason for discourteous treatment was his being a Sunni. It has been stated that, wearied with the continued and marked slights he had to endure, he at last professed to have become a convert to the Shah's religious opinion. Such an act was, however, only a political move, for this profession released him, in a great measure, from the awkwardness of his position, for the Shah became more kindly in his treatment of his unfortunate and unwilling guest, and at last came to an agreement with him, and promised him the aid of 12,000 horsemen for the purpose of capturing Candahar, which, however, was to be added to Persian territory.

Humayun, after coming to such an arrangement with the Persian king, set out on his march for Candahar. It would be needless to enumerate the petty slights he had to endure, even up to the eve of his departure, owing to the variable temper of the Shah. On reaching Scistan, Humayun found that Tahmasp Shah had done more than keeping his promise, for there were 14,000 horsemen, under the command of Morad Mirza, the king's son, waiting his arrival. From this point, the troops marched straight on Candahar and besieged it, till the garrison were reduced to distress from want, and then Mirza Askari, the governor, was obliged to surrender. It is uncertain whether Humayun would have spared his captive brother's life, had not his aunt, Baber's sister, intervened and obtained a promise of pardon. But so bitter were the feelings that filled the mind of Humayun, just at this moment, so hardened were the affections of his heart, at the remembrance of his great sufferings, that, despite the promise of pardon, he treated his brother in a most unnatural way. Mirza Askari was subjected to many indignities, and was compelled to appear publicly with his sword hung round his neck, tendering his submission in the most humiliating forms. Afterwards, Humayun placed him by his side, in token of forgiveness and kindness. He also gave a great entertainment to celebrate the reconciliation. Alas! that this should have been only policy; and a policy of a very repugnant type. For, when festivity was at its height, and all fears and suspicions allayed, certain documents were produced, written by Askari to Beloochee chiefs, and directing the apprehension of Humayun during his flight to Persia. Askari was made a prisoner on pretext of this old act of enemy, and was kept in chains for about three years. From this period, we find Humayun's life often stained by acts of gross cruelty.

According to agreement, Candahar was made over to the Persian. But shortly afterwards, Morad Mirza, the Persian prince and governor of Candahar, died suddenly. Humayun availing himself of this occurrence, obtained admittance into the city in the guise of a friend, and immediately with his men set upon the garrison, slaughtering many and making the rest prisoners. These prisoners he allowed subsequently to return to Persia, and he made extraordinary merit of the act. After the occupation of Candahar, Humayun did not tarry long in that city, but collected an army, and marched for Cabul, which city he entered in triumph, his brother Camran having fled through inability to resist him. At Cabul, Humayun recovered his son Akber, who was about three years of age. Humayun, if undisturbed by ambitious craving, might now have reigned in peace. But it seems he would risk all rather than be restricted in adding to his dominion. So, after a few months spent at Cabul, he marched to recover Badakshan. While he was at Badakshan, Camran returned, surprised Cabul, and once again obtained possession of the young Akber. Humayun, however, soon obliged him to quit that city, but had to meet him in battle more than once. Eventually, Camran fell into his hands. While at Cabul, Humayun committed many acts of cruelty, the chief of which was his putting all his prisoners to death in cold blood. He also put his cousin Yadgar Mirza to death, on bare suspicion. His grounds for suspicion were so slender, that the governor of Cabul refused to carry out the order, and another person had to be substituted. It is, therefore, pleasing to note, that he acted in perfect good faith towards Camran. He treated him with great kindness; and three of the brothers being now together, he released the fourth, Mirza Askari. A feast was given, when they ate salt together, and were, for the time, entirely reconciled.

XIV.

Not very long after the happy reconciliation of the brothers, Humayun became engaged in a war with the Uzbeks in Balk. Camran, unfortunately for himself, as the sequel proved, was tempted to avail himself of such an opportunity and rebel against his brother. He marched on Cabul. In the first battle between the brothers, Humayun was defeated and nearly killed by a soldier, who had wounded him, and was about to strike again, when the king exclaimed, "You wretch! how dare you?" The stern look of Humayun so confounded the man, that he allowed his wounded antagonist to retire. Humayun fled from the field of battle with only eleven attendants. He was, however, soon in the field again, and, in a subsequent battle, forced Camran to flee for refuge, first to a Afghan tribe, and eventually into India, where false friends delivered him over to his brother, who, with subtle guile, received him graciously, and seated him on his right hand during entertainments given for three successive days. The punishment he meted out to his brother, after such a reception, was truly barbarous in its cruelty. He gave orders that Camran should be blinded. The operation was performed by the eyes being repeatedly pierced with a lancet. Camran bore the torture with great fortitude, until lemon juice and salt were squeezed into his eyes, when he exclaimed, "O Lord, my God! whatever sins I have committed have been amply punished in this world; have compassion on me in the next." Camran, now no longer dangerous, was permitted to go to Mecca, where he died shortly after.

India, as can well be imagined, was, at this period in a very disturbed state. Shir Shah, the successor of Humayun by right of conquest, was dead, and none of his lineage inherited his dominant abilities. There was now no keenly astute mind to plan, no firm hand to execute these wisely matured plans, nor to repress the turbulence or lawlessness of the many fighting races of India; to check by a seasonable display of power the daring attempts of ambitious men; and to mould all the diverse and conflicting elements present into a concrete mass, resulting in the greatest good to the many. Such being the state of matters in India, Humayun's advisers urged him, over and over again, to attempt its reconquest. Such advise, however, was not for a long time suitable to his mood of mind; he could only think of India with a shudder, as it recalled only too vividly his many misfortunes and the great sufferings he had undergone in that country. But it happens, if we think of, or are forced often to think of any subject, our mind loses the first impression it received about the matter. So it proved in Humayun's case. By having Indian matters continually forced on his attention through the zeal of his advisers, he came gradually to dissociate India from the dread that harboured in his mind, and at last came to entertain seriously the question of its reconquest. And when arguments and omens seemed alike favourable, he set out from Cabul at the head of 15,000 horsemen. He moved with alacrity; successfully invaded the Punjab defeated the Governor, and took Lahore. At Sirhind, he engaged Secander, the usurper at Delhi, who had advanced to meet him with a large army. Humayun gained a decisive victory, and immediately took possession of Delhi and Agra.

Humayun was thus restored to his capital. But the greater portion of his dominions was still to be recovered, and even what he had obtained, he did not live to enjoy. His death was most untoward and sudden. He had been walking on the terracc of his library at Delhi and was descending the stairs, which were on the outside of the building, and narrow, guarded simply by an ornamental parapet about a foot high. While descending, he heard the call to prayers, sounded from the minarets, and, as became a good Moslem, he stopped for the purpose of repeating the creed, and then sat down on the steps till the crier had finished. In endeavouring to rise again with the aid of the staff he carried, the staff slipped on the polished marble of the steps and precipitated him over the parapet. When taken up, he was insensible, but soon after recovered consciousness, yet the injury he had received was pronounced mortal, and he expired on the fourth day after the accident. He was forty-nine years old, and had been called king for twenty-six years, inclusive of the sixteen years of his banishment from Agra. We conclude the life-story of Humayun with a deep impression that it is one of the most remarkable histories extant, and it is one that will not only well repay perusal but affords us materials for much deep thought.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

tion of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and conceals himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee parih, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Calcutta Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

(Author of Kabitar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer. —The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohini's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY LYRICS.

CARMEN MYSTICUM.

Dear Lord, since thou didst make the earth,
Thou mad'st it not for grief, but mirth ;

Therefore will I be glad,
And let who will be sad.

For if I load my life with care,
What profits me the buxom air,
And what the sweet bird's choir
Or heaven's azure fire ?

But if I cannot choose but weep,
Weeping I'll think I do but sleep,
Till thou shalt bid me wake
And triumph for thy sake.

Lord, as 'tis thine eternal state
With joy undimmed to contemplate
The world that thou hast wrought
As mirror for thy thought,

So every morning I would rise,
And offer thee for sacrifice
A spirit bright and clear
As the wide atmosphere.

For, Lord, since all is well with thee,
It cannot well be ill with me.

D.

REGINALD SHIRLEY BROOKS.

DIED THURSDAY, 10TH MAY 1888.

A Passing cloud obscures the summer sun,
And silence shrouds the laughter of the day,
For Death has claimed our best beloved one,
And Grief holds back the blossom of the May.
We miss the handsome presence and the mirth,
That lightened labour where he moved and spoke,
We feel the dull monotony of earth,
That he with wit and merry laughter broke.
Forgive to-day our poor attempt at jest,
Sorrow the gayest, lightest hearts will rend ;
And we must mourn our brightest and our best—
Our " Blobbs," our brother, and our dearest friend.

TRANSLATIONS FROM THE PERSIAN OF OMAR KHAYYAM.

By Edward Fitzgerald.

Think, in this batter'd Caravanserai
Whose Portals are alternate Night and Day,
How Sultán after Sultán with his Pomp
Abode his destin'd Hour, and went his way.

They say the Lion and the Lizard keep
The Courts where Jamshyd gloried and drank deep :
And Bahrá'm, that great Hunter—the Wild Ass
Stamps o'er his Head, but cannot break his Sleep.

*I sometimes think that never blows so red
The Rose as where some buried Cæsar bled ;
That every Hyacinth the Garden wears Dropt in her Lap from some once lovely Head.*

And this reviving Herb whose tender Green
Fledges the River-Lip on which we lean—
Ah, lean upon it lightly ! for who knows
From what once lovely Lip it springs unseen !

A Book of Verses underneath the Bough,
A Jug of Wine, a Loaf of Bread—and Thou
Beside me singing in the Wilderness—
Oh, Wilderness were Paradise enow !

Some for the Glories of this World ; and some Sigh for the Prophet's Paradise to come ;
Ah, take the Cash, and let the Credit go,
Nor heed the rumble of a distant Drum !

Look to the blowing Rose about us—" Lo,
Laughing," she says, " into the world I blow,
At once the silken tassel of my Purse
Tear, and its Treasure on the Garden throw."

And those who husbanded the Golden grain,
And those who flung it to the winds like Rain,
Alike to no such aureate Earth are turn'd
As, buried once, Men want dug up again.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

THE following is good news and would, we are sure, be more welcome to our readers without the snobbery of its presentation :—

" Her Highness the Maharani of Mysore was safely confined of a Prince at 8 A.M., this (June 5,) morning."

We wonder whether Maharajas drop manna for tears of joy, or sweat rose-water.

EMPEROR Frederick is no more. He quietly breathed his last yesterday at eleven in the forenoon.

ON the 8th it was reported from Berlin, that " Differing from the Emperor Frederick's liberal views, Herr Von Puttkamer has resigned his post of Vice-President of the Council of Ministers, and Minister of the Interior. The Emperor has accepted the resignation."

THE Gaekwar of Baroda leaves Bombay on the 26th for Switzerland, accompanied by Colonel Jackson, Political Agent, Amreli, as Political officer on his tour, and 10 other persons including servants. The Maharani remains in India.

HIS Highness Seyyid Turki, Sultan of Muscat, died on 4th instant ; his second son Seyyid Feysal has assumed the Government.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

REUTER from Alexandria on the 8th telegraphs the dismissal of Nubar Pasha by the Khedive, in consequence of an altercation which took place in the Council.

Riaz Pasha has accepted the office of the President of the Council, Minister for Foreign Affairs, and Minister of Justice.

A TELEGRAM from Aden reports that the native town of Berbera on the opposite coast of Somaliland has been entirely burnt down. Great distress exists among the native population. The Government of India has sanctioned Rs. 5,000 towards relief of the distress.

THE Home remittances from April 1 to June 9, amounted to £3,066,700.

THE following is from Burma, dated Rangoon 5th:—Upper Burma is reported to be generally quiet during last week. The news from Tavoy is that an attack was made on Nabule by 70 dacoits, on the night of the 27th May. The dacoits were driven off by 17 Gurkhas who were stationed there, with the loss of one Gurkha and a villager killed and 4 wounded. The rumour of the death of the Myook is unfounded.

MR. A. OGILVY, the manager of Tikari estate, is reported to have died from the effects of a fall from a dog-cart in town Gya.

MR. J. FRIZELLE, Judge of Rawalpindi, has been temporarily promoted to the Punjab High Court.

THE Pioneer announces a special loan by the Government of India for the defences of India, in advance of Gazette notification. The statement has since been denied by Sir John Gorst in the House of Commons.

IT has been decided to retain the Calcutta Mint.

HIS Highness the Maharaja of Vizianagram has made the princely donation of Rs. 15,000, to Babu Surendra Nath Banerjee, for a house for the Indian Association. Where is the Baboo's National Fund?

THE Extra Assistant Commissioner of Rai Bareli convicted one Farquand Ali, "a Zemindar of some consequence in the district of Rai Bareli and the son of a Darogah who figured in the Mutiny," for mischief for felling trees and sentenced him to 15 days' imprisonment and Rs. 50 fine. There was an appeal, of course. But there was no Sessions Judge to take it up. He had gone on leave, and there was no person appointed to act the Judge, although the Deputy Commissioner had been Gazetted to discharge "the current duties of the Commissioner's Office." So the Zemindar had to rot in jail for eight long days before he could be set free on bail—pending appeal—by the Judicial Commissioner.

A HORRIBLE illustration of the effects of superstition is afforded by a case of murder in the Coimbatore District:

"Kalsinapen is said to have discovered hidden treasure two years ago, and he had the reputation in his village of a treasure-finder, and traded upon this by giving up work and supporting himself by borrowing money from the villagers, promising to repay them out of treasure he had found or might find. After some time the villagers got tired of waiting, and refused further loans. He had therefore to cast about for some means to make a real discovery. At last he took his female child, aged three years, to a garden in which there was an idol of Mooneswamy, and there sacrificed the child to appease the deity and enable him to recover the treasure he had found and lost, or to find other treasure. The body was found in front of the idol with the throat cut. The prisoner admitted killing the child, but pleaded temporary insanity."

That plea was, of course, his counsel's, rather than his own. The District Judge sentenced the misguided man to death and the High Court has confirmed the sentence. The justice of the conviction may be disputed, but the expediency of the sentence is above cavil.

THE Bengal High Court is evidently unwilling that there should be an English decision on their judgment in the reference in Empress vs. Nilmadhub Mitter. Accordingly, Mr. Justice Wilson made the following order on Monday:

"In the case of the Empress against Nilmadhub Mitter, who was convicted of murder, and sentenced to transportation for life, Mr.

Woodroffe moved on petition for a certificate, under section 41 of the Letters Patent or Charter, that this case was a fit one for appeal to the Privy Council. I have fully considered the matter, and consulted the other Judges before whom the question of law I reserved was argued and decided, and I think it clear that I must refuse the application. The principles upon which the Courts could act upon such matters were fully considered by the Bombay High Court in the case of Queen-Empress vs. Pestonjee Dinshaw, reported in 10 Bombay High Court Reports, p. 75. I fully accept the explanation of law given in that case by Chief Justice Westropp in his judgment, and I think, accepting this, I should be going quite outside, and far beyond, any of the authorities in any of the High Courts in this country, or the decisions of Her Majesty in Council, if I were to make the order now asked for. The application is therefore refused."

Fit ending of the farce of judicial imbecility which the High Court has played in this ill-starred parricide's case!

THE Indian Political is always himself, whether a civilian or a military officer. The Ethiopian does not change his colour nor the leopard its spots. No more does the Indian diplomat drop his Indian characteristics by removal ever so far from the geographical limits of India. What else can we say in face of the information supplied by a correspondent to our contemporary of the Rass Gofstar about the doings of the new British Consul at Zanzibar, Colonel Euan Smith?

"Our correspondent relates in detail how the gallant Colonel has shown that he is ambitious of exacting signs of respect from British subjects within his jurisdiction. Among the instances quoted in proof of this assertion we are told that the Consul recently ordered two Khoja merchants whom he saw passing by without saluting him, to call at his house the next day. Accordingly, these gentlemen waited upon the gallant Colonel, when he wished them to explain why they had neglected to salaam him. They said they would have done so with pleasure; but that he being new to Zanzibar, they did not recognise him. Colonel Euan thereupon ordered them to call upon him once daily for the space of a month, by which time, he is reported to have said, they would be able to know who he was. This is given as one of many other incidents of the kind."

TWO of the attorneys of our High Court have been removed by death—Baboo Brojonath Mitter and Mr. John Hart. The first was better known as Brojo master, having started life as a schoolmaster in the brilliant but short-lived national college inaugurated by the Wellington Square Dutt, in which he was a favourite of the late Captain D. L. Richardson. Like so many of our successful men, he abandoned schoolmastering for law. Passing as an attorney, he did not wait for the tardy influx of business in the great Calcutta Court, but sought opportunities for pleading in the country courts, in which he did well. The other came out to this country some thirty years back, and for the whole period of his Indian life made Calcutta his home. He was ready enough to undertake his share of public duties, and had been for a term an active Municipal Commissioner.

THE Health Officer has disclaimed any intention to offend the native Commissioners by his allusion to "African village" in describing the black town, and they are friends again.

THE heat has been excessive this week. The closeness of the atmosphere adds to our suffering by day and makes the night absolutely sleepless. Besides, we have a foretaste of the weather in Upper India—the burning loo.

THE difference between solar and lunar chronology led this week to a conflict between Oriental usage and the institutions of the British Indian Medes. In the Gazetted List of Holidays, the 12th and 13th June 1888 are assigned to the Mahomedan Eed-ul-Fatr. But the Oriental chronology of Fasts and Festivals is lunar, and the first appearance of the moon constitutes the Eed and is the signal for the religious observances of the occasion. It was expected this year that the moon would appear on Monday the 11th, and the Mahomedans on that ground demanded a holiday on that day. In the accommodating spirit of compromise which now prevails, the High and subordinate Courts were closed for the Mahomedans on Monday. The Mahomedan officers were excused non-attendance and Mahomedan cases were not taken up that day. The Chief Justice, availing himself of the two following days being General Holidays, and the Dussehera vacation falling on Tuesday the 19th, left Calcutta on Friday last week for Darjeeling and returns to town and duty on Wednesday next. Following the Chief Justice, the Chief Clerk left for the hills last Saturday, without formal leave.

THE House of Commons have voted £2,500,000 for defence of the coaling stations.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE French are truly to be pitied. Just now at any rate their prospect is most gloomy. It is the same at Home as abroad—there is a singular dearth of the right men for the right places. Everywhere the unhappy spectacle is presented of a lot of commonplace adventurers engaged in petty squabbles for place and pelf and the gratification of vulgar vanities and personal jealousies. While a military malcontent is ready to plunge his country in revolution and ruinous war, the Colonies must be necessarily weak to a degree. In India they are copying the bad manners of the officials in the mother-country with a vengeance. It might be hazardous, but then the French are no power in India within the Ganges. Let them thank their British allies for the protection of their bits of possessions!

PONDICHERY has for the moment brought itself into prominence. M. Legay, the Directeur, assaulted Councillor Duchamp and was in return knocked down by Duchamp's son. There was a complaint for assault against the Directeur, which the Procureur-General refused to receive for want of evidence. M. Legay also proceeded against the Duchamps for insult and threatening language. The result was that Legay was fined one franc and an additional one for damages, while M. Duchamp was mulct in the sum of 200 frs. and the son in 50 frs.

THE Procureur-General himself had been under displeasure. Under orders of the acting Governor, he had directed the Court of Appeal to proceed against the proprietor of Le Progress for charging the Governor and other officials with official misconduct. A special Court and jury were ordered, and M. Sinnapouille de Condingay charged with criminal defamation. He made short work of it, however, by production of documentary evidence in support of his accusations. The case was abandoned on behalf of Government, and the Procureur-General was allowed to withdraw the case. The Governor then suspended the Procureur-General and ordered him to proceed to France at once and report himself to the Minister for the Colonies. A new Procureur was sworn in, but immediately after, a telegram was received from "Home" reinstating the late Procureur.

AT Imperial Vienna, Julia Metz, the accomplice of Castelman and Von Scheuver in the recent insurance frauds, has, after a patient trial, been sentenced to four years' penal servitude, and the money, £13,789, found in her possession, has been restored to the victimised insurance companies.

AT Gatchina, in an education institute for orphans, the students vented their dissatisfaction for their new director, General Zeeben, by assault and battery on the General. They are suspected of Nihilism, and the matter has been taken up by the Police.

CIVILIZATION has lately been illustrated at its Capital by a remarkable duel between the representatives of Art and Culture:—

"The principals were M. M. Felix Dupins, the artist, and Habert the art critic. The cause of the duel was an article signed by M. Habert which appeared in the Journal du XVIII^e rue Abondissement, and gave offence to M. Dupins. M. Dupins accordingly sent his seconds, to demand a retraction. This was refused, and a meeting was arranged for the next morning. The weapons used were the pistol; at the second discharge M. Dupins received the ball in the intestines. Death was instantaneous. In the afternoon, by order of the Procureur of the Republic, M. Habert and the four seconds were arrested, but set at liberty a few days later. The deceased gentleman, who was 55 years of age, leaves a wife and family."

THE frivolity of the French is proverbial. But their blasphemy is no less striking, specially for a people still for the most part Catholic. They are now building in Paris what they irreverently call the Tower of Babel—a huge iron structure lifting up its head to the skies. It will be the speciality of the coming Exhibition.

ANOTHER colossus of scientific industry is a huge ship for sailing in the air which the French aeronaut, M. Jovis, is making, at a cost of more than a lac of Rupees, (£8000) for a scientific voyage across the Atlantic from New York to Europe. This monster balloon will measure 25,000 metres and weigh 4500 pounds avordupois and carry, with rigging apparatus and a crew of five, about the same weight.

WE publish elsewhere the judgment of Mr. Justice Trevelyan in the Jain Case. The judgment cannot be satisfactory as settling the question of widow's succession, in preference to the son's. It has been appealed against. Suruj Kumari Bibi has been unfortunate in her quest of justice, at least a regular hearing of the point of law raised by her. She tried in other ways to establish her claim in the High Court, but she has not advanced her right a step. We propose shortly to give full particulars of the litigation in which she has involved herself.

THE Pioneer informs the public that the "Government of India will not interfere in any way with the Calcutta Municipal Bill, as they have quite accepted the principles embodied in that measure, which they carefully watched from its inception to passing." But what about the Statute difficulty raised? There may be nothing in it, after all, but then the High Court has shown itself full of promises, and the native population is just in the mood for engaging Mr. Woodroffe! He will, if duly paid, any day drive a four-in-hand through any Act or Regulation, Code or Parliamentary Statute, or any law, adjective, substantive, verbal, adverbial, participial, prepositional, or interjectional, with a dilettante bench admiring.

THE Americans always told Mathew Arnold that what they valued was news and this their papers gave them, until the Apostle of Light and Sweetness lost all patience and his latter quality, and made reply—"Yes, news for the servants' hall." Just so! All sorts of gup and gossip, the indifferent and bad predominating—the most impudent travellers' stories—fabulous discoveries mendacious narratives of moving accidents by flood and field and exploits of impossible heroism—accounts of Creatures that Adam never knew—staggering marvels of every description—are among the everyday sensations of American journalism.

The following looks like the concoction of a crack Yankee contributor of the "latest marvels," though there is no inherent improbability in the account:—

"A remarkable weather-wise plant is now said to be at the Jubilee Flower Show in Vienna. The proprietor of the plant says it belongs to the family of the sensitive plants, but is so extremely meteorometric that it not only moves if touched, but will close its leaves forty-eight hours in advance of any change in weather. It also foretells rain and wind, storms and 'set fair,' earthquakes and other subterranean movements, and is to be sold for £6."

And very cheap, we should think, for the price—in India at any rate. If Sir Charles Elliott's Commission had known of it, they would surely have recommended the purchase to the Government of India by way of a substitute for the Metereological Department. A number of these wise plants might be maintained at our ports and chief towns, with hardly any expense and to greater profit than the human weather cocks—we mean the state servants—who are so profusely weather-wise—after the event.

It is never too late to learn, and we congratulate Europe on having lately made two important discoveries, namely, that milk should be boiled before taking, and that it is better to boil drinking water. And now they have found out at last that the poison conveyed by human teeth is one of the most annoying that they have to deal with. A medical man writes to the Medical Register :—

"I have under my attention severe and most complicated cases of blood poisoning in which the patient had but slightly abraded the hand in the course of a fight by striking the knuckles against the teeth of his opponent. I have known hands thus poisoned only saved from amputation by the application of all the resources of science."

Of course any Hindu or Mussulman old housewife might any day have taught your men of science and research of the West, all these ruths. Some day they will yet learn that the bite of tigers is particularly poisonous. We can imagine the blank astonishment with which Professor Wood-Mason of the Museum—the leading naturalist in India—will receive this announcement. But wide and minute as is his knowledge of the beasts of the fields and fowls of the air, and even the infinite forms of life in water down to the depths and bottom of the deep sea—which he has lately been dredging—there are more things in Heaven and Earth than are dreamt of in his philosophy.

By way of contrast to the case, mentioned in our last, of the modest Canadian girl who sued the wretch who presumed to kiss her, we present to our readers an American Amazon who righted her own wrong:—

"A great sensation has been caused in Corrolton, Ohio, by the public whipping of Charles Butler by Miss Jennie Fisher. Butler is the son of a prominent business man, and has persistently sought the acquaintance of Miss Fisher, who is one of the leading society young ladies of Corrolton. It is said that Miss Fisher repelled the advances of Butler, who sought revenge by standing in his father's store as Miss Fisher was passing, and whistling 'Chippie get your hair cut' and calling her his 'birdie.' He repeated the performance several times and it seems just once too often. One evening Butler was standing in the post-office with about two hundred other persons waiting for the distribution of the evening mail when Miss Fisher entered. Butler was just beginning his roundelay when Miss Fisher drew a whip from beneath her cloak and attacked her persecutor, thrashing him vigorously over the head and shoulders. Butler retreated followed by his assailant who still plied the lash. The crowd hissed Butler and cheered Miss Fisher with remarks such as 'Give it to him,' 'Served him right,' etc. Butler finally escaped and Miss Fisher coolly put away her whip and returned home."

The fellow was undoubtedly served right, but we confess, though admiring her pluck, we do not like the fellee. (We really must be allowed this coin of our own, so handy and pat. Why should not the greatest annexander among languages adopt a term that it distinctly wants?) We may even respect her, but not love. Least of all, of the bluest Brahman blood as we are, with a carte blanche to marry to any extent, could we think of taking such a wife. She cannot be beautiful, and we are afraid she is not amiable. Accidents will occur in the best regulated households, and then she might be dangerous! Besides, quarrels are a condition sine quonon of domestic felicity. But what hope of the ghost of an altercation in a household presided over by such a grey mare? In the presence of such a spouse, domestic disagreement will partake of the nature of Irish reciprocity—all on one side.

WE read—

"The Italian papers are full of gossip about the King of Sweden's visit to Rome. His simplicity took all the courtiers by surprise. King Humbert put four State carriages at his disposal—King Oscar only used them once. His experiences at the Vatican have been in a way unparalleled. He is the first crowned head whom Leo XIII. has received. Papal etiquette lays down that if a King on arriving at Rome does not visit the Vatican before the Quirinal he will not be received by the Holy Father. The rule is relaxed in the case of Protestants; but if the King of Sweden had come to the Vatican in one of King Humbert's State carriages, his reception might have been quite different. As it was it has furnished a new precedent; not so much for the reception by the Pope as by his guest. The King of Sweden kissed the Pontiff on both cheeks. Such a salute was quite irregular. Long usage had established the fashion of merely kissing the hand. In the case of Pio Nono it was broken by the President of the United States. General Grant merely shook hands with the Pope, and said, 'How do you do, Sir?'"

Etiquette is of course only for the weak or the accommodating. Republican hauteur will none of it. Grant in particular was a sulky man—an American Louis Napoleon without French polish. We should not have been surprised if he had substituted "old man" for "Sir." But what did our old world Scandinavian prince mean by going to the other extreme—the gush of imprinting kisses on both cheeks of His Holiness the Vicegerent of Christ on earth?

ENGLAND has just lost her greatest wit—in the old sense—in Mathew Arnold. The ruling passion strong in death, his very last will is a fine example of wit, whose soul is brevity. The testament is terse as an epigram, to wit—"I leave everything of which I die possessed to my wife, Frances Lucy Arnold." The will, which is dated July 21, 1862, has been proved, and letters of administration granted to Mrs. Arnold. The personality was certainly not too bloated for a modern poet, being sworn at £1,040-17-9.

ONE Michell Carroll, aged 40, a workingman at Sydney, New South Wales, has surrendered himself for a crime committed by him in England seventeen years ago. He has given a circumstantial account of how he there struck Jane Maria Clousien, a girl of 19, with a plasterer's hammer from the effects of which she ultimately died, with recovering consciousness enough to describe her murderous assailant. Of course, the murderer was never discovered. But now, at the end of the Earth, after the lapse of an age, he comes of his own accord to give himself up to that justice he has so successfully evaded so long. The moral is striking. Murder will be out, and Crime is its own exceeding great chastisement. Wrong-doing works out its own punishment. To have killed a fellow creature in cold blood, works like madness in the brain. What a purgatory must have this man passed through these seventeen years! He could not stand it any longer. Life is the greatest possible torture for him. He seeks to be free by accepting the quietus of punitive law.

WE present the following to the friends of Moulvi Deen Mohammad in the press :—

"No. 457.

From the Officiating Junior Secretary to the Government of Bengal. To Moulvi Deen Mohammad.

Dated Fort William the 6th April 1866.

SIR,--In reply to your letter dated the 27th ultimo, I am directed to say that after what has occurred, the Lieutenant-Governor is unable to hold to you any hopes of re-employment as a Deputy Collector and Deputy Magistrate at any future time. It, however, was not intended to prevent your employment in any other Department the head of which may wish for your services on a full knowledge of the circumstances which led to your removal from the Subordinate Executive Service of Government.

I have the honor to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

(Sd.) J. GEOGHEGHAN,

Offg. Junior Secretary to the Government of Bengal."

MR. T. M. KIRKWOOD, of Chittagong fame, has added another feather to his cap. The present is in connection with a theft case which he had to try as Judge of Patna. A girl named Boodhia, aged 12, caste Gwalin, resident at Mouzah Purana, Dinapore, a labourer, charged one Gurucharan Dusadh with theft of a batlohi and a loti from her house in her absence. A constable and two neighbours arrested the accused with the articles. The Jury ultimately returned a unanimous verdict of not guilty, without propounding or endorsing any theory of what really happened. The Judge suspected that the constable "having spotted the accused as an old offender, arrested him and then set to work to get up a case against him, which he did with the assistance of the complainant who may possibly be in his keeping." To substantiate that theory in pursuit of justice, the girl was asked whether she had at any time known any man. The girl gave a positive denial. The Judge apparently to satisfy his stupid conscience that he was not unnecessarily prejudiced against her, and possibly to test her veracity, inflicted on her—a mere complainant—the deep and lasting humiliation of a medical examination. As if to emphasise the outrage, a Mahomedan, Assistant Surgeon Akbar Khan, was told off for that duty—if duty that can be called which has no justification in law or common sense. The examination was made, the girl could not but submit to it. The result was that Akbar Khan was not sure she ever had sexual intercourse. The girl has since been excasted by a Punchayet. But Punchayet or no Punchayet, she is certainly degraded for the rest of her natural life, scarcely begun. The Judge still holds his place, of course, and may expect to be ere long translated to a more agreeable situation. He had well laid the foundations of a solid reputation in Chittagong; he was removed to a better climate, and now he has consolidated his fame at the capital of Behar. His way to the High Court is clear. What though the people burn with shame and indignation, the Kirkwoods, Posfords, Larminies, Beameses, Moseleys, and Taylors, are masters of the situation. The Empire is for its Covenanted Civil Service.

JOSE DE SOUZA, in the columns of the Eastern Herald, whimpers in four stanzas about "My Eurasian Girl." People in love do not usually hiff and coo in the public thoroughfare, yet Jose as a lover is singularly wise—in his generation. He does not love beneath him, nor above. Let him, by all means, stick to his Eurasian Girl. Nothing like equality in affection. There will be no bitterness or harm of any kind if the love matures into marriage. His poetry is indeed very creditable. If it will not Take the prisoned soul

And lap it in Elysium.....

it is probably equal to seize the trembling soul of a Souza or a Silva, and tenderly lap it on the breast of "my Eurasian Girl." The sentiment has of course the usual exaggeration of love-lorn bard, be he Eurasian or Briton or Baboo. Perhaps, Jose would have better confided the following stanza to his inamorata's ear or confined it to her private album:—

They may talk of your English beauties so fair,

With azure blue eyes, and hair,

Skin white as marble, and flaxen curl,

They cannot eclipse my Eurasian girl.

We should like to have Jose's English acquaintances' opinion of that. He is quite welcome to sing and dance singing—

When I think of my angel, I'm all in a whirl,

For I'm the slave of my Eurasian girl.

Just so! He is literally true, too, when he says of his girl, "Brown is her skin," and he may be believed when he protests that it is "like soft velvet so fine." But to declare

She is a beauty, with a heart that's sincere, and that

"In her every virtue and grace combine," strikes many people as bathos, we are afraid.

RECENT HISTORY OF CENTRAL INDIA.

AN ILLUSTRATION OF IMPERIAL GOOD FAITH.

THE last three years were an eventful period in the contemporary humdrum history of Native Central India. During those years, the Local British Government of the extensive territory continued in the strong hands of Sir Lepel Griffin, a Civilian of great capacity, who had long distinguished himself in the Punjab Secretariat, and had done good service in difficult political charges and delicate negotiations. But great changes occurred in the personnel of many of the Native Jurisdictions within the territorial limits of that eminent knight's sway. The two greatest Native Sovereigns of Central India—greatest for character and prestige as for the extent, resources, status, historic interest, and general importance of their states—in the middle of June, 1886, died, as if by mutual agreement, within three days of each other. In another state, only second in importance, headed—as by a law of Nature though probably Art has as much to do with the phenomenon, —by a female sovereign, the male ruler de facto having, by a long course of abuse and villainy, compromised himself, was removed by the determined pressure of the British Government. These events necessarily caused changes, which special circumstances made more extensive than they, ordinarily or otherwise, need have been. Similar events and incidents have occurred in other parts with similar results. In such a wide tract, broken into so many principalities, there must, in almost any given year, be room for such successions and dispositions. They were particularly notable during the last two years, and particularly fruitful. Nature and Chance gave the Political Agency some fine opportunities, and they were utilised to the utmost.

Besides the deaths of the late Maharajas Holkar and Sindhia, in the middle of 1886, the old Raja of Kothi, in Baghelkund, expired and was succeeded by his eldest son, while the Chief of the petty state of Gaurihar, in the neighbourhood of the British cantonment of Nowgong died, leaving no heir.

Independent of death, the chief political events of the period were the restoration, by our Government, of the Fort of Gwalior to the Maharaja Sindhia, and abandonment of the British cantonment of Morar, the disgrace of the Nawab Consort of Bhopal, the withdrawal of high criminal powers from the Maharaja of Bijawar, the appointment of a successor to the chiefship of Gaurihar, and, we may add, the exhuming of the Gwalior secret treasure and its transfer to the British treasury as a loan. As, at one time, doubts were freely expressed whether the heir of the late ruler of Indore would be allowed to succeed to his father's powers, although he might be recognised as the reigning Holkar, the investiture of Maharaja Sivaji, too, may be reckoned a welcome event of great significance. It shows in a favourable light the temper of our present ruling authorities. A more crucial test of temper is afforded by the Gaurihar succession. It is not easy, in these days, with repeated disavowals of the policy of Annexation staring you in the face, and with members of Parliament hungering for distinction, to swallow and "digest" big game in the shape of a large wellknown and rich kingdom. But the absorption of an obscure and insignificant bit of a jaghir like Gaurihar, of which few even in Central India have ever heard, would scarcely attract notice. It is true that the Chief of Gaurihar obtained from Lord Canning that charter of safety of the Native States, the adoption sanad. But the terms of that sanad do not make for the maintenance of the chiefship in every variety of circumstances, under all possible contingencies. That instrument simply repeats to the Jaghirdar of Gaurihar, in March 1862, the assurance given orally by the Viceroy in person to the assembled Princes and Chiefs at the Grand Durbar at Cawnpore in December 1859, that, "on failure of direct heirs, the British Government will permit and confirm any adoption of a successor, made by yourself or any future Chief of your State, that may be in accordance with the ancient custom of your family." But here the elementary conditions were wanting. As the fates would have it, there was not only no issue of the body, but no legal son of any kind. There was failure of adoption over and above failure of direct heirs, failure of art as well as Nature. Such a double failure is irremediable. It is a hopeless case of Lapse, and there is nothing left under the circumstances but for the doomed state to be absorbed in the vast sea of the immediate possessions of Her Britannic Majesty in India. But the Paramount Power has ceased to be covetous of the lands of its dependents. Its mercy steps in to make up deficiency when their rights fail. It interprets its obligations in a liberal spirit. In fact, as in matters of graver import, the spirit saves where the letter kills. It was certainly on reliance on this spirit of British liberality, that the late Chief of Gau-

Holloway's Pills.—The ills of life are increased tenfold by the mode of life so many have to lead; most especially is this the case amongst the toilers in our factories and huge workshops of the manufacturing districts whose digestions become impaired and nervous systems debilitated by the protracted confinement and forced deprivation of healthy out-of-door exercise. The factory workers may almost be said to have diseases of their own, readily amenable, however, to treatment if not allowed to proceed unchecked. Holloway's Pills are the most effectual remedy ever discovered for the cure of liver and stomach complaints, as they act surely but gently, regulating the secretions without weakening the nerves or interfering with the daily work.

rihar did not care to adopt. Rao Gajadhar Pershad did not die suddenly, but had been lingering for a considerable time before he, at length, succumbed on the 2nd March 1887. He had had ample notice of the event, and abundant leisure for appointing a successor. He did not take heed nor utilised his opportunity. One may well wonder. There was a two-fold reason of the greatest possible weight for making provision. It was not only necessary to give the state a successor, but also to leave a legal son to perform those services after his death so essential to the salvation of his soul. Yet he did not adopt. We can only guess at the cause of such a neglect. As a young man—he was only 33 when he died—he hoped to recover and have a son of his own blood. Adoption is but the dernier resort of the effete and old. As for succession to the gadi, he probably never feared that the great Power that protected him and had protected his family for several generations, would covet his little jaghir: he had seen that larger principalities had been spared. He was right. Like many of his rough and simple brother chiefs of Central India and Rajwara, he may have laid scant store by the subtle theory of the Rishis, of vicarious sacrifice to the manes by constructive sons. His friends too were equally sure of British generosity and did not vex him in his last days to appoint a successor. Their confidence has been justified. The Viceroy has found them a Chief by selection in the family. The policy and practice of Government are so often misrepresented on no reason or on insufficient appearances, that it is a pleasure to us to dwell on an illustration which has attracted no notice.

The other events will be noticed at leisure, hereafter.

THE RETURN TO THE FOLD :

OR

HINDU SOCIAL DISCIPLINE.

EXPERIENCE keeps a dear school, but fools will learn in no other, and scarce in that. Another stray sheep that has, for the last few months, been casting a longing, lingering look behind, has, at last, made up its mind to re-enter the fold—the recent abortive attempt at re-suscitating a socially dead Barendra—Dr. B. L. Bhaduri of this town, notwithstanding. It is a fine sheep, rich in wool and gram-fed meat, and offers a fine subject for rehabilitation, after the usual shearing. Following the example of a neighbour of ours and sala of Mr. Bonnerjee's the Barrister, a well-known county pleader and a Roy Bahadoor into the bargain, had paid a clandestine visit to Europe. But astute as lawyers ever are, there is a deficiency of honour in this Iron Age. On the contrary, the spirit of mischief is abroad, and worthy Baboo Sib Chunder Banerjee was betrayed by a sneaking signaller in the person of an unworthy Brahmo. The secret out, Hindu society proved a disturbed hornets' nest to the successful pleader. Neither his ingenuity, bred of practice of the lower courts, nor his Rai Bahadooree diplomacy, availed Baboo Banerjee. He had to pay the price of rashness that he had been evading, and pay he did dearly for his whistle. That flying trip to England, which he could hardly enjoy under the constant anxiety of suspicion at home or of discovery by fellow-Indians abroad, and which was of too short a duration for any useful result to himself, was the direful spring of woes unnumbered. His return was the signal for the enemy to prepare for war. For sometime he saved himself by Fabian strategy and a policy of masterly inactivity. But it was only staving off the evil day. At length he had to take a distinct step as member of Hindu society. As such, he could not postpone his daughter's marriage indefinitely. That was the opportunity for the beggars and cut-throats who abound in our midst. The cormorant, whose son had the luck to be engaged to an educated and well-to-do pleader's accomplished daughter, not content with fleecing Baboo Sib Chunder to the tune of some Rs. 14,000 before allowing the celebration of the wedding, followed up the phlebotomy with the meaner persecution of his own daughter-in-law as well as her family, by detaining her at his house, a prisoner as it were. She had to be heavily ransomed for liberty to visit her own parents. A blackmail of Rs. 2,500 was levied for two occasions on which she went to her father's house. But this was only one out of a thousand distractions and insults and losses to which the discovery of his visit to Europe subjected poor Baboo Sib Chunder. The social storm—in a teapot, as it proved after all, but none the less trying to its victim on that account while it lasted—which was raised at Bhowanipore, we duly noticed at length at the time. But though the immediate difficulty was tided over, he still remained under a ban, and was reminded at every step of his unfortunate position. No wonder that, under the incessant and unusual strain, his health broke down—the health (most pitiful to think) of his mind in particular. His reason gave away. By dint of will, as soon as unmistakable symptoms became manifest, he came down to Calcutta and placed himself under proper treatment. Thank God, he is all right now.

All right, did we say? Alas! that in his circumstances was out of the question almost. If he managed to escape total wreck on one coast, the dark scowling rock on the other stared him full in the face. His recovery was perfect, but his relief was partial. Slender could be his comfort while he lay under the evil eye of his own proper society. He regained the integrity of his mind, only to be reminded of unhappiness that had driven him mad. That had not been determined, however. His disease only was cured, but its cause was not removed. Like a wise man he set himself to cut the root of all the evil. He would not only not brood over his past wrongs, but he would once for all free himself from the liability of those injuries which had proved so disastrous. He must set himself right with society, whatever the cost. So resolved, he has entered into the matter with his usual zeal and liberality. Now he is in earnest to recover his old position, he cannot be long in succeeding. If the Rai Bahadoor feels his isolation sorely, the Hindu Society—of Bhagalpur at any rate—misses him a good deal. We hope no unnecessary difficulties will be interposed in any quarter. We can have no respect for those who change their principles oftener than their shirt. Still less patience have we with those who make a business of punctiliousness, whose motto indeed is—

We don't believe in principle.

But oh! we do in interest.

It would be a pity if so useful a member of society as Baboo Sib Chunder were allowed to remain ex-casted to the end of the chapter, specially as he has repented and mended his manners and abandoned his cherished Eutopia.

Who by repentance is not satisfied,

Is nor of heaven, nor earth, for these are pleas'd.

By penitence th' Eternal's wrath's appeas'd.

To be sure, re-introduction into society is no joke. Heaven and Earth—hell too shall we add?—will have to be moved. But then Rai Bahadur is equal to the sacrifice. Thanks to the friendly exertions of Baboo Bunkim Chunder Chatterjee, the Pandits of Bhatpara have, by hook or by crook, been pressed into service. By the way, Baboo Bunkim Chunder, who only the year before last, said in the Prachara, that one might be a Gokhaduk—beaf-eater—and yet a Hindu, has, along with his Trans-hooglian hoary-headed neighbour, Baboo Bhudeb Mookerjee, turned over a new leaf and become a Hindu of Hindus, the latter, who is now at Benares, in saccloth and ashes, having resolved upon spending the rest of his life in that holy city, the world forgetting—by the world forgot, living and moving and having his being at the feet of Bhaskara Nanda Swamy, whose chela he has become. For once the poet was wrong when he said,

At thirty, man suspects himself a fool,
Knows it at forty, and reforms his plan.

With the Pandits of Bhatpara at his back, it will not be very difficult for Baboo Sib Chunder to propitiate the gods of Navadwipa. Indeed, a rumour is on the wind that Pandit Madhu Sudan Smritiratna has already assured him that the dons of Navadwip (Nuddea) will not leave a Nuddeate—for such Baboo Sib Chunder is—in the cold shade.

PRE-BRITISH INDIA.

XV.

AKBAR.

It is with much diffidence that one undertakes to sketch, however lightly, the life of Akbar; he was such a many-sided man, resembling in some respects, yet nearly superior in all, the great Napoleon. Akbar was a man with great natural gifts, which were cultivated by him with assiduous industry, till he attained a position far above the men of his time. The great attractive feature in the life-story of Akbar, is to see a man of such transcendent abilities so truly humble, and so full of generous sympathy for his kind. Akbar sat on his throne as a father of his people. Let us search in any clime, the chronicles of the lives of kings, let us read records glossed over by venal partiality, yet rarely will we find a recorded history of a life so truly great, so simply noble. Of Akbar we can say, he was a good man—a tribute of praise of much weight for a man in his position. Akbar seemed entirely free from that failing of little minds, jealousy. The acts and doings of Akbar offer not only a lesson of wisdom for the people, but especially for the rulers of to-day. From every department of the State, during Akbar's governance, Englishmen of to-day, if they can dissociate themselves from their insular prejudices, may reap valuable lessons. There was no red-tape system in Akbar's days, and the empire threw all the better for the want of it. Look at Akbar's excise system? Can the present Abkari system for a moment compare with it? Look at Akbar's revenue system, a system which laid its finger on the evil the rayyets suffer most from? Akbar's legislative acts were no crude emanations. So suitable are they to the habits of the people, and so fully do they meet their needs, that, per force, we are obliged to wonder, that the originator of them could have existed at such a period and in such a country; a country that hitherto had been selfishly torn by faction, each man, with his partisans, seeking the good of the individual or the few, in opposition to the good of the many. The life-story of Akbar shows us the many palpable mistakes the present rulers of India have made, and are repeating; and all of which owe their origin to fatuous prejudice, from a belief that nothing can add to the knowledge already acquired at the feet of professors in Western lands. The theories propounded by these professors are not only deemed unassailable, but likewise suitable to all parts of the world, and to all conditions of life. The governing a vast empire, whose peoples are marked by diversity and are almost, in their lives and thoughts, the opposite of the English people, from a single office, small in comparison, in London, is the natural growth of these prejudices and suppositions. Had India been governed in India, even by Englishmen, the history of the present time would have been vastly different. India owes many and tangible benefits to British rule, which I fully appreciate, and would never dream of closing my eyes to, but what one feels bound to complain about, is, that, by the peculiar—I had almost written absurd—system of governance, many, if not most, of these benefits, are unappreciable, as the expected results are choked; every little or great indulgence to the peoples of India is so hampered by what seem, as it were, after thoughts, that our attention is directed towards these hands until we almost lose sight of the gifts. In Akbar's days, it was not so: the indulgences came to the people at first hand, and the most simple could understand the source and the reason thereof; hence they were always fully appreciated.

Akbar, called the great and the heaven illuminated, the man who raised the rule of his dynasty almost to its pinnacle of glory, was born in adversity, and reared in captivity. Yet, these early misfortunes seem to have left no evil traces, for he was most engaging in his manners, and most humane in his disposition. As regards humanity, he soared far above the men of his time, as he was also above them in his subjection to his reason; he hardly ever allowed passion to obtain a mastery over judgment, though he was often severely tested. This Akbar is the one ruler of Pre-British times, whom we can sincerely commend. In personal appearance, Akbar was a strongly-built handsome man, with unmistakable kingly carriage, and was endowed with great physical strength and activity, showing exuberant courage even in his amusements, as in taming unbroken horses and elephants, and in rash encounters with tigers and other wild beasts. Gifted with such a disposition, to which was coupled a passionate love of glory, he yet founded his hopes of fame at least as much on the wisdom and liberality of his Government, as on its military success. In his youth, he indulged in wine and good living, but early became sober and abstemious. A very small portion of his time was spent in sleep; and he frequently passed whole nights in those philosophical discussions which he loved so much. He took great pleasure in witnessing fights between animals, and in all exercises which required a display of strength and skill; but hunting afforded him most pleasure, especially was this so when he was engaged in destroying tigers, or capturing herds of wild elephants, as these occasions gave scope for the enjoyment of adventure and severe bodily exertion. He once rode from Ajmir to Agra—220 miles—in two days, and made many similar journeys on horseback. He was a famous walker and was known to have walked thirty or forty miles in a day—a marvellous feat for a king, and in an Indian climate. He underwent fatigue merely for the pleasure of the exercise, showing how sound his constitution must have been. Although he was constantly engaged in wars, and although he made greater improvements in civil government than any other king of India, yet, by his talents for the despatch of business, and by a judicious distribution of his time, he always enjoyed abundant leisure for study and amusement.

Official Paper.

SIR LEPEL GRIFFIN'S PROTEST.

From—Sir Lepel Griffin, K.C.S.I., Agent to the Governor-General for Central India,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Foreign Department.

Dated Indore Residency, 28th January 1888.

I have the honour to acknowledge your letter No. 154-I., dated 12th January 1888, in which you convey the decision of the Governor-General in Council on my letter No. 109-P.-579 of 9th November 1887, requesting that the Government will criminally prosecute and adequately punish the Amrita Bazar Patrika and other newspapers, which have, for many months, been publishing false and malicious libels on me, on the Government I serve and represent in Central India, and on Colonel H. E. Ward, the Minister of Bhopal, in connection with the official action which has been taken to purge that State from oppression, and degrade and punish its tyrant.

2. You inform me that the Governor-General in Council, after careful consideration of my representations, have decided that it is neither necessary nor expedient, in the interests of the Government of India, to publish the correspondence relating to Bhopal affairs or to institute a criminal prosecution against the Amrita Bazar Patrika. You are further directed to say that the Governor-General in Council is confident that the policy of the Government needs no vindication against attacks such as those I have brought to its notice; and His Excellency the Viceroy fully agrees with me in thinking that I can personally afford to treat them with indifference.

3. Against this decision of the Governor-General in Council I venture, with the utmost respect, but most energetically, to protest, on grounds of law, of equity and of policy, and I ask the Government, after a consideration of these further observations, to either enforce the law of the land which is violated with impunity, or publicly and officially to express their full confidence in and their approval of my acts in Bhopal.

4. Seeing that the Governor-General in Council has decided that the interests of the Government of India do not make a criminal prosecution either necessary or expedient, I would base my application on more personal grounds, and ask that such steps be taken as may clear my honour from attacks made upon me. I have before said that I care little for hostile criticism, and I readily allow that the abuse of the seditious and bought press of Bengal is the best proof of the rectitude of the person they attack, as their praise is, in the eyes of honest men, the just condemnation of him who deserves it. But there is a limit to the tolerance of criticism; and that limit is passed when, instead of the honest denunciation of a public man and his measures, an official is accused of every form of tyranny, meanness, corruption and oppression, through months and even years, while the Government makes no effort to defend him in the eyes of the world, or to punish his malicious detractors, who are paid for their libels in the same manner as is an assassin for a dagger thrust in the back of an enemy.

5. I would invite the Governor-General in Council for a moment to consider the analogy which Ireland furnishes.

The Government there are exposed to odium and abuse because they have wisely resolved to uphold and enforce the law, recognizing that this is the first duty of a civilized administration, and if it be neglected society relapses into barbarism. Not only do they uphold the existing law, but finding that it is insufficient to meet the circumstances of the case, they have had recourse to special and more drastic legislation. If it be said that the libellous abuse of the Irish Nationalist press is not ordinarily the subject of criminal prosecution, I would reply that the Irish Government has, at present, quite enough on its hands in the suppression of violent crime and open treason, and does not care to be diverted from its direct path by actions for libel. When active treason has been crushed, criminal libels against honourable officials will doubtless receive attention and condign punishment.

6. But what is far more relevant to my argument is that the members of the English Government attacked by the nationalistic press, whether Mr. Gladstone or Sir George Trevelyan or Mr. Balfour, have and freely exercise the right of private defence in the press and on the public platform, while members of the Government to which they belong or which they serve, from the Prime Minister downwards, defend and support them energetically and in the face of the world, in and out of Parliament.

7. If we turn to India a very different spectacle is presented. The only persons to whom full liberty or rather license is allowed are the hired bravoës of the press, and officials whose services entitled them to honour are condemned to a silence which is misunderstood, while exposed defenceless to all ignoble abuse. The Government, when appealed to for protection, declines to enforce its own law, which is daily defied, which it would seem bound by every consideration of right and self-preservation to uphold, and the solemn maintenance of which is the chief reason for the existence of all civilized Governments.

8. I take my stand on the law of the land, and I ask that it may be enforced. A single malicious libel it may be convenient for the Government to ignore or refuse to prosecute, but these of which I write may be counted by hundreds, and I doubt whether a number of the Amrita Bazar Patrika has been issued for months on which criminal proceedings might not be successfully instituted. I annex a few numbers of the papers, not specially selected, and probably far from the worst, but merely because they are the only ones I find at the present time in my office. It is impossible for the Government to feign ignorance of the libels. They are spread broad-cast over India, and form a large part of the selections from Vernacular newspapers which come under the personal observation of the Governor-General in Council. If it be unnecessary and inexpedient to enforce the law of libel, and if paid scoundrels are permitted to attack the honour of high officials at their pleasure, daily, weekly, monthly, let the sections referring to defamation be expunged from the Indian Penal Code. What grosser violation of the law can be instanced; what case, more calling for severe punishment; what more malicious and persistent attacks and more destitute of foundation in truth or fact? If one offence under the Penal Code may be committed with impunity, every criminal may logically demand that the sections which concern his offence and punishment may equally remain a dead letter. The Government of India will undoubtedly concur in the opinion of their distinguished Legal Member Sir Henry Maine, when, in his work on "Popular Government" he observes:—

"If any Government should be tempted to neglect, even for a moment, its function of compelling obedience to law, if a Democracy, for example, were to allow a portion of the multitude of which it consists to set some law at defiance which it happens to dislike, it would be guilty of a crime which hardly any other virtue could redem and which century upon century might fail to repair."

9. I am surely entitled to the protection of the Government if I ask for it. For seven years I have administered Central India as Agent to the Governor-General with the full approval of two Viceroys, and I cannot leave India as is my wish in April, with any cloud upon my official reputation. I have received nothing but praise and confidence from the Indian Government. I can point to the change which has been effected in Central India during my term of office; to the public works which cover the country; to transit dues everywhere swept away; to the development of Rewah; the reorganization of Gwalior; the surrender of the Gwalior fortress to the house of Scindia; the loan of 30 millions sterling by that state to the Government to the great advantage of both; to the clearing of the Augcan State of Bhopal, which is at the same time the best work I have done, and that which has brought upon me the libels of which I complain. With all that I have done in Bhopal the Viceroy has expressed his full concurrence and approval, and your letter of the 10th of January 1887, conveying the special commendation of the Secretary of State said—"His Lordship has been pleased to express his sense of the vigour, judgment and discretion which has been displayed by you in the conduct of this long, difficult and delicate undertaking, now, through your efforts brought to what promises to be a successful termination."

Lastly, I am confident, and the Government too knows it well that in the future, no act or document of mine, through these seven years, will ever be produced which could not be approved by loyal and honorable men. Feeling this, I may be excused if I am unable to accept with equanimity the decision of the Government to do nothing. Their silence is a greater injury to me than any abuse of the press which can only be believed because the Government neither denies nor punishes it.

10. The malice and bad faith of the attacks on the Government policy in Bhopal are found in the notorious fact that they are instigated by the ex-Nawab Siddik Hossein, that many of the libellous journals are in his pay and that the documents which are perverted and misrepresented to support his case are supplied from the private office of the Bhopal Darbar. This I clearly prove in the first annexure to this letter. What interest beyond money has the Bengali Press in Bhopal or Siddik Hossein? They were probably ignorant of its existence until they were paid to denounce the Government by the very man who had been, punished and who had unlimited wealth at his disposal. Why do not the same papers denounce the action of Government in Jhallawar whose young Chief has been deprived of powers or in Tonk where the Political Agents control the Council? For the reason that it has not as in the case of Bhopal been made worth their while to do so.

11. Even at the risk of wearying the Government, I must in a few sentences repeat the well-known Bhopal story.

When I came to Central India in 1881, I found Nawab Siddik Hossein under the grave displeasure of Lord Ripon's Government for treasonable publications, and the Bhopal population crushed under the iniquitous land revenue assessment lately issued, by which the rent was raised from 17 lakhs of rupees to 41 lakhs while the whole difference between the two sums during the five or six years of settlement, was demanded in a lump sum from the people. By strong remonstrance I obtained the remission of these arrears, but the revision of the assessment, now being carefully conducted by Colonel Ward, I had neither authority nor information sufficient to interfere with. Year by year complaints grew more numerous of oppression and misgovernment in every department over all of which Siddik Hossein was virtually supreme; till at length I placed the whole case before the Government of India. I showed clearly the long course of infamy which Siddik Hossein had pursued; his continued and notorious treason in defiance of Lord Ripon's warning; justice turned into a mere engine of corruption and oppression; tenants and farmers alike ruined to fill the pockets of himself and his creatures; districts depopulated; and the police little better than organized dacoits whose plunder was shared in high quarters. The Governor-General in Council after a full consideration of the case, decided that the guilt of the Nawab was clear; he was deprived of his title and salute and forbidden to interfere in public affairs under pain of further punishment, and at the request of Her Highness the Begum an English Minister Colonel H. Ward was appointed, who, with infinite patience, tact and courage has reformed the administration and purified the Courts and police, though many years must elapse before the population ruined with hopeless arrears of debt can recover from the oppression of the past.

Siddik Hossein has now set himself to avenge his disgrace. He has secretly obstructed all measures of reform and by threats and promise and bribes has retained on his side many of the old officials, mostly Wahabis whom it was not found possible to expel. He has employed much of the State money and his own enormous wealth obtained by the most scandalous means in buying newspapers and paying for abuse of those who have brought about his just punishment, and the impunity which has so far attended this action, has infinitely increased the difficulty of administration in Bhopal, and may ere long, render it impossible. The Minister who has won the entire confidence of the people is the object of attacks as bitter and unfounded as those directed against me, and although the whole population of Bhopal regard us as their saviours from destruction, and loyal and orthodox Mohammedans throughout India thoroughly approve the policy of the Government, and would have gladly seen their enemy and ours removed from the State, it would seem from the language of the Bengali press that Siddik Hossein was an injured and innocent victim, and that we were his unjust persecutors.

12. In conclusion, I would most respectfully invite the Government to consider that its policy of indifference to malicious libels on high officials is misunderstood by the people of India of high or low degree. They either believe that the libels are true or that the Government is afraid to prosecute the Native press which utters them. Whichever be their belief it is equally injurious to the power and prestige of the Imperial Government; more so than the open preaching of sedition. The surest foundation of our power in India is the general and well-founded confidence of the people in the justice, impartiality and honesty of English officials; and if the Government allows this to be undermined and treats this invaluable possession as of small account and a thing unworthy of defence it will lose its chief support in time of danger while it will degrade the quality of its official class, for honorable men will hesitate to serve a Government which refuses to defend their honor.

THE JAIN CASE.

HIGH COURT OF JUDICATURE AT FORT WILLIAM IN BENGAL TESTAMENTARY AND INTESATE JURISDICTION.

Before the Honourable Mr. Justice Trevelyan.

The 28th April 1888,

In the goods of Kaloomul Sett.

In this case an application was made by Labchund Sett, who claims to be the grandson, by adoption, of the deceased, for letters of administration to the estate of the deceased.

A caveat was entered by a lady named Soorrajoomaree Bibec, who is the widow of the natural brother of the deceased.

A person named Puddomchund claims to have been adopted by the lady's husband, and there is not, in the proceeding before the trial of this issue or in this trial, anything showing any admission by the lady of the adoption of Puddomchund. A caveat was filed, and on coming to be argued, it has been contended that in consequence of Puddomchund being the heir of the deceased, Soorrajoomaree is not entitled to oppose the grant of letters of administration to Labchund.

I directed an issue to be tried in these words: Has the caveatrix Soorrajoomaree Bibec any and what interest in the estate of the testator Kaloomul Sett deceased, and is she entitled to contest the right of Labchund Sett to obtain letters of administration de bonis non with the will annexed to the estate and effects of the testator? It has been throughout the contention of the lady that, even if Puddomchund be the legally adopted son, she is, under the laws, usages and customs of the Oswal caste of the Sectumburry Sect of the Jains, the heir of her husband's brother. I ought to have pointed out that Kaloomul Sett left a widow and, although the caveatrix's husband survived the deceased, he predeceased the widow of the deceased.

During the course of this trial, in consequence of an objection taken to some evidence, I found it necessary to express my opinion of what I thought was the meaning of an issue of the description, and I am bound to say that, on a more careful consideration, I am more fully impressed with the view I then took. As I understand a proceeding of this kind, and if I understand sec. 23 of the Probate and Administration Act which governs this case, I must grant administration to the next of kin of the deceased. Primarily, the next of kin are entitled to letters of administration, and, as I understand this issue, it is not only an issue as to whether she has any interest, but I have also to decide whether she is entitled to contest the right of Labchund Sett to letters of administration. As far as I know, no person is entitled to contest a claim to letters of administration, unless he has a prior right, and if this lady is not next of kin, it follows she is not entitled to contest the application. The question whether she is next of kin, depends upon whether she or Puddomchund is entitled to succeed to the estate of the deceased. The question of Labchund's adoption has not been gone into here and has been postponed to the decision of the case. The lady admits nothing, and the adoption is disputed. It was contended in the course of the trial, that I could not go into any evidence as to Puddomchund's adoption, and it was said that, independent of that, the lady has a right to the estate. It seems to me, if Puddomchund is the heir of the deceased, this lady can have no interest in the estate, and therefore would not be entitled to contest the right of Labchund. The case therefore reduces itself to two questions:

First, Was Puddomchund the legally adopted son of the husband of the caveatrix and, secondly, assuming that is so, is the caveatrix the next of kin of the deceased? As to Puddomchund's adoption, it is said that I ought not to prejudice her rights by a decision in this proceeding, but the lady has chosen to embark in this litigation, and I am bound to decide this question for the purposes of this case. Evidence has been given out of the mouth of the lady's own witness, her brother, as to the adoption. It is proved that an arrangement was come to with the natural father by the lady's husband to take Puddomchund into adoption. The factum of the adoption has been proved, and I must, for the purposes of this issue, hold that Puddomchund is the adopted son of the husband of the caveatrix. Now comes the real question as to which there was the greater contest,

Viz., Whether, assuming Puddomchund to be the adopted son, this lady is heir of the deceased. There is no question that, under ordinary Hindoo law, Puddomchund was entitled to succeed in preference to her. There is no dispute as to that. There is also no dispute on the cases that as to Jains, unless it be proved that there was some special law, usage or custom applying to the particular case, that the ordinary Hindu law must prevail. The result is that the lady must satisfy me that, under the law or some particular custom of the Sect she belongs to, the ordinary law is excluded and she takes before the adopted son.

That is the real question. It seems to me I must examine the evidence given before me. The onus is on the lady. She has given the evidence of four Pundits, persons professing to be versed in the laws and usages of the Jains. She has also put forward what is claimed to be evidence of the practice in cases of this kind. On the other hand, it is contended that the ordinary Hindoo law prevails, and the applicant has placed before me evidence showing that the Jains have followed the ordinary Hindoo law. The Pundits who have been called, I may assume, are men of learning. They have produced before me law works of the community. I am bound to say, without expressing any opinion of my own, that the works they produced, though said to be works of extreme antiquity, are capable of manufacture and are all (with one exception in which the binding was peculiar and easily altered) simply loose leaves, and there would be no practical difficulty in substituting a new leaf for an old one. In one case, the only leaf having any application to the case has disappeared and a copy has been made and put in its place. That may be an accident and in fact is a likely one, and so far as I can see there is nothing to shew they are other than genuine, although as I said before they are capable of being altered to any extent. I have been furnished with translation of certain texts. These are to be verified by affidavit, but I may assume the translation as accurate. The first of these texts is curious. The translation given to me is as follows:—

"The wife and the son, brother's son and a supinda, and (then) the daughter's son, (next) the son of a bundhu or of the same Gotra, becomes the alternate owner of the wealth (73)." If that is the true translation, it is curious, for the brother is excluded, and even if the gloss given by the Pundits is correct that by naming of brother his wife and son are included, that gloss does not apply here, as the brother is not mentioned and his son is mentioned. The second text has nothing to do with the case. But as far as I understand the texts, they say that when a man dies, in the first place the wife succeeds to his property, then the son, then his brother, then it goes on to the other relations. It is true that this particular case is not provided for in the texts, but the Pundits and men of learning who are not deterred by the difficulty, construe the texts as meaning the wife and descendants of the brother to be in the same order as the wife and son of the depositor. That is to say, that in absence of wife or son, the brother comes, and the term brother includes brother's wife and brother's son. That is the way they put it. But there is no text which says so.

The original Jain lawgivers do not contemplate the case, and only subsequent legal authorities have met the case by applying this construction to the earlier texts. There has been no instance given in which it has been proved by legal evidence. I don't know that one has even been suggested, that a succession of this description has ever taken place.

The Pundits know of no instance apparently. As matters stand at present, I will assume that these laws are as the Pundits explain them, assuming they do bear this gloss, and in matters of this kind it is safer to depend on the legal knowledge of persons who have been brought up in the laws. Then comes the broader question, Does a wife succeed her husband in preference to a son, and if the Pundits are right, that is the question really arising. As to that question there is no doubt, that the books produced shew that the law books of the Jains contemplate the succession in that way. I doubt whether the mere production of a law book is sufficient, but at any rate there has been no real attempt. I use the word real because a ridiculous attempt was made by the applicant to use a book which was nothing more than a mere novel. I say there has been no real attempt to produce a book in which the law has been given in a different way, so that I think I must hold there can be no doubt that the law is laid down in this way. Now I think I ought to ascertain the practice which is followed. In a body of persons like the Jains, it is much more important and useful to act on practice than on the production of books. Supposing it has been the custom to follow the Hindu law, no amount of law books would alter the law. I think the caveatrix has failed to prove that in practice a wife succeeds to her husband's estate instead of the son. A number of cases are mentioned by the Pundits and the brother where it is said this has taken place. But no fact has been established. The mere statement that a wife succeeded her husband, is of no value. They are mere statements in the bazar and when tested they disappear directly. There is one man called whose evidence might have been of value. It appears that he was a debtor of Dhunsook Doss and that Dhunsook Doss relieved him from his debt. His interest is to support the case of a person who relieves him. But apart from any question of interest, I don't think his evidence assists one very much. We find in the evidence he gives in the previous trial that he says "we have balance sheets. I have not them here. They are in my Koti in Calcutta," and afterwards "I have only one book of account previous to the time of my mother's death. My mother's name did not appear in that book." We find him bringing suits in his own name when, in accordance with his own story, the property is his mother's. His mere statement that the property was his mother's does not amount to anything, and so far as his evidence can be tested, it seems rather to contradict the case which he seeks to support. What the witnesses say is that, among the Jains, the mother is revered and the sons don't act contrary to her advice. Just, as in other countries, the son reveres the mother, but that is a different thing from saying the widow succeeds in preference to the son. The only evidence of ownership which is worth anything at all, is unmistakable evidence of acts. The statement that mother gives directions to the son, is worth nothing. There is no evidence of any conveyance by a mother during the lifetime of a son, no suit brought by a widow in her son's life time, and no books have been produced shewing that a widow has taken the profits of the business. And as far as any tangible evidence is concerned, it is all the other way. We have in Roopchand Setty's case a suit brought by him during the mother's life time in respect to the ancestral properties. As far as I can see, the caveatrix has put forward no real evidence as to any act showing ownership of the estate during her son's lifetime. What is there on the other side? Two persons have been called who speak to having succeeded to their fathers' property in the life time of the mother. First, we have the evidence of Johurlal who said he succeeded his father, and his evidence is supplemented by the fact of his bringing a suit in his own name. It was said that he was interested. But when you come to look into it, you find he has merely been getting his bondies discounted by the firm of Labchand. But there is the fact that he brought this suit and when I find that the suit is brought by the son and there is nothing to show that the mothers do any acts unmistakably shewing ownership, I cannot but say that the sons succeed in preference to the mother, for, if otherwise, the person suing would not be the right party to the suit.

It must also be remembered that the Jains are mostly traders, and succession by the widow would prove impediment in the way of carrying on a business. It is much more likely that they would reject that portion of the Shasters. The other person who succeeded, instead of his mother, is a person against whom nothing can be said. He is a man of some position, the Viceroys Jeweller and a Rai Bahadoor. His evidence is different from the evidence of the witnesses of both parties. What Bodridass says is that he is of the Sreemal caste (but that is the same as the Oswals). His father left two sons and the widow. He said "we all became the maliks. My father left some property, on his death we all became the maliks of the property. By we I mean the persons living in the house at the time." Then he says "I mean that we enjoyed the property. There was no division of the property amongst us." What that means is that they all remained joint, there was no dispute between them just as in the case of any ordinary Hindoo family. They all live together as one family. At any rate, it is absolutely inconsistent with the case of the caveatrix, viz., that the woman succeeds.

As far as his evidence goes, it tends to show that in his case, at any rate, they followed the ordinary rules of Hindoo law. There is a good deal of other evidence as to what had taken place as to other men who have not been called. His evidence it is almost impossible to test. It seems to me that such evidence as is reliable at all shews that the Jains of this country do as other Hindoos, viz., when a man dies, his son succeeds him and the wife only has the right of an ordinary Hindoo widow. That is all I need say as to the evidence. The result is, in the first place, I doubt whether these texts apply, but if they do apply, it seems to me that, looking at the evidence, I must find that the Jains of this part of the country at any rate, do not follow these texts, but on this question of succession they follow the laws, usages and customs of ordinary Hindoos.

It follows that the caveatrix has no interest in the estate of the deceased, and is not entitled to contest the grant of letters of administration to Labchand Sett, and the caveat must be discharged with cost.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

tation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY (Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

SIVA.

"Mors Junua Vita."

I am the God of the sensuous fire
That moulds all Nature in forms divine ;
The symbols of death and of man's desire,
The springs of change in the world, are mine ;
The organs of birth and the circlet of bones,
And the light loves carved on the temple stones.

I am the lord of delights and pain,
Of the pest that killeth, of fruitful joys ;
I rule the currents of heart and vein ;
A touch gives passion, a look destroys ;
In the heat and cold of my lightest breath
Is the might incarnate of Lust and Death.

If a thousand altars stream with blood
Of the victims slain by the chanting priest,
Is a great God lured by the savoury food ?
I reckon not of worship, or songs, or feast ;
But that millions perish, each hour that flies,
Is the mystic sign of my sacrifice.

Ye may plead and pray for the millions born ;
They come like dew on the morning grass ;
Your vows and vigils I hold in scorn,
The soul stays never, the stages pass ;
All life is the play of the power that stirs,
In the dance of my wanton worshippers.

And the strong swift river my shrine below
It runs, like man, its unending course
To the boundless sea from eternal snow ;
Mine is the Fountain—and mine the Force
That spurs all nature to ceaseless strife ;
And my image is Death at the gates of Life.

In many a legend and many a shape,
In the solemn grove and the crowded street,
I am the slayer whom none escape,
I am Death trod under a fair girl's feet ;
I govern the tides of the sentient sea
That ebbs and flows to eternity.

And the sum of the thought and the knowledge of man
Is the secret tale that my emblems tell ;
Do ye seek God's purpose, or trace his plan ?
Ye may read my doom in your parable ;
For the circle of life in its flower and its fall
Is the writing that runs on my temple wall.

O Race that labours, and seeks, and strives,
With thy Faith, thy wisdom, thy hopes and fears,
Where now is the Future of myriad lives ?
Where now is the Creed of a thousand years ?
Far as the Western spirit may range,
It finds but the travail of endless change ;

For the earth is fashioned by countless suns,
And planets wander, and stars are lost,
As the rolling flood of existence runs
From light to shadow, from fire to frost,
Your search is ended, ye hold the keys
Of my inmost ancient mysteries.

Now that your hands have lifted the veil,
And the crowd may know what my symbols mean ;
Will not the faces of men turn pale
At the sentence heard, and the vision seen
Of strife and sleep, of the soul's brief hour,
And the careless tread of unyielding Power ?

Though the world repent of its cruel youth,
And in age grow soft, and its hard law bend,
Ye may spare or slaughter ; by rage or ruth
All forms speed on to the far still end ;
For the gods who have mercy, who save or bless,
Are the visions of man in his hopelessness.

Let my temples fall, they are dark with age,
Let my idols break, they have stood their day ;
On the deep hewn stones the primeval sage
Has figured the spells that endure alway ;
My presence may vanish from river and grove,
But I rule for ever in Death and Love.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

FOLLOWING the recent debate in the House and Lord Roseberry's scathing exposure of hereditary legislators, Lord Salisbury has introduced a Bill in the House of Lords to facilitate the entry of life peers into the House. It provides an annual life peerage to the number of five at the highest, the total never exceeding fifty. The eligibility of a peer to suspension for misconduct is also aimed at.

THE British Aristocracy is now in a bad way when its most illustrious members complain of it and denounce their fellows. The Douglasses are not a bad lot, being gifted with parts and accomplishments as well as a spirit of humanity. Their activity is great and varied, and they may well claim the courage of their convictions. But they are too Bohemian in their proclivities and, in fine, too freakish. We take the following summary from the Indian Daily News' London Correspondence :—

"Lord James Douglas, who has this week been committed to prison for a fortnight for contempt of Court in writing letters, &c., to Miss Isabel Edith Scott, a ward of the Court of Chancery, writes fairly readable novels. The Douglasses are an eccentric family. The Marquis of Queensberry has been in the Divorce Court, and he made his name conspicuous by rising up in the stalls at the Lyceum Theatre, and protesting against what he conceived to be a slight upon free thought in one of Lord Tennyson's plays. Another brother, Lord Archibald Douglas, conducts a boys' home in the Harrow Road. He belongs to the Church of Rome. Lady Gertrude Douglas, a sister, married a baker some years ago. She has lived with him since contentedly in his shop at Shepherds' Bush. Another sister is Lady Florence Dixie. She first distinguished herself by championing the cause of Cetewayo. Then she 'dreamed a dream' in which Lady Florence, some assassins, and her dog played a mixed and mysterious part. Lord Archibald in a hard-working priest, and the Marquis of Queensberry, as a secularist lecturer and pamphleteer, exhibits the literary taste which appears to run in this eccentric family."

THE Tribune condemns Mr. W. T. Webb's new English Etiquette for Indian Gentlemen, as "a remarkably stupid book." The writer says:—

"Throughout the book runs the assumption that in society it is the Indian who should always conform to English manners and usages, and the European never to Indian manners and usages. In other words, all European manners and usages are good, and an Indian must part with his own if he wants to have the great privilege of mixing with Europeans. A more sensible man would have suggested mutual concession in regard to manners and usages; but Mr. Webb's rules are for Indians only. Mr. Webb would not sanction the brimless cap, he would have the shamla or Mogli pugri. 'If you wear the loose-fitting Indian shoe, to keep it on the foot in the houses of Europeans, is an act of discourtesy towards them.' Such are the injunctions given by Mr. Webb! We are told that 'the display of bare leg is particularly ungraceful.' But does Mr. Webb know that the tight trousers and short coats of European gentlemen and the low jackets of European ladies are an abomination to the Indian eye? Why should bare legs be more objectionable than bare arms and bosoms? The last certainly is more objectionable."

THE Yankees threaten to "dish" Mr. Chamberlain and his late Treaty and "sell" the Canadians, by a scientific "dodge." There seems no end to the potentialities of electricity, and their savants have discovered that fishes are attracted by electric light. So they propose by that means to decoy from Canadian territory the fishes in the great boundary Lakes, without payment. They only forget that scientific sharp practice is a game that may be played by both sides.

THE following is indeed a triumph of science:—

"Dr. Fleischl, Professor of Physiology in the Vienna University, had been suffering acute pain for a considerable time from a poisoned nerve. At length Dr. Gersuny, a young surgeon in the University, took him in hand, and attached, in what way we are not precisely told, the corresponding nerve of a rabbit to the diseased nerve, with the result that the Professor has been completely cured. In merest gratitude Professor Pasteur should drop his scheme for poisoning the rodent race."

That remark is at once the very humanity of wit and the wit of humanity.

THE following girl under-graduates having passed the Calcutta University Entrance Examination, as follows, 1st Division—Mary Camell, Soralata Chatterjee, Amy Stephens, and Indira Tagore, Loretto House, Calcutta; Ida Stotesbury, Calcutta Girls' School; Hemaprabha Basu, Bethune School; and Antoinette Saville, Allahabad Girls' School.

2nd Division.—C. Bartlett, Loretto Convent, Darjeeling; Alice Boyle, Miss Starks' School; Mabel Gordon and Pauline Malley, Allahabad Girls' High School; Jessie Wince and Margaret Wince, Miss O'Brien's School; and Agnes Benjamin, Calcutta Girls' School.

BURMA is not to be made a Lieutenant Governorship, but the Chief Commissioner's remuneration has been raised to Rs. 6,400, the pay of a Member of Council.

JAMES GRANT, late agent of the Bank of Bombay at Karachi, and leader of local society, whom the Judges of the Province had not the heart to give his due by law for embezzling his employers' money in his charge, but who was after all sentenced to six months' imprisonment for defalcations, has escaped the discipline of jail by death.

AMERICA seems to be the paradise of the Press—so far at least as advertising goes.

"A column in the Chicago Tribune costs the advertiser £5,209 per annum. The New York Herald receives for the lowest price £7,300, and for the highest £12,600 per annum for a column. The New York Tribune for its lowest gets £4,250, and for its highest £17,000 for the same space. And these papers, it is said, never lack for advertisements to fill their columns."

We commend the above to the attention of the Mirror and other representatives of the cheap and nasty.

ABDUL HUQ, with all his extraordinary rise, is a Policeman at best. He now uses his professional arts to help him to necessary information. A regular organisation to supply him duplicate copies of telegrams passing through the Secunderabad telegraph office between the Residency and the Nizam's Government regarding the Mining scandal, has been discovered. Several arrests have been made. Among those implicated is Ahmed Ali, the son-in-law of Abdul Huq's brother, the Subadar. The signaller and a man named Hillier have confessed before the Magistrate.

THE Government of India has telegraphed descriptions of the murderers of the late Mr. Dalgleish to Peking, Teheran, and Russia, and has also written to Yarkand and Kashgar on the subject. Rewards of Rs. 5,000 for the capture of Dad Muhammad, the actual murderer, and of Rs. 3,000 for his principal accomplice the Punjabi Fakir Baksh, have been offered.

THE following records the success of an interesting experiment:—

"A curious 'Information Agency' has been established in London by a firm called Messrs. Romeike and Curtice. The Agency, which was regarded as a freak when it was started nearly ten years ago, has developed into a most prosperous concern, and supplies one of the wants of these busy times. Politicians, authors, artists, people working a 'cause,' can obtain from the Agency, on payment of a small fee, extracts from journals, English, American and foreign, concerning themselves or the hobby which interests them. The Agency employs sixty persons, of whom forty are women, and their task is to read hundreds of newspapers, and to mark and cut out the passages required. The extracts are then gummed on slips of paper, and sent to subscribers. The Agency receives about 6,000 newspapers a week, out of which some 30,000 extracts are made for the benefit of over 4,000 subscribers. Among the latter are naturally included a large number of public men."

The organisation meets a true want of our busy modern life. We hope it will be largely supported from India.

A RUMOUR has crossed over from Ceylon to Madras that Mr. William Digby, the well known Radical candidate, India reformer, and Secretary of the National Liberal Club, London, is about to institute an action for libel against the Editors of the Ceylon Observer, claiming damages for Rs. 10,000! In India, Mr. Digby was editor of the Madras Times and distinguished himself greatly by his philanthropic labours during the last great Famine in the South, of which he wrote a good book under the title of the Famine Campaign in Southern India. But before he came to the Continent, he had been in the island as sub-editor of the Ceylon Observer. The present case refers to his insular career. It is said that he has been accused of dishonorable conduct in having shown the accounts of his employes, the editors of the Ceylon Observer, to strangers. This Mr. Digby resents, and threatens to invoke the law to set himself right. We hope friends will intervene and effect a reconciliation.

THE British still claim the privilege of wife-beating as one of their inalienable rights. The following, taken from the Englishman, transpired in the High Court, before the Hon. the Chief Justice and Justice Tottenham, on Thursday, the 21st June.

"Mr. John Bradley appeared before their Lordships this morning, and put in a petition praying their Lordships to set aside a conviction obtained against him in the local Police Court by his wife. He had been convicted of an assault on the person of his wife he stated, and had put forward the somewhat novel defence that he was justified in assaulting her, that in chastising her, he was acting within his rights. He was not allowed to go into matters justifying the assault on his wife, by the Magistrate, and asked their Lordships to refer to the English reported case of Godbett. He put it in this way: So far as he knew there was no section in the Penal Code providing for assaults on wives or children, and he therefore argued that he was justified in chastising either on sufficient provocation. The Magistrate had informed him that the English law had no application in India. Applicant was not so sure about that, and referred their Lordships to a work by Hamilton and Edwards on the law of husband and wife.

The Chief Justice did not think that the law as expounded by the applicant was the law in England at present.

Applicant urged that gross provocation on the part of a wife justified a husband in assaulting her. He insisted that when a wife acted in a consistent course of misbehaviour, he had a right to chastise her, because there was nothing to the contrary in the Penal Code, and this was the law, as he had been instructed, in England. He doubted very much whether their Lordships would uphold his conviction.

The Chief Justice remarked that surely the position of a wife was different from that of a child.

Applicant said that that might be so, but yet the husband had control over the wife.

The Chief Justice:—You say that in this country the husband has the right of corporal punishment over his wife?

Applicant.—If he has good grounds.

The Chief Justice.—Who is to be the judge of that?

Applicant.—I was quite willing to allow the Magistrate to be the judge, but he would not let me go into that.

The Chief Justice.—He is to be the judge of the amount of punishment to be inflicted! The husband is to be both judge and executioner.

Applicant.—When it comes to a case of mere chastisement.

The Chief Justice.—But she has been beaten before, and how can there be any judge of the amount of the punishment?

Applicant.—In the same way that you may chastise a child.

The Chief Justice.—That is quite different.

Applicant.—I only ask your Lordships to rule that the Magistrate was wrong in not allowing me to go into other matters.

The Chief Justice.—The only possible way in which a judge could allow you to go into the matter would be by way of mitigation of punishment. Here the judge has only fined you ten rupees. Assault on a man's wife is a serious offence, and this fine of ten rupees is a very mild punishment.

Applicant.—The application of my wife in the first instance was to bind me down.

The Chief Justice.—I do not think this is a case in which we should interfere because it is clear from the evidence that the Magistrate had all the facts before him.

Applicant.—Will your Lordships rule that the English law does not apply here in India?

The Chief Justice.—I don't rule anything of the kind."

IN this Iron Age, specially in India where its influence is most felt, the honest part of the community are notoriously handicapped. But the whirligig of time has brought them a chance at last. It is a hopeful sign when the standing counsel for suspected or accused officials are smitten with horror at official offences. We rejoice to see the Pioneer so active in exposing the corruption in connection with Hyderabad. It has denounced without compunction its old friends of the Residency, and is doing its best to bring to the mire the Stracheys, Battens, and the rest of the gods, great and small, of its former idolatry. Our readers are already informed that the good faith of the sale of the Secretariat Buildings at Bombay has been questioned. The Pioneer now calls upon Government for enquiry into the transaction:—

"The sale is alleged to have been effected by the Collector, the ordinary formality of calling for tenders having been dispensed with. The price given for the property by the Sirdar is stated to have been four lakhs of rupees: a price which, we have reason to believe, was very considerably below their market value."

AN English engineering journal notices a peculiar difficulty in the way of railway construction in the South-Western States of America in (Iron says) the frequent occurrence of quicksands in rivers. It refers to the experience of Mr. H. L. Carter, the railway contractor. The Quicksands are in nearly every stream, however small, from Western Kansas to the mountains. Pile-driving was no good, the longest piles disappearing without touching the bottom. Then filling with earth and stone was equally vain. The only means of crossing the rivers was found to be to construct short truss bridges across them. This was very expensive, but was the only thing to be done. Mr. Carter cites the case of an engine that ran off the track at River Bend, about ninety miles from Denver, on the Kansas Pacific. The locomotive, a large goods-engine, fell into a quicksand, and in twenty minutes had entirely disappeared. Within two days the company sent out a gang of men and a wrecking train to raise the engine. To their surprise, not a trace could be found of the engine. Careful search was made, magnetised rods were sunk to the depth of 65 feet, but there were no signs of the locomotive. It had sunk beyond human ken.

A HINDU male acquaintance of ours in his boyish days, seeing her daily driving in phaeton in charge of European children, sighed for the lot of the Ayah. And a mighty part the Ayah plays in Anglo-Indian life. Just now she is the observed of observers, having brought the almighty Lambert's frisky lambs to a stand, however momentary.

Mr. Hyde, the barrister, has an Ayah in his employ. That Ayah has a son. That son was in the service of Dr. Coulter. There was a theft in that house, and the Police took charge of the boy and, after putting him to a course of discipline, found there was no evidence against him. Before he was released, Mr. Hyde had called at the Police station and examined the boy, and found his thumbs swollen and noticed black marks around, underneath the swollen top joints. There were also blisters along the lower part of the nails. Thereupon a charge was instituted against the Police for extortion and torture. Mr. Gasper prosecuted, and Mr. Marsden has committed three native constables and Inspector Boyd for extorting confession and abetting.

"LOKIL SLUFF" may be a good joke to the barren writers on the Anglo-Indian Press. But surely our municipalities never produced such an incident as the following which occurred at a French election:—

"An incident of the late Municipal elections is reported from Catteri, a small town in Corsica. The present Mayor, a Bonapartist, would appear to be peculiarly obnoxious to the Republicans of the place, who have made strenuous efforts to oust both him and his reactionary colleagues from their seats on the Council. The election was held in a school room belonging to a Republican. Just as the Mayor, after the close of the poll, had opened the urn for the purpose of counting the votes, a cupboard behind his table suddenly burst open, giving egress to a member of the gentle sex, who incontinently seized upon the voting papers, swallowed several of them, and tore up others. The election was thus rendered void."

We have had no "Lokil Sluff" Rakshashi yet. So far as the devouring process is concerned, that she Corsican has lately been matched in India, by a European heroine who swallowed up in the court the forged document on which her husband was on trial for forgery. She went to jail for a few days for contempt, but she saved her husband. We can honor her for her motive as well as for her genius.

It is justly complained by the Bangalore Post that—

"A Bangalore correspondent from this place to the Hindu lately held forth against the members of the community to which we have referred, holding posts under the Mysore Government; all these employed ought to be natives, he contended, simply because it was a Native State."

What a pity our native contemporaries do not take care to eliminate such foolish writings from their columns!

AFTER the lying-in-state on the 16th the funeral of the Emperor Frederick the Third took place on the 18th. It was a simple military procession, from the Palace to the Friedenskirche, attended by the Crown Prince William, the Prince of Wales and a few members of royalty. Potsdam was crowded by visitors from early morning. The road was lined by a double row of soldiers and a large military escort accompanied the hearse.

The post mortem disclosed the cancer which was at one time doubted. The larynx had been completely destroyed, leaving a cavity of the size of a man's clenched fist.

The English Court has gone into mourning for six weeks, and a general mourning has been ordered for a fortnight. The two Houses of Parliament have voted addresses of condolence to her Majesty the Queen and the Empress Victoria. In India, the Governor-General-in-Council issued the following Gazette Extraordinary in black.

"Home Department.—Notification.—Public.—No. 1700.—Simla, the 17th June, 1888. Official intelligence having been received from Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India that the Funeral of His late Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Germany will take place tomorrow the 18th instant, the Governor-General in Council directs that, as a mark of respect to His Imperial Majesty's Memory, Flags shall be hoisted half mast high from sunrise to sunset and Sixty Minute Guns fired in all Forts and Stations throughout India on that day.

The Governor-General in Council further directs that the Officers of Her Majesty's Civil, Military, and Marine Services do put themselves into Mourning till the 7th of July.

By order of the Governor-General in Council,
A. P. MACDONNELL,
Secretary to the Government of India."

Crown Prince William has ascended the throne of Germany as Emperor William the Second. The new Emperor promises well. In his proclamation to the people of Prussia, issued after the funeral, His Majesty deeply mourns the death of his dearly beloved father, vows to be just and clement, and says that he will foster religion, guard the peace and promote the commonweal of his country. This was followed up with a most reassuring message to France. Thereupon, the Czar has declined to sanction his War Minister, General Vannovski's proposal for doubling the reserve battalions of the army, the Emperor declaring that the situation does not justify him in overburdening the finances of the Empire. As a consequence the public credit throughout Europe has been steadied.

DASAHARA passed away without its usual drops of rain, and deaths from heat apoplexy continue. The Judges of the High Court have suspended their respective courts for ten days and the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Trevelyan have gone to the hills with many of the senior barristers. The offices, however, remain open. The Bengal Secretariat was closed on Wednesday following the Dasahara vacation, the Under-secretaries in charge not thinking themselves competent to order vacation for the rest of the week. At Alipore, Judge Garret keeps himself away from the court, leaving his subordinate judicial officers to follow his example. In the Revenue Department of the Bengal Secretariat, there is morning office and the Alipore Civil Courts propose to follow the precedent from next week. The Accountant-General has allowed full holiday to his office this day. He has also arranged to pay all pensions on the 2nd July in the morning, dispensing with the attendance of pensioners when possible for identification.

The weather has been cooled a little by a downpour last night.

The heat in Calcutta has been unprecedented. The maximum hitherto registered was 106 degrees in 1879. This month the thermometer recorded 108. We annex a comparative register in the shade from the 13th to the 22nd in Balasore, Calcutta, Midnapore and Cuttack.

THERE was a rumour that Mr. Jones of the Small Cause Court was dead of the weather. But he is as hale and hearty as ever.

These jolly Joneses are not easily snuffed out. These elastic Britishers—adstricti glebe so to say—have a prodigious vitality. Look at the amount of killing Our Jones has undergone! If he has escaped once he has escaped nearly a dozen times. If Nature has relented, man has been obdurate. Captain Taylor though he succeeded in wrecking his vessel in crossing from the other bank of the Hoogly to this, could not drown the irrepressible Jones. Then the eminent Counsellor Bell tried on him the slaughtering powers of his sarcasm pointed with apt quotations from Shakespeare. It was all in vain. The great Bureaucracy of India, although it tried as much as ever it could, failed to suppress the sturdy Jones. The great Chairman of the Town sat on him as if Jones was the Chair, but found it uncomfortable. Jones's Chief next tried the game, and had a regular run with him, but Jones beat him by a neck. Our miniature Hercules's latest triumph is his conquest over this terrific heat of the season. Long may he be spared to be an example of honest success!

THE Parliamentary enquiry into the Hyderabad mining concession has ended. It has brought out some scandalous disclosures. But so many "big wigs" are implicated that we are truly anxious about the final result. English Committees and Commissions have an unfortunate habit of white-washing swell delinquents or ending in smoke.

PUNDIT SHAMA VARMA having been driven from the Dewanship, the modern device—a Council has been constituted for the administration of Rutlam. The cast is composed of Maharaja Ranjet Sing, K.C.I.E., as President, Mr. Krishnaji Sadasiv Riswadker, B. A., L. L. B., Sir Nyayadhish, Babu Nabin Chandra Roy, Naib Dewan, Mr. Ganpat Lalji, merchant, and Shet Shri Krishnaji, merchant, as members, Babu Nobin Chunder being Secretary and the medium of all official communication. That means that the Chief means to be his own Minister. The Naib Dewan is, of course, the virtual Naib—all in all.

THE Commission on Mr. Larpent, late Registrar of the Punjab University, found him guilty and the Governor-General in Council has directed his dismissal from Her Majesty's Service. The charges against him were

"(1) That he agreed to receive from Ram Saran Das Rs. 2,500 with the view of showing him favour in the law examination at Lahore in December, 1886, and that he did actually receive Rs. 1,510 as a bribe for that purpose; (2) that he permitted Gunde Sing to introduce certain candidates to him, knowing that Gunde Sing was endeavouring to induce them to believe that their success at the examination depended on their coming to terms with him (Mr. Larpent), and that he knew that thereby he would aid Gunde Sing in obtaining an illegal gratification; (3) that he communicated to some other person, or knowingly, or by gross and culpable negligence, permitted some other person to ascertain examination questions at the above examination."

The Commission found the first two charges fully proved and could not acquit the accused of the third. But the Governor-General in Council, while agreeing with the Commission in their finding on the first two, considers the third charge not established. The gravity, however, of the proved offences is such that no lighter punishment could be inflicted.

A NEW god has been added to the Chinese Pantheon. A letter has appeared in a missionary periodical—the Spirit of Missions—in which Miss Adole H. Fielde, who appears to be devoted to work of charity among Chinese women, gives an account of the apotheosis of a hog.

"Last year a villager living about thirty miles from here went to a neighbouring hamlet and bought a pig that he intended to kill. Having paid the money for it, he tied a rope round it behind the shoulders and attempted to drive it home. When just in front of a temple on the outskirts of a hamlet, it slipped the noose, rushed into the building, and took refuge under the altar. No exertion of its owner succeeded in getting it out of the fane; and when it finally crouched before the god and refused to stir, the assembled crowd began to look upon it as a devotee, and to fear to interrupt its petitions. Some of the bystanders belonging to the hamlet in which the pig was reared made up a purse which repaid the buyer for his outlay, and the contributors then became the owners of the hog, whose fame for piety soon spread throughout the hamlet. A new shrine was prepared and the hog was enticed into it, while awe-stricken throngs came to do him reverence. The whitest of rice was offered for his delectation, and so fastidious did he become as to reject many of the dainties lavishly brought to him by his worshippers. One day two men simultaneously gave him eggs to eat, and when he partook of the one offering and rejected the other, the keeper explained that the deity dwelling in him saw that the latter offering had not been made with a pure heart. The offerer thereupon confessed that just before his leaving home his youngest child had cried for one of the eggs brought for the offering, and that he had struck the child for crying. This story was spread abroad and helped to increase the number and the servility of the worshippers. The hog had gold earrings put in its ears, a handsome bed to lie in, and strings of coins hung around its neck. When the strings of coins became numerous and heavy, they were quietly removed by the shrine-keepers. Some of the pilgrims to this shrine were marvellously cured of disease, and then the filth of the sty began to be in demand for all ailments. Persons came a day's journey to buy the offal for sick friends, and the sale of it kept the shrine exquisitely clean. At the last report this sale was still carried on, and the porcine idol was so fattened on the cakes brought to him that his eyes had become invisible!

The Chinese have at length come to a logical conclusion. It is a wonder how miserably they have been fumbling about so long to find the true object of their worship! It was their devotion to the animal to which they are indebted for their independence. Like the geese that saved the State in ancient Rome, the pigs prevented China from being permanently absorbed within the empire of Islam, the Mahomedans retiring from the country in disgust after conquering it, in despair of weaning the vile people from their unfortunate clinging to the dirty beast. Surely, there could be no more weighty claim to apotheosis; many have received the compliment on far cheaper terms—by exhibiting some mountebank tricks, say; and the so-called Celestials have been bad even for mortals in not, during all these centuries, doing honor to the saviour of their country. The Devil is entitled to justice, and the hog's dues are no less sacred than Cæsar's. If the Chinese have been slow in their recognition of their old benefactor of a beast, never mind; better late than never. The delay in the formal ceremony of fetishisation must, we suspect, be an accident. For, as a matter of fact, the hog has always been in high repute among the Chinese. There is perhaps no country where the hog is more prized, unless it be unhappy Ireland where the brute is esteemed superior to the human being and reckoned the more loyal and reputable subject and the more valuable tenant, and of course better housed and fed and altogether more cared for than his owner de jure, who in reality is maintained by him. It should not be imagined that, in worshipping the pig, the Chinese are going to abandon their taste for pork. They are wiser in their religion. And they will not deny themselves a luxury that even the terror of Moslem arms did not succeed in making them forswear. They will be accused of eating their god, that is all. It is true the Chinese eat their god. But so are the Irish accused—witness the Rev. Peter Plymley's remonstrance with his brother Abraham. Besides, cats and other animals bite in token of love. The thing is prevalent among men in this country, and not unknown in the West, we believe. It is inconvenient, no doubt, and may prove dangerous, when blood is drawn, as sometimes must happen. Hence the origin of the milder forms of kissing. But the tendency to the original type remains. From bleeding biting to eating is but a step. The Chinese only carry the thing to its logical conclusion in munching and devouring their god in the excess of religious fervour.

The Celestials have indeed original ways of dealing with their gods. In the plenitude of their faith, they are ever and anon praying. They do nothing without consulting their gods. Even more than Hindus, they carry their lares and penates wherever they go. Not a junk or a boat but has its chapel and sanctuaries. If a storm is threatened, they fall down before the vessel's gods, and pray, leaving the vessel to the mercy of wind and wave. If prayer do not avail, they fall upon the gods and punish them for their obduracy or their offences. Such a people are not to be deterred by the scruples of outer-barbarians, Asiatic or European, from feasting on the flesh of their god when an opportunity offers.

SPORTING is not always favorable to perspicacity, so we are not surprised at the confession of the sporting staff of a Calcutta paper, namely, "We have been trying to master what the Indian Daily News intends to convey in the article on football, spread out in its (15th) morning's issue." Nor is that all. Little did the morning News dream of its danger from giving the Evening News the travail of understanding. Nay, the danger is diffusive, the sin of one entailing liability of all. The Evening's sporting, clearly, is not by any means sportive. The enfant terrible has supreme contempt for the "dried up old fossils, such as the editors of the J. D. N. or the Statesman, or candidates, for honors as the real fatman—such as he who bosses the Englishman." "The gentlemen who attempt to teach the 'young bloods' are, we notice, conspicuous by their absence when there is a rough and tumble match to be played." Not content with that, the young lions of Bentinck Street flaunt their glove. "We should like to get the frozen up old beings on a fair field—we then might teach them something," much as Indian Dawson in the story said to the lady, Arrendi panja kase, which may be freely rendered, Let us have a boxing match. Truly leonine to be sure, but such rings of beasts will scarcely require the services of a Cumming or a Gerard.

A CORRESPONDENT of a Ceylon Patriot, from Colombo, a man of experience, intelligently, if not methodically, discourses on the rabies. He begins at the beginning, with the standard definition:—

"Hydrophobia is a disease caused by inoculation with the saliva of a rabid animal and characterized by intermitting spasms of the muscles of respiration together with a peculiar irritability of the body and disturbance of the mind."

The writer's arrangement is not good, but the subject is of such vital importance that we will give the cream of his letter in logical order. He is thoroughly practical. Recognising the hopelessness of cure, he insists on prevention. According to him,

"the poison after it has found entrance into the system lies apparently dormant for a period varying from less than a week to about two years (the average time being two to six weeks) so that when the true symptoms of Hydrophobia appear the vital organs are so seriously endangered that remedial agents can do but a little benefit."

He adds—

"It is of the highest importance that every body should be able to discover the earliest symptoms of rabies in dogs."

Accordingly, he gives information which will enable a man to avoid a dangerous dog—plain hints for plain people. He dwells on the premonitory symptoms of affection in the animal:—

"The animal's appetite is impaired or entirely lost; there is always a propensity to lick cold surfaces, to devour straws, grass and similar rubbish. Great eagerness is exhibited by the animal to frequent common urinary places and localities where animal excretions are found. The saliva of the dog is very thick and sticks to the corners of the mouth, and hence the animal is forced to use its paws as if trying to remove a bone that has stuck between its teeth. Very often the animal shows excessive fondness by licking the hands and feet of its master. Thus the poison may be unconsciously absorbed through any small sores or scratches which may exist. Especially at this time when mad dogs are numerous it should be an invariable rule that no person suffering from itch or any other skin disease should allow himself to be licked by any dog. It is the popular, though erroneous idea that the dog like the human being has an intense dread of water, on the contrary it suffers from insatiable thirst which it tries to allay by licking the angles of its mouth. When the disease becomes more advanced, the dog is delirious, changes its voice and suffers from increased thirst. It is an important characteristic (which is not generally understood by the ordinary people) that the animal is perfectly insensible to pain, so that even its throat may be cut off without a groan. In addition to the symptoms already enumerated the most valuable physical sign which goes to prove the existence of rabies in a dog is afforded by an examination of the contents of the stomach. If the animal be rabid, one is sure to find hair, straw, earth, &c."

In this country, dogs are found to devour wiry grass, apparently as an emetic, and vomit it. A man who has kept pariahs tells us that they vomit an animal or animal substance somewhat resembling a snail, having seen it in the contents of the stomach of several mad pariahs. Surely, the thing could not be confined to the wretched canine breed of this country, and it must have been noticed by Europeans, if their mad dogs had thrown up such a curious substance. We mention what we hear for what it may be worth.

On the cause of the disease in the animal, the writer has one single simple remark of value which ought to be remembered by all who keep dogs:—

"This fatal disease may arise in dogs by close confinement, unwholesome food or by the bite of an already diseased animal."

The treatment he prescribes is as follows:—

"If any one has the misfortune to be bitten by a rabid or even a suspicious dog, at once a string should be tied very tightly above the seat of injury with a view to arrest the circulation in the part. The wound should be well washed and allowed to bleed freely. The patient or his friends provided they have no sores or abrasions in the mouth may with impunity suck the wound, washing their mouth with vinegar and water after each act. As soon as possible a piece of iron, such as nail or knife-blade heated to a white heat should be freely and deeply applied to the part. The above method is the most reliable. Caustics such as nitrate of silver, if applied freely, is usually effectual. But if the interval be long the part should be freely burnt with Nitric or Carbolic acid."

That will remind the reader of the directions given for snake-bite, but it is nonetheless sensible on that account. In fact, all animal bites must be treated in the same way.

We learn that

"The road from the foot of the hills to Naini Tal seems specially fatal to Tonga ponies. At the late meeting in London of the Rohilkhund and Kumaon Company's shareholders, General Trevoor stated that up to date, the Company had lost Rs. 14,000 by the service, chiefly from fatalities among their cattle, pneumonia being the prevailing epidemic. If this goes on the Company will, it was stated, have to stop the service altogether."

What a confession of incapacity! We are sure these managers and directors would lose caste on the Continent or in America. They know the cause of death and yet they see their costly animals dying out without applying a remedy! That is simple, if they have the sense to see it and the courage to apply it. What do they themselves do to save themselves? They keep themselves warm—clothe themselves. Let them, then, clothe their poor ponies. And if fools laugh, let the dogs bark.

PERSIA, the home of successive invaders of India, was long regarded as the land of jewel accumulations. Many of the treasures were supposed to have been lost or dispersed in the innumerable revolutions of the country. But then Oriental sovereigns are accustomed to replenish their stock, by means fair or foul, as opportunity offers. Accordingly, there was no ground for surprise when Eastwick's Journal of a Diplomat first revealed a glimpse of the vast store of gems in the Shah's possession.

The latest information on the subject is supplied in the following extract from an English paper:—

"A traveller in the East has indulged us with the account of what he saw in the Shah's museum. He says it is probable that in the museum there are more than twenty-five million pounds' worth of jewellery, precious stones, coined and uncoined gold, costly objects of vertu, fine porcelain and glassware, old weapons and armour, tableware ornaments of exquisite Persian and Hindu workmanship, &c. The so-called peacock throne (a part of the plunder of Nadir Shah carried off from Delhi one hundred and fifty years ago) is alone valued at many millions even after a number of large, rough, and uncut jewels have been broken out and stolen. It is an incongruous place, this museum. There you will see vases of agate or gold and lapis lazuli, said to be worth millions; and alongside of them empty perfume bottles of European make, with gaudy labels, that can be had wholesale for about three pence apiece. You will see priceless mosaics, exquisitely planted cups, and cans, and vases, which were presented by some European potentate; and side by side with them you will notice horrible daubs, veritable shilling chromos, picked up goodness knows how and where. You will perceive glass cases filled with huge heaps of rubies, diamonds, emeralds, sapphires, turquoises, garnets, topazes, pearls, of all sizes and kinds cut and uncut; and cheek by jowl with these your eyes will see cheap music-boxes, Jew's harps, squeaky hand-organs. The Shah must also be in a condition to "bull" the market with pearls; for there is, for instance, a big glass case, 24in. long by 18in. wide and high that is more than half filled with beautiful pearls (mostly from the Persian Gulf fisheries), of all sizes and degree of loveliness. In a separate long case the orders and decorations of the Shah, coming from nearly every country in the world, are kept on exhibition; but the crown jewels are in a little box that is always locked and of which the Shah himself for ever, waking or sleeping, carries the keys. The contents of this box and of the several vaults where he keeps his piles on piles of bright, shining, unused money, he never allows others to view."

We have no doubt of the good faith of the writer. The horrible chromos assure us of it. It is an unmistakable touch. The juxtaposition of the genuine and the make-believe, of the elegant and the meretricious, of the grand and the gaudy, of pure light and vulgar matter, is a type of Eastern degradation of the day. It was in keeping with it, that the Shah was caught wearing in Europe paste jewellery.

WE had hoped that the ill wind from the discreditable fracas of the 4th instant, in the Fire Temple of this city, which blew nobody, in the business or out of it, good, would be allowed to blow over. Instead of making bad worse by rushing into court, the parties had the sense, after the original indiscretion or burst of passion, to submit their differences to the arbitration of friends, who prevailed upon them to accept mutual explanations and apologies. There the matter ought to have ended. But it seems that certain parties are not content with such a desirable result. From the first, it was evident that there were parties, other than those immediately concerned, who were determined to make the most of the scandal, and to push matters to court, if possible. It was neither the Mehtas nor Padshah who first rushed to the print, but these busybodies. It was the Rustomjees, who are known to bear no good will towards the rising family of the Mehtas, who called at the Indian Daily News office, and pressed for the appearance of a garbled account which would have had the effect of highly prejudicing the Mehtas in the eyes of the public and Government and with the court, in case the parties went to court. Although the editor, a staunch old follower of the principle of audi alteram partem, was persuaded to publish a letter, he utterly discredited it in a foot note. Accordingly, a Parsee medical practitioner was put up next day to support the previous communication.

Meanwhile, the parties to the assault had agreed to forgive each other and, so far as may be, to forget. The following day, the Statesman, which had hitherto preserved silence, came out with a careful account of the transaction, evidently framed from the statements of all sides, which we quoted. There the matter might have been left, but the busybodies would not let it so rest. One of the papers which Padshah supports with his Swiss valour—for he has spirit enough for a scribbling guerilla—has, we are told, abused Mehta like a thief. At any rate, the original Rustomjee-Shroff version had been telegraphed to Bombay—the Parsee Vilayet—and came back pouring in in English and Gujrati journals. The commotion in Parsee Calcutta again became general. Thereupon, a well-known Parsee, who, as a friend of both sides, and perhaps a special "chum" of Padshah's, had hitherto kept his peace, could not in conscience hold out any longer, and called upon the editor of the Indian Daily News. He volunteered a statement which the editor gives as follows:—

"When the marriage ceremony was over, some of the people were going away, and among them was Mr. R. D. Mehta, and our informant was at the time talking with Mr. H. M. Rustomjee. Mr. Padshah was at the corner of the portico, and he saw Mr. Padshah throw something. Mr. Mehta turned round, and called upon all to witness, the outrage as he would prosecute the offender. Mr. Mehta, senior, as an old man, had a stick. Mr. Padshah, who, it is said, is subject to fainting when excited, fainted before he was struck. Our informant saw a stick, but could not say how or where Padshah was struck. Some of the people present interfered, and persuaded Mr. Mehta to leave the place. Dr. Shroff attended Padshah, and he revived. After a time, Dr. Shroff lost his temper, and some one threatened Padshah. The Mehtas were not in the church, but in the compound when this occurred. The elder went into the church for explanation. Dr. Shroff said this was not the time or place for explanation. Finally, they went away to the bridal festivities. Our informant says that he told Padshah that he saw him throw something, and he was crying at being insulted."

That is Mr. Madan's account, who is always accessible to any gentleman at his place near the Corinthian Theatre who may be desirous of pursuing the inquiry. It is not only vraisemblant but its moderation reveals a kindness for both sides. It may, we think, be accepted by all impartial men as a substantially accurate account. It disposes of the sensational story of Mr. Shroff, and so far as it goes, it fully vindicates the Mehtas. We are glad that it does justice to the father—the son is a young man wellknown in general society, European and native who has shown in this very occurrence, lamentable as it was in its necessities, that he is well able to take care of himself. Mr. Dhunjeebhoj Mehta is a venerable old man of a type fast disappearing, austere yet human, a loving disciplinarian, a prudent man of business, an example to the rising generation. As for what the Padshahs may say no body need much trouble himself about it.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION—ITS DIFFICULTIES.

It is believed that a Resolution on the subject of technical education is about to be issued by the Government of India. The publication will be a refutation of the charge which has been formulated against the present administration of indifference in this respect, although we are far from sanguine of much good coming of it. The question is one of great practical difficulty, and its solution will scarcely be advanced by any amount of mere writing and discussion. The absence, however, of any system of technical education in this country worth the name cannot but be a source of constant embarrassment to its rulers, and they cannot but be painfully alive to the necessity of remedying the evil. If, at the same time, they have failed to do much or even anything in the direction so urgently pointed out by necessity, this is from no want of inclination but from the difficulty of the enterprise itself. As to the forthcoming Resolution, so far as we can anticipate, it will merely lay down a scheme for the guidance of local administrations, and devolve financial responsibilities on them as well as the District and Municipal Boards. How far these will be in a position to carry out their orders—how far they will be able to meet the pecuniary demands made upon them—is the question. Then, again, if technical education is to be something of a superior kind engrafted on the stem of the University system of education, which is already in possession of the field, difficulties of organization of another kind and of wellnigh a formidable character stare one in the face. These difficulties are not merely connected with the reorganization of the University examinations, but will arise from the resistance of the educational institutions which prepare students for the University examinations. Several of these are private institutions, and it is not likely that they will, without a struggle, fall into the new track. The Universities are, indeed, become a power in the land, and the institutions subordinate to them must, in the long run, adapt their teaching to the standards instituted by the University authorities. But it will be no easy thing for them to provide a "modern side" to their education. Competent teachers of practical subjects have to be created before the colleges can adopt two parallel courses of instruction leading up, one to the literary, and the other, to the "modern" Examination of the University. Till such teachers have been made available, it is but natural these college authorities will oppose all the vis inertiae in their power to frustrate the new system. From our experience of the difficulty of finding teachers of surveying in the Entrance Classes of our schools, it may easily be imagined that not even the power and prestige of University Examinations will be sufficient to counteract this danger. At any rate, it will be a work of time as well as of cost, to provide a body of capable teachers for the "modern" examinations. Training Institutions will have to be founded here as well as superior talent to be indented for from England. The financial aspect of the question thus begins to open on the view, and it is this aspect which presents the greatest difficulty all along the line. It may be all very well for the Supreme Government to lay down a scheme, and to direct that funds should be provided by state and local grants for the promotion of that scheme. Easier said, however, than done. How many urgent schemes of reform in various departments remain mere paper-schemes for want of money? Even as regards education, what has been the fate of many of the proposals made by the Education Commission, the appointment of which, under the most favorable auspices, was to do so much for the diffusion of knowledge in the land? That Commission, although its instructions did not include the subject of technical education, did not entirely ignore it. On the contrary, it proposed a bifurcation of the curriculum in High Schools—one course leading to the University, and the other fitting boys for commercial pursuits. Moderate as were the requirements of this proposal, they remain neglected up to this day. What vast less chance of fruition must there be for a complete scheme of technical education which is to be an integral part of the University system, having its apex in the higher regions of the University, just as the system of general education which is in possession of the field!

The question is complicated by this fact of possession. One whole field is already occupied, and the difficulty is twofold. First, a new field has to be occupied with a new set of workers, and appliances; secondly, the occupation of this field must be accomplished with the aid of additional pecuniary resources, so as not to interfere with the work of the old one. The Government of India has repeatedly declared its determination that technical education should not be promoted at the expense of the interests of higher English education. To some extent, this education has recently become self-supporting, and so far the funds hitherto provided for its promotion might be transferred to help the cause of technical education. But the declared policy of the Government is often in danger of misapplication in the hands of administrators, in whom the zeal for practical education is synonymous with hatred of high education. A notable case in point has recently been furnished by the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces, in his attitude towards the Morris College at Nagpore. This is the single people's College at the capital, for the provision of high education, and, notwithstanding that it has only recently been called into being, to meet a long-felt want, and is chiefly supported from endowments by the people, the Chief Commissioner can find no better means for stimulating technical education than by proposing to appropriate its funds, and thus violating the objects for which they were subscribed. We fear in this Mr. Mackenzie has only betrayed the usual official feeling on the subject, which, generally, is one of more or less disguised hostility to high education. True it is that the English education has taken a root in the country, so far as appreciation of its benefits by the people at large is concerned, but the time is not yet come when it may be left to shift for its help. The Education Commission has, indeed, recommended the gradual withdrawal of the Government from the work of higher education, but it is careful to stipulate that this withdrawal must in no case be made where the interests of higher education are likely to suffer from such withdrawal. The necessity of liberating the funds, now appropriated to higher education, for other purposes, leads officials to pay little regard to that stipulation. Their attitude is fraught with danger, and in discussing the subject, it may be as well to remember that, as the financial question has the most important bearing on the whole subject of a technical education for India, much as one may feel the necessity of provision being made for such education, it will have been got too dear if it were detrimental to the progress of English education.

Be the difficulties of the task as they may, it must be faced, sooner or later. We are curious to see how the Government of India has dealt with the subject. Its resolution naturally comes after its very exhaustive Note on the subject, which was noticed in these columns some two years ago. The Government could not have been sleeping over the question. Indeed, its pressing importance cannot but be realized every moment by those who administer the affairs of the people. As was said in the Note, our schools and colleges are yearly adding to the crowd of young men whom our system of education has rendered discontented with the sphere of life to which they were born, without fitting them for another. The question of technical education has the same political significance as other general questions of administration, having for their object, by the proper ordering of affairs, the diminution of popular suffering and discontent. Viewed in this light, the importance of the forthcoming document cannot be overestimated. We only hope the difficulties which beset the problem will be grappled with in a thorough-going spirit. Or, as we fear, the thing will remain where it is.

AN INCIDENT IN THE JAIN CASE.

IN connection with the costly litigation which is going on in the High Court between members of the Jain community, and in which we were enabled last week to lay before our readers the judgment of Mr. Justice Trevelyan, a curious fact has appeared in one of our morning contemporaries. It is stated that the Registrar of Calcutta, Baboo Pratap Chandra Ghosha, is security for the administration of the estate which is the subject or object of contention. Before the notice of the case appeared in the Statesman, we had heard of the same gentleman's connection with the parties and of his having undertaken the onerous responsibility, but we did not believe it. What had he, a Hindu gentleman, a Calcutta Baboo, and a Bengali Kayastha, to do with the private affairs of Burra Bazar Jains?

We were aware that he often visits Mirzapore, where his mother resides, and was so smitten with its charms as to spoil the view of his own quarter of the native town of Calcutta—Jorasanko—by the grotesquerie of planting an up-country temple with surroundings to match, right against his own neat modern mansion, built by his unsophisticated father, and in the sight and in immediate neighbourhood of the imposing façade of the immense palace of the Singhs. His former employment under the Asiatic Society, may have blown him into a dilettante—his own tastes lay in the direction of the sciences, more or less exact, rather than the uncertainties of antiquarian speculation—and led him to indulge in dreams of being a Bimal Shah on a small scale. He might even be a sort of amateur Jain or Buddhist in Bengali society. He might utilise his opportunities as Registrar to extend his connections. In the outlandish and absurd way in which he celebrated the late weddings in his family, a Jain connection was visible. When all these several circumstances were strung together, the nett result amounted to this much that he had an intellectual interest in Jainism and might have Jain acquaintances. That was all. He would certainly not enter into partnership in business with his interesting friends, nor go deep into their private concerns. In such matters he would keep them at arm's length, however, he might be charmed by their marbles or drivel into their customs for the nonce. As a careful servant of Government in special, he would, in the absence of the most imperative reasons for a contrary course, decline any intimate connection, and certainly not entangle himself in any pecuniary obligations. No such imperative reasons were offered to us by our informant, and we could imagine none. Indeed, we knew Baboo Pratap Chandra Ghosha sufficiently to reject the story. His antecedents absolutely discredited it. He comes of a family remarkable for cold calculation. We can recall no instances of disinterested friendship or generous sacrifice. His father's long service in the judicial profession perhaps exaggerated the family prudence and harshness. The son is an intense copy of the father. Without any of the old Hindu gentleman's superficial grace of manner, he is far more repulsive, even forbidding. It would not become us to say so much of a respectable member of our society, if the fact were not notorious. For some years after the favour of Sir Ashley Eden enabled him to vault from a pay of Rs. 100 or so at a private establishment to a Government appointment carrying Rs. 500 or Rs. 600, over the heads of many deserving officers, not a man went to him on business who did not come away dissatisfied, not to say deeply mortified, by the insolence of the little man dressed in brief authority. The giddiness of sudden elevation might explain the phenomenon in the case of an ordinary man, but Pratap was a Pandit and was no parvenu. The theory was definitively abandoned when the distressing symptoms proved chronic. He is usually regarded as a scowling misanthrope, hating mankind and hated by them. The case is far from so bad as that. But, while the love of lucre is the same, we have not discerned in the son the moderate capacity for friendship of the father.

That such a man should meddle in what does not concern him, and, above all, handle the pitch of a dead Burra Bazar merchant's estate and effects in litigation between contending Jains, Marwarees and Oswals, seemed impossible. We were assured that it was so. But when we were told that Baboo Pratap Chandra Ghosha, son of the late Baboo Hurro Chunder Ghose, and Registrar of Calcutta, had stood security for Lab Chand, a scapegrace of a Jain hobbledohoy, to the extent of some seven lacs of Rupees, we simply refused to believe. But truth is strange, stranger than fiction, often times. And as we have of late encountered many marvels, here, there, everywhere, we could only put our informant to the proof. He has astonished us with it. It is indeed too true that the haughty Registrar of Calcutta has assisted the Jeweller Lab Chand to come into the estate of the deceased Jeweller Kulloo Mull by binding himself in double the sum of three lacs and thirty-nine thousand Rupees. The last is the amount of the administration bond granted by Lab Chand Sett and his two sureties Baboo Pratap Chandra Ghosha and Moncelal Khundelwall in respect of the estate of Kulloo Mull.

AKBAR.

Akbar was only a little over thirteen years of age, when he succeeded his father as King of Cabul and Hindostan. Concurrent testimony says that he was an unusually manly and intelligent little fellow, yet he must obviously have been incapable of administering the Government of his heritage in such troublous times; so that one is not surprised to learn that the arrangement inaugurated by his father was continued: During his father's life time he had been invested with the nominal command of the army in the Punjab, but Bairam Khan was the real head of that army. So now, Akbar was proclaimed King, but Bairam held the reins of Government. This nobleman was a Turkoman by birth, and, before Humayun's expulsion from India, had been a distinguished officer under him. He did not leave India with Humayun, as he was separated from his master in the final crushing defeat of that monarch by Shir Shah. He, however, joined him three years later at Sindh, via Guzerat, after going through a long and remarkable series of dangers and adventures, in his efforts to rejoin his King. Thence forward he became the most trusted of Humayun's officers.

Akbar was scarcely seated on the Musund, when he was called to repel the invasion of the Punjab by Secander, the usurper of the throne of Delhi, who had been driven out by Humayun. Secander was speedily overcome and taken prisoner, when he was allowed to retire to Bengal. The credit of this success is due to Bairam Khan.

As this is a sketch of the life of Akbar, I purpose to pass over the period of Bairam's administration, merely noticing the causes that led to his downfall and to Akbar's assuming the responsibilities of government just as he was approaching manhood, by which time Bairam Khan had reached the highest pitch of power ever attained by a subject; and it soon became evident that his fall was near, for, though possessing exceptional military talents, and the boldness and vigour so necessary for maintaining subordination, in an army composed of such rude materials as Akbar's, yet he had great blemishes of character, which a state of power served to develop rapidly. His temper was harsh and severe. His manners haughty and overbearing. And so jealous was he of his authority that he exacted unbounded obedience and respect, and would not suffer the smallest pretension to power or influence, derived from any source but his favour. These traits of character gave umbrage to many, and raised up a host of enemies, and even was the cause of alienating the mind of the young King. Akbar, however, was able rightly to value the past faithful services of this able man, and only desired to throw off his dominance; which he achieved thus. He took occasion when with a hunting party, to make a quick journey to Delhi, on the plea of a sudden illness of his mother. On reaching that city, he issued an immediate proclamation, announcing that he had taken the Government into his own hands, and forbidding obedience to orders issued by any other than his own authority. This act led to an open separation between him and his minister, and all ranks now forsook the failing man to pay court to the youthful sovereign. Bairam deeply felt the blow, and so discordant was the tone of his mind at this period, that he meditated on several rash schemes for retrieving his power. Eventually he hesitated between a plan for seizing the King's person, or setting up an independent principality in Malwa. Subsequently, better thoughts prevailed, and he relinquished these projects, and started for Nagar, with the avowed intention of embarking in Guzerat, for Mecca.

At Nagor, he lingered, as if in hopes of some change in his fortunes, until he received a message from Akbar, dismissing him from his office, and directing him to proceed forthwith on his pilgrimage. He immediately returned to the King all his insignia of office, and set out, as a private individual on his way to Guzerat. But stung by some further proceedings of Akbar, he changed his mind, collected a body of troops, and going openly into insurrection, attempted an invasion of the Punjab. Akbar moved against him in person, and sent out detachments to intercept him. He was defeated by one of these detachments, constrained to fly to the hills, and at length reduced to throw himself on the King's mercy. Akbar, with notable delicacy, sent his chief nobles to meet him at some distance, and to conduct him to the royal tent. When Bairam appeared in Akbar's presence, he threw himself at the King's feet, and, moved by former recollections, the old man sobbed aloud. Akbar instantly raised him with his own hand, seated him on his right, and, after investing him with a dress of honour, gave him his choice of one of the principal Governments under the crown, a high station at court, or an honourable dismissal for the purpose of his pilgrimage to Mecca. Bairam chose the last offer. He was assigned a liberal pension, and proceeded to Guzerat. But while he was preparing for his embarkation, he was assassinated by an Afghan.

Akbar was but a youth of eighteen, and the charge he had taken on himself seemed beyond his strength. But he possessed unusual advantages, both natural and from education. Nevertheless, he needed all his great qualities to maintain him in the position in which he had placed himself. That which made his position stable, was the design he formed at this period, and it was a truly noble design, of letting merit, irrespective of nationality or creed, be the sole ground for advancement under his Government. By such a purpose, he really placed himself at the head of the whole Indian nation, forming the inhabitants of this great land, without distinction of race or religion, into one community. This policy was pursued without deviation, throughout his reign. He admitted Hindus to every degree of power, and Mussulmans of every party to the highest stations in the service. And the consequence was, that as far as his dominions extended, they were filled with a loyal and united people.

XVII.

Akbar began his reign as master only of the Punjab and the country round Delhi and Agra. In the third year he acquired Ajmere: in the fourth he obtained possession of Gwalior: in the fifth he drove the Afghans out of Lucknow, and the country on the Ganges as far east as Jounpore; and the tide of conquest from this point flowed steadily on; there were checks received, but these checks only served to magnify the great results obtained by his arms. At this period in his history, two occurrences should be noticed, as they serve to make prominent remarkable traits in Akbar's character. Shir Shah II, a descendant of the famous Shir Shah, Humayun's successful rival, advanced with a large army to Jounpore, in the hope of recovering his dominions. He was totally defeated by the force Akbar sent against him, under the command of Khan Zeman; but this officer after the victory thought to despise the youth and feeble resources of his master, and not only withheld the king's portion of the spoil, but manifested such a high spirit of independence, that Akbar proceeded in person to the residence of the refractory nobleman, who, taken by surprise, displayed more dutiful behaviour, and was pardoned. The next case occurred in Malwa. The king sent one Adham Khan, at the head of a contingent, into Malwa, with orders to expel Baz Bahadur therefrom. Adham was successful, but he was as little disposed, as Khan Zeman had been, to part with the fruits of his victory. Akbar made a rapid march to his camp, not waiting for any open act of mutiny, and, no doubt, frustrated, by his activity, the ill-designs of his general; for Adham Khan was unprepared for such a crisis, and immediately submitted. His offence was pardoned, but he was removed from Malwa.

Akbar had many Uzbek officers in his army, who, becoming dissatisfied, revolted under the leadership of the above-mentioned Khan Zeman, and Asaf Khan. The latter became a rebel, because he was detected embezzling. This rebellion occupied more than two years of Akbar's attention and was attended with various success. Just as he was making rapid progress towards subduing it, his attention was diverted by the invasion of the Punjab from Cabul, by his brother Hakim. Akbar was forced to proceed to resist this invasion, and was engaged in this duty for several months. On his return, he found that the rebels had not only regained ground lost previously, but had obtained possession of the greater portion of the Subahs of Oudh and Allahabad. He marched against them at once, though it was the height of the rainy season; drove them across the Ganges; and when they thought themselves secure behind that swollen river, he made a forced march through a flooded country, swam the Ganges at nightfall, with his advance guard of less than 2,000 men, on horses and elephants, and, after lying concealed during the night, attacked the enemy at dawn, and gained a complete victory over vastly superior numbers. Akbar's reign was marked by continuous advancement, and success after success attended his arms.

On one of his marches, he met two large bodies of Hindus at a bathing ghat, and finding them prepared, according to custom, to contend sword in hand for the possession of the place, he endeavoured at first, by all possible and probable means, to bring them to reason, and to arrange an amicable settlement of the matter. But the Hindus would fight, so, at last, he permitted them to have their way and to fight it out, while he looked on at the conflict in which they immediately engaged. At length one party prevailed, and Akbar, to prevent the slaughter that would have followed, ordered his guards to stop the victors, and thus put an end to the battle.

By this time Akbar had crushed, by his vigour, all adversaries in his own territories, or had attached them to the throne by acts of clemency. He therefore was free to turn his attention to the extension of his dominions. He first came into collision with the Rajput Princes. Of these, Jeypore was already allied to him. The Rajah of Jeypore was his father-in-law, and also held high rank in the imperial army, being a commander of 5,000. Odeypore was the first place attacked, the Rana of which withdrew on the approach of the invading army. He was, for a Rajput, a man of extremely feeble character. The fort, however, was well garrisoned, and was commanded by Jei Mal, an able and courageous chief, who resolved to defend it to the last extremity, as the place was looked upon, by all Rajputs, as a sanctuary. Akbar was in command of the besieging army, and he purposed to carry the place by assault rather than by a slow siege. The breaches, however, were not to be accomplished by a battery, but by the aid of mines. In two places mines were sunk, and the storming party being prepared, fire was set to the train. The explosion of the mines was the signal for them to rush forward. There was the report of a single explosion only, when the troops in their impetuosity rushed forward, and had begun to climb the trench, when the second mine exploded, destroying many of both parties, and striking the assailants with such panic that they fled. All the operations had to be recommended. Jei Mal was indefatigable, personally superintending the repairs, which he carried on even at night by torchlight. One night, Akbar was visiting the trenches, when he perceived Jei Mal on the works, and immediately singled him out, and shot him through the head with his own hand. On the death of the gallant Jei Mal, the garrison lost heart, abandoned the trenches, and withdrew to the interior of the fort. Akbar's soldiers mounted the ramparts unopposed. In the meanwhile, the Rajputs devoted themselves to death with the usual solemnities. The women were consigned to the flames with the body of Jei Mal, and the men rushed out to meet death from the Moslem's swords. It is stated that eight thousand Rajputs perished on this occasion. All the Rajputs, however, did not adopt this course of self-sacrifice. One body, numbering about two thousand, shrank from the ordeal, and acted on a contrary principle: these men bound the hands of their women and children, and marched with them through the Mussulman army, who took them to be a party of their own people in charge of prisoners, and thus permitted them to pass through and escape.

Though Akbar gained possession of the fortress, he did not by this means subdue the young Rana. Rana Pertab was a young man possessed of qualities quite the opposite of those possessed by his father. Instead of being nervous and weak-minded, he was a high-spirited prince, who, though compelled to fly before the conqueror, remained independent in his fastnesses, and before Akbar's death, succeeded in regaining a great portion of his dominions.

The House of Odeypore rejected with scorn all matrimonial alliances with the Kings of Delhi, and looked upon the other Rajput Chiefs as contaminated by their intercourse with an alien race, and therefore they renounced all affinity with them. Two of Akbar's queens were of the House of Jeypore and Marwar; and the bride of his eldest son was another Rajput princess. In fact, such alliances came in time to be coveted by the Hindu Rajahs, who looked upon them as an honour, and were far from considering that such intermarriages entailed loss of caste.

MONGHYR.

Jamalpur, June 12.

The Barwaree got up at Monghyr after the example set by Jamalpur, went off the other day with great pomp. The deity worshipped on the occasion, was Bindoo Basbeenee. The image and idols were nicely made. The puppet dancing too was good. The (Ashur) accommodation for spectators was spacious enough to admit a goodly number of people, and beautifully decorated. The reception given to the men in general was excellent.

The hired Opera party secured from Lower Bengal for a large sum did not give sufficient amusement. It was no doubt a sad disappointment.

A party of Bengalee Magicians from Calcutta were here and showed their skill in the Railway Boys' Mechanic Institute the other night. Their performance was commendable.

An ascetic by name Kebul Dass Babajee breathed his last the other day in his Thakoor Barea at Kesubpore in Jamalpur at a very advanced age. The people say he was a centenarian, being about 120 years old. Apart from any other virtues in the capacity of a (Sadhu) ascetic as he was, he cured several intricate cases of diseases, such as leprosy &c., by administering indigenous drugs only and his loss is mourned by a large circle of Beharees.

A fatal accident took place in the E. I. Railway Workshops here on Wednesday the 6th current. A native workman of this place, tall, good featured and robust, whilst engaged in handling a heavy brack, the handle all of a sudden gave way, striking him on the head and killing him instantaneously. It is a great pity indeed to see that these poor creatures die an untimely death through roughly handling machinery in a careless manner.

A heavy gale passing through Surjgurrah and its environs very recently, (between Kajra and Luckeesraai stations) caused several huts to be destroyed and trees uprooted.

The heat here is now very trying and quite unbearable.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Health's Defences. None save the strongest can with impunity pass through the sudden transitions from wet to dry, from cold to muggy weather so prevalent during the autumnal and early winter months. Influenza, bronchitis, cough, sore throat, or quinsy will attack those most watchful of their health; but they can readily arrest any of these complaints by rubbing Holloway's Ointment twice a day upon the skin over the affected parts, and by assisting its corrective action with appropriate doses of his Pills. This well-known, safe, and easy mode of treatment efficiently protects the invalid both from present and future danger without weakening or even disturbing the system in the slightest degree.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

tation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his consideration and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that comeliness which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by
SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY
(Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression. It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

STANZAS ON THE DEATH OF FRIEDRICH III., EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

"Among many nations there was no king like him."—Nehemiah.

I.

HARK ! 'tis again the min'ster's tolling bell
Proclaims the dismal message far and wide,
"The Emperor is dead ! " O mournful knell !
Struck at the hearts so lately sorely tried,
When he their Father and their hero died.
O ! when that solemn knell for him was toll'd,
How wistful gazed the sun e'en as he spied
That fun'ral train ; "ere those loved limbs be cold,"
He sighed, "O Father, they shall lay me by thy side."

II.

Feelings are prophecies : that hour has come ;
The mourned and mourner number with the past ;
O'er every German city, tower, and home,
~~Far sifter than the wild-tornado blast,~~
The gathered gloom of double night is cast ;
No sigh escapes within a scene so dread ;
No eye weeps more, that wept ere this full fast ;
A rev'rent awe holds every breath instead ;
There is a dreadful pause around the holy dead !

III.

Yet while the gathered gaze upon that brow,
Cold, dull, the rays of royalty withdrawn
Those eyes, no more to watch the weal or woe
Of Germany ; the tide of grief rushed on,
The people wept, the warriors wept anon ;
"Fritz, lieber Fritz," burst forth from every tongue,
"Alas our Fritz, thou gone—for ever gone !"
So thus the stricken nation, loud and long,
Around the lonely palace wept, by sorrow wrung.

IV.

Yet ere the diadem begirt his brow,
And ere imperial robes his form array'd,
"Death marked him for its own ;" ye knew as now,
The crown hid not the seal of Death, nor play'd
Its dazzling gems that Death may be delay'd
Or blinded by their glare—drawn to its head
The arrow by the arm of death was stay'd Awaiting for the hour the prince was led To Glory's highest seat, when straight it fatal sped !

V.

But O, what high-reared hopes are overthrown !
What disappointment deep for years of fame !
And thou, fair Empress of a day ! how lone Thy heart ! how false and empty sounds thy name !
Yet thine a higher boast—each high, each lowly dame
The virtues of a tried and perfect wife
In thee their brightest, best example claim :
We saw thy love how strong to calm the strife
That Death was waging with thy noble husband's life.

VI.

O Royal Flower of England ! lowly bent
Beneath the dewy tears of grief, arise !
For in thy sorrow feelings high be bent ;
The martyr now has pass'd into the skies ;
Yet nothing of his glory with him dies ;
His name among the first on Hist'ry's page
Shall catch each emulative hero's eyes ;
Nor length of time, nor any envious age,
Shall blot the name of Fritz—the hero, martyr, sage !

VII.

O thou, young scion of a noble Sire !
What grand, what awful duties now are thine !
Thou hope, thou promise of a great Empire !
With thy heroic ancestors combine ;
Perpetuate the honour of thy line ;
And yet a higher task as good as grand,
In thee may all our German virtues shine,
May all thy people be a happy band,
And God be ever with thee, GERMAN FATHERLAND !
C. THIELMANN.

TO MATTHEW ARNOLD.

FROM EDWIN ARNOLD.

Suffer that—as thou takest boat to cross
Grim Charon's stream, on voyage, heavy loss
To England—but to thee gain manifold—
I pluck thee by the shroud, and press thy cold
Forgetful hand ; to lay this obolus
Into its honoured palm ! Ah ! think on us
In thy new walks upon the Asphodel ;
Nor quite forsake the sad sphere where we dwell,
Fighting thy battle, lending our small stress
To "stream which maketh unto Righteousness" !
Now, that thou better knowest friends and foes,
Good Friend ! dear Rival ! bear no grudge to those Who had not time, in Life's hard fight to show
How well they liked thee for thy "slashing blow" ;
How "sweet" thy "reasonableness" seemed ; how right
Thy lofty pleading for the long dimmed "light" !
Thou, that didst bear my Name, and deck it so
That—coming thus behind—hardly I know
If I shall hold it worthily, and be Meet to be mentioned in one Age with thee—
Take, Brother ! to the Land where no strifes are,
This praise thou will not need ! Before the Star
Is kindled for thee let my funeral torch
Light thee, dear Namesake ! to th'Elysian Porch ;
Dead Poet ! let a poet of thy House
Lay, unproved, these bay-leaves on thy brow !
We, that seemed only friends, were lovers : Now
Death knows it ! and Love knows ! and I ! and Thou !

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

VERILY, it is the day of jubilation on any conceivable pretext. The tercentenary of the Spanish Armada was lately celebrated in England. The total failure of that great invasion and destruction of the invading fleet, is the turning point in the history of the nation. It was just the event to unite all England in a burst of patriotic jubilation. Who would not listen when the call is—

Attend all ye who list to hear our noble England's praise,
I tell of the thrice famous deeds she wrought in ancient days.
When that great fleet invincible against her bore in vain
The richest spoils of Mexico, the stoutest hearts of Spain.

Yet, for want of proper management, the celebration was a miserable affair, rendered more disreputable by the abuse lavished on the occasion on the Catholics and Popery.

ONE would have thought that by this the British could not bear the name of Irish, so much have they suffered from the men, manners, and matters of the sister island, during the last several years. They are far from tired of the Irish yet. They are getting up an Irish Exhibition in the very heart of their metropolis. It will be distinctively Irish, we are told, and thoroughly national we suppose. There will be a real Irish village on the scene, and already a true son of Ould Oireland, though an Irish peer, is active in realising the project. The whole would fitly end with a Donnybrook Fair. With the Irish element already in the great city, not to take into account that of the great towns of Lancashire, Lord Leitrim and his compatriots on the Committee will not have to go far, nor experience much difficulty, in giving the final national finish.

COLONEL OLCOTT having climbed up the Neilgheries to Ooty, must bring himself down to the level of that fashionable resort. He delivered a Lecture at Snowdon House on the congenial subject of "The Noble Army of Ghosts and their Mansions." These mansions were formerly understood to be in the Himalayas. Have the spirits tired of their old residences and moved South? The whole thing was in keeping. Old Colonel Hughes Hallett presided, ladies patronised, and for a lady's benefit the seance was held.

THE other day the Indian Mirror spoke of Tulsidas as among the authorities in the medical literature of India. The Lucknow Express just received contains an account of the buried city of Sravasti identified by General Cunningham with Set Met, a village near the residence of the Maharaja of Bulrampore in the District of Gonda, in which mention is twice made of a Chinese Traveller with the classical-looking name of Fabian.

THE oldest journalist in Europe is an Englishman who, for his political services, has been knighted. We refer, of course, to Sir Edward Baines, of Leeds, who commenced his newspaper career some three years after the battle of Waterloo, and is still at it. He is indeed the Patriarch of the Press.

THE following from an English paper is going round :—

"At the beginning of last year, English barristers had rather a rough time of it; their little ways of taking fees for services they never performed were dwelt upon by the members of 'the lower branch of the profession' with considerable pertinacity. The gentlemen of the long robe tided over it, and are now having their innings. There is scarcely a week in which, in some law court or another, a 'solc'r' does not catch it from the bench for neglect of duty to his client. The following is a story which, it is reasonable to suppose, emanates from one who wears a wig. A client requesting his solicitor Mr. A., to bring about an interview with his counsel, Mr. B., the three met together, and B., having been put into possession of the facts of the case, expressed his opinion that it had not a leg to stand upon, and that they had much better not go into court. The client acquiesced, and A. and B. walked away together. 'What on earth made you give the man such advice as that?' inquired A. indignantly. B.: 'Because I am certain that he has no case.' A.: 'Good heavens—as if that were any reason!' B.: 'I think it a very good one. Why, what would you have said to your client if—as was certain to happen—we had been beaten all round, and had to pay heavy costs, I should like to know?' A.: 'Well, I'll tell you. I should have told him that the judge was a fool, and that the jury were fools, but that you were the greatest fool of all!'"

That is not a bad revenge for the insolence with which the brief-proud lawyer treats the junior branch of the profession which feeds him.

THE Daily News's London Correspondence contains this curious news, which might easily be attributed to the debauch on the Armada Jubilee: "There is a proposal on foot to celebrate the two-hundredth anniversary of the Pope's birth-day with a festival," &c.

A young father is ordinarily a reproach. A young Holy Father would be a shocking anomaly. As a matter of fact, the anomaly does not shock, being not. As a rule, Popes are old men, and they go on advancing in years hale and hearty. It is but fitting. They have the vitality of the Church which they represent and rule—the same tenacity of life. They are no less Patriarchs than their rivals of the Eastern Churches, and they do well to be long-lived. But though they frequently threaten to do so, they never attain patriarchal length of days.

WE read in our contemporaries :—

"At the Sudder Court of Indore on Monday last, Khema Naique, the bunjara charged with harbouring the notorious Tantia, was sentenced to seven years' rigorous imprisonment."

That shows little appreciation of the functions of the different Courts. Sudder Courts do not usually pass sentence, and Indore is very well provided with a complete judicial machinery after the British model. In fact, their radical defect is perhaps a too slavish copying of the British organization.—The poor Naique had appealed against the sentence of the lower court and his appeal was rejected on Monday the 25th June.

"A correspondent of a Kurrachee paper writes: 'The other day while Dr. Pollen was walking in the streets of Mirpur Mathelo, he met a man riding a terribly galled jackass. He stopped the man and remonstrated with him, and when a crowd gathered round him, he pointed out to them how cruel it was to torture dumb animals in that fashion. He threatened to take the offender before the magistrate. By this time quite a representative crowd, consisting of the village mukhi and the punchayet among the rest, had assembled, and the mukhi intervened on behalf of the offending man and begged the saheb to pardon him. Said the saheb, 'the man did not hurt me, and I cannot pardon him. Let him ask the donkey's pardon if he likes.' Whereupon the mukhi and the offender both prostrated themselves before the ass, and the animal, struck no doubt with the unwonted humility of his torturer, brayed out some distinct notes of forgiveness, as the crowd understood it. Afterwards the crowd dispersed, pleased with the pleasant termination of what had threatened to be a serious trouble."

And is that all? Surely, it is ass all over. This ass business started well, but the braying was an ominous ending, evidently affecting, more or less, all the humans concerned. We are sorry for Dr. Pollen, of whom we expected better than to think he would so easily collapse. For as much as he is neither tyrant nor bully, and showed a disposition to knock the poor villagers down to justice and humanity to the lower animals, we truly respect him. But that an Indian Civilian should subside under the assinine pantomime of the mukhi and the donkey-rider, is humiliating. These Sind villagers might be of a literal Scotch type of mind, but it is just possible that they simply humbugged the "Heaven born." It was certainly a good joke, whether conscious or unconscious, their taking the British Pandit of the Civil Service at his word. It is not unlikely, however, that European forgiveness being usually a matter of form—a social convention, rarely meant in earnest—Dr. Pollen was satisfied with the men begging the donkey's pardon in the native fashion. He should have taken some sort of a guarantee—even a bare promise—that the poor animal was not worked or maltreated.

It is perhaps as well for even the general reader to know that—

"The greatest known depth of the ocean is midway between the Island of Tristan d'Acunha and the mouth of the Rio de La Plata. The bottom was here reached at a depth of 46,236 feet or eight and three-fourth miles, exceeding by more than 17,000 feet the height of Mount Everest, the loftiest mountain in the world. In the North Atlantic Ocean, south of New Foundland, soundings have been made to a depth of 4,580 fathoms of 27,480 feet; while depth equalling 34,000 feet, or six and one-half miles, is reported south of Bermuda Islands. The average depth of the Pacific Ocean between Japan and California, is a little over 2,000 fathoms; between Chili and the Sandwich Islands, 2,500 fathoms; and between Chili and New Zealand, 1,500 fathoms. The average depth of all the oceans is from 2,000 to 3,000 fathoms."

MR. H. LUTTMAN-JOHNSON having obtained furlough, Mr. C. J. Lyall, C. I. E., Secretary to the Chief Commissioner of Assam, officiates for him as Judge and Commissioner, Assam Valley Districts, while Mr. F. C. Daukes acts the Secretary.

MR. J. G. H. GLASS, Executive Engineer 1st Grade, has been appointed Superintending Engineer and Secretary to the Chief Commissioner, Central Provinces, in the Public Works Department.

THE Gilchrist Trustees, unwilling "to sever their connection with the Educational advancement of India," have decided to continue the Scholarship "for the present and until further notice on the same conditions as heretofore." It will be "offered again on the result of the Matriculation Examination of the University of London, which will be held as usual in India in January next 1889." The Trustees are Richard Leigh Holland, Esq., (Chairman), Rt. Hon. Lyon Playfair, C. B., M. P., LL. D., F. R. S., Sir Ughtred James Kay-Shuttleworth, Bart., and the Hon. Alfred Lyttleton. All communications are to be addressed to the Secretary, (Mr. Henry A. Papps), 4, the Sanctuary, London, S. W.

This Scholarship, like the Degrees and other Academical Rewards of the University of London, is open to women equally with men. It is of the value of £150 per annum, tenable for four years in Great Britain "with a view to Graduation, in one of the Faculties of Arts, Science, Law, or Medicine, in the University of London." Further particulars will be found in the Supplement to the Gazette of India, June 23, 1888, and the Calcutta Gazette of the 27th, Part I.

THERE will be an Agricultural and Industrial Exhibition in Mysore in October next. It will be opened at Mysore at 8 A.M., on the 15th, and will continue for four days. There will be prizes, of course, and they will be distributed at the close of the Show. "In addition to the money prize each winner of a prize will be entitled to a certificate. Medals equivalent in value to the money prize may be awarded at the option of the prize-winner." Besides, "Honorab!e mention" will be awarded. The highest prize—Rs. 100—has been reserved for the "best and most economical arrangements for raising water for irrigation purposes, suitable to rayyets of average means."

THE Home remittances from 1st April to 23rd June, 1888, amounted to £3,463,300, the Budget estimate for the year ending 31st March 1889, being £14,000,000.

WHITE Cooke against Black cook is the latest sensation, legal and social, in Mhow.

What are we coming to? On the 10th June, Major Cooke, paymaster, 6th Dragoons, before a crowded court, besieged by a vast number of eager visitors, native and European, appeared to prosecute his barwarchi—not for poisoning him with copper from untinned utensils, or bad cuisine, or theft of meat and condiments, but for—let us say, lost prestige. He complained in fact, of a—black eye, and invoked the vengeance of the law or the magistrate on the formidable fellow who was the author of his injury. Formerly, the Whiteman would give a handsome Bakshish to the blackman who gave him a black eye.

PARIS with a population of less than 2,000,000, contains 20 centenarians (11 men + 9 women) and 6,386 octogenarians. We wonder how many are there in Calcutta. Now we are nearing the verge, the question has for us more than a public interest.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

MR. DILLON'S conviction naturally caused great irritation in the Home Rule Party. The astute leaders of the Party were not of course slow to perceive in the incident their opportunity for political capital. As soon as the conviction was confirmed on appeal, Mr. Gladstone, the Grand Patron of the Party, gave notice of motion for a vote of censure on the Ministry, founded on the whole working of the Coercion Act in Ireland, and the Government fixed last Monday for the debate. Accordingly, on the evening of the 25th, the debate came on. But, instead of Mr. Gladstone, the attack was led by his Lieutenant, the Grand Old Man reserving himself for any contingency. The orders of the day being postponed, Mr. John Morley rose and moved the vote of censure, in an intemperate speech, charging the Government with brutality in working the Crimes Act and actually accusing them of intending to murder a political opponent by imprisoning Mr. Dillon. The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, apparently without noticing Mr. Morley's wild language, insisting on the value of the Act in suppressing agrarian crimes, and asserting that its working had been restoring the people's confidence in the reign of law. The debate was resumed next evening, when Mr. Gladstone appeared as an active combatant on the field. He seems to have made no great point, confining himself, for the most part, to criticising the conduct of certain Magistrates in Ireland, who seem to be a well-known Indian type. Of course, he was severe on the Government for the treatment to which the Honourable Member for East Mayo (Mr. John Dillon) had been subjected, under the provisions of the Act for the repression of discreditable and dangerous offences in Ireland. The Chief Secretary, in closing the debate, maintained that the policy of Government in Ireland had proved far more of a success than they had ventured to hope for, although, of course, much remains to be accomplished. On the House dividing, the motion was lost, 273 voting for and 362 against it.

The result shows the Ministry strong. The entente cordiale between the sober Liberals and the Conservatives, which brought it to power and maintains it, continues. Mr. Gladstone, by his impatient rashness, simply courted defeat and thereby injured his party for nothing. It is a wonder that the cooler judgment of his Grand Vizier—Mr. Morley—did not dissuade his Chief from plunging the party into a premature engagement. Is it possible they relied a great deal too much upon the effect of Lord Randolph Churchill's recent damaging evidence against his former colleagues? There was more danger to the Ministry from the growing impatience of the British of the long continuance of power in the same hands. It were a pity to change the present Administration, until the experiment on which the Government were engaged in Ireland was concluded, one way or the other. Instead of disturbing them, the true policy of enlightened patriotism should be to support them in establishing the reign of law in Ireland once for all, before discussing the future. That is precisely what we grieve to see the Radicals pledged to Irish Home Rule are not doing. Apart from the Irish bone of contention, the Ministry has been generally reasonable, scarcely excepting foreign politics on which Lord Salisbury was understood to be uncompromising and extreme. As regards India, we have little to hope from a Liberal Ministry in the immediate future.

THE Gladstonians are up for Eutopia and revolution in any direction. They supported the mischievous Channel Tunnel scheme. Luckily, the House of Commons are not yet prepared to take this great leap in the dark, and rejected the Bill by 142 votes.

WE do not usually deal in on dits and inchoate movements. But we have heard a rumour much too important to withhold. The reader cannot yet have forgotten how some foolish and unprincipled politicians were, day after day, abusing the Viceroy in the wildest terms, not only for what he had done but also for what they knew he had contemplated. Notwithstanding his repeated assurances, in public and private, of sympathy with the aspirations of the people, Lord Dufferin was accused of harbouring the darkest designs against their liberties. In specific terms he was charged with having urged the Home Government to sanction a policy of repression. And the charge was persisted in, after it was contradicted. Notwithstanding, it was believed in well-informed circles that, so far from doing anything of the kind, Lord Dufferin had done just the opposite. It was even understood that he had recommended a large measure of constitutional reform and had received an acknowledgment from the Home Government, which enemies would call a wiggling. There was little doubt that the irreconcilables of the Bengali press was doing the Viceroy shocking injustice. It would seem that he generously forgave the injury and persisted in his liberal scheme. At that time it seems he had not the full support of the Council, and probably advantage was taken of that fact to put him off. Better counsels have since prevailed, and now a general recommendation has, we believe, gone for reconstituting the several Legislative Councils on a more liberal basis, on a formal recognition of the principle of representation.

IMPERIAL Delhi, great even in her fall, has taken the shine out of the rest of the Empire, on the melancholy occasion of the death of the Emperor of Germany. The people of the great City held a large meeting, in the Town Hall, to mourn over the sad bereavement of our sovereign in the loss of her most eminent and renowned Imperial son-in-law Frederick III. A Prince of the Imperial House of Timour fittingly presided at this demonstration of sorrow of the Imperial City for the death of a great Emperor, who was so dear to our Empress of India. He was no figure-head of a chairman, but expressed himself on the topic before the meeting with the eloquence and finished Urdu of a Prince of the Mahomedan Athens of India. He concluded with proposing a humble address of condolence to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Empress of India, on the sad event. He was seconded in befitting terms by Khan Bahadur Syad Hadi Hassan. The motion was carried by acclamation. Other cities and towns should not lose time in following this prompt example.

MR. SCONCE returns to duty in the Calcutta Small Cause Court, next Monday. Mr. Jones consequently goes back to his own place as third Judge, Mr. Chatterjee acts the fourth, and Baboo Jodoonath Roy reverts to his own at Sealdah.

MR. O. BEEBY, Barrister-at-law, seems to have established a kind of lien on Government employment. He more than once officiated as a Judge in the Court of Small Causes, Calcutta, but there being no vacancy there at present, he is to be provided elsewhere. Mr. Kilby, Deputy Legal Remembrancer, goes on leave from 14th July to 9th October next. Mr. Beeby will during this period deputy-superintend the legal affairs of Government. Heaven help the Government!

SOAP is not a bad thing at all. It may be a very good thing indeed—specially to fashionable painters in these days when Art has penetrated to the crowded stalls in the busy market-place, where it is used, and used up, as a sort of barmaid to draw. A veteran artist, Sir John Millais, has painted for the grand Savonjees, Messrs Pears, for a trade-mark, a picture worthy of his reputation. It was perhaps a desecration of High Art, a degradation of genius, to play itself into the hands of low Traffic and help in the tricks of trade, but grand sunsets are not even manna, much less meat and drink, and High Art cannot live upon clouds and rainbows, and artists are, after all, men, specially fashionable painters. If the Pears have succeeded in their object, they have made an adequate sacrifice. The great Savonjees have caught their whale with a magnificent bait of nearly thirty thousand Rupees of Indian money (£2,000.)

WE have not long read anything from Europe so captivating as the following evidence of good Samaritanism. It refers to the passage of the Abdel Kader, French steam boat, from Marseilles to Algeria.

"Just as the vessel was about two hours out the skies became quite black with swallows. It was then about six o'clock in the evening. The birds alighted in thousands on the sails, ropes, and yards of the Abdel-Kader. After a pecky survey of the deck from their eminence aloft they descended coolly on deck, hopped about among the sailors and passengers, and eventually found their way into the cabins both fore and aft. The birds were evidently fatigued, after a long flight, and allowed themselves to be caught by the people of the ship, who gave them a welcome reception, and provided them with food, which they enjoyed heartily. The little winged strangers remained all night on the vessel, and in the morning at seven o'clock, the head look out bird had, no doubt, sighted the Balearic Isles, for the whole flock made for land, after having spent a comfortable and refreshing night on boardship."

What a relief to know that they did not bring out their guns and shoot the poor tired buddies!

These good seamen fed and sheltered little angels unawares. Such is the light in which our Hindu imagination—pace Mr. Townsend in the Contemporary—loves to regard the little incident. The hospitality shown by the French sailors to the feathered strangers will, we are persuaded, stand them in better stead than all their prayers and all the fasts and vigils and self-torture enjoined by the Church.

THEY are trying in England to introduce mechanical appliances to tramways, whereby straying into the rails may be saved from a horrible death. There was lately an experiment at Birmingham with India rubber imitations of little specimens of the human breed under the designation of "child catchers"—the imitations being so called, of course, not the specimens. But it was not considered quite satisfactory. They will try again, doubtless. In the meantime, will somebody introduce on the Indian ways "horse preservers"? In the awful weather through which we have passed, how mercilessly were dumb creatures of God tortured for the convenience of man! In fact, it is unfair and immoral to lay such burdens on the poor beasts. The humanity of the land ought to interfere in behalf of those who are unable to speak. The Government and legislature are indifferent to a wrong which no Societies are pledged to remove and no press cares to expose. What are the practical difficulties of steam?

IT would seem that there is a body in Calcutta called the Arya Samaj. This Society has been exercised about the contents and drift of the ancient scriptures of the Hindus, the Veda. The leading spirits are apparently orthodox Hindus according to the orthodoxy of the day, that is, worshippers of Divinity in the forms of gods and goddesses—idolaters in fact—unburdened with extensive knowledge of their sacred books and unembarrassed by metaphysical difficulties. They were not allowed peace, however, being assailed by impertinent doubters, within and without the ranks of Hindu society. They were confronted by a growing opinion that the Veda of their veneration do not propound or support the prevailing system of polytheism. Till this heresy was demolished, there was little hope of the propagation of popular Hinduism or of recalling those members of Hindu society who, whether from the effect of education or the influence of foreigners, are daily being alienated from the hereditary faith.

As a Society for the diffusion of the gospel of Hinduism, they found it necessary, as a first step, before undertaking any operations, to prove that Hinduism as popularly understood and practised, had its warrant in the Veda. They seem to be all business men or ordinary men not belonging to the learned class or the theological or ecclesiastical profession, and they have gone about it in a business way. Accordingly, they invited a tender. They advertised in the Statesman, through their Secretary, offering to pay Rs. 5,000 to any one who would prove image worship—Sakaropasana—from the Veda. We see that the challenge has been accepted, or at least one gentleman has answered the invitation. Under the head of Durbhunga, a letter appears in the Tirhoot Courier of the 27th from Ambica Dutt Vyas, who sends a copy of his letter to the Secretary of the Arya Samaj, Calcutta, offering to do the required thing, provided the Rs. 5,000 is deposited in bank till the controversy is decided.

AFTER repeated condonation, Canteen Sergeant Ernest Augustus Culley, of the 17th Lancers, prayed for a divorce for his wife's (Elizabeth Anne Cully) adultery with Sergeant-Major William Merry and Troop Sergeant Holland Turton, of the same regiment. The Judicial Commissioner of Oudh considered the adultery proved against Merry and ordered dissolution of marriage, subject to confirmation by the High Court. Before the matter came up there—before Chief Justice Sir John Edge and Justices Brodhurst and Mahmood—the parties had made up their differences and were man and wife again. An application was therefore made not to confirm the lower Court's order. Whereupon, the Chief Justice delivered a somewhat long and lucid judgment, which has been summarised as follows. He said that—"he would have had no difficulty as to the course to be pursued had it not been for a doubt of one of his learned brother Judges on the Bench. In his opinion they should deal with this as with all other cases between private litigants, and the Court should not go out of its way, and uninvited, to press a decree without any motion being made in Court. Here the two parties who were the persons most interested—namely, the husband and wife—asked the Court by holding its hand not to dissolve the marriage, which they were willing, should continue. His lordship could not understand why they should be in a worse position by appearing before the Court with such a request than they would have been had they gone on and cohabited after the passing of the decree nisi and had brought that fact to the notice of the Court. The decree nisi did not dissolve the marriage until the rule was made absolute. Indeed, until the time had elapsed for appeal to the Privy Council, the parties continued to be for all purposes man and wife. If a petitioner or a respondent in the case, before the marriage had been actually dissolved, should marry, he or she would be liable to a conviction for bigamy. Should they come together after the decree nisi and cohabit before the marriage was so actually dissolved, the petitioner in that case by cohabiting with the respondent would condone the adultery which was in the present case the basis of the decree nisi. It had been suggested that it was their duty to go on and consider the case on the merits, i. e., on the evidence on the record in the Court below, and to consider if the decree was properly obtained and if so, to make it absolute here; that although the wife had repented, and although the husband was willing to condone the adulterous acts of his wife and take her back to live with him, their Lordships, sitting as a Court of Justice, were bound, contrary to the wishes of the parties, to pass a decree absolute against the parties, who were anxious that the marriage should continue. References had been made to capital cases which the Court had to consider, even in the absence of the parties, whether a capital conviction should be confirmed. That was a provision which had been made by statute for the protection of a subject, and for the protection of a subject as against the Crown. He could not see how the duties of the Court in such confirmation cases could throw any light upon the duties of this Court in civil actions.

Reference had also been made to the Ajmere Act, an Act he was not familiar with, but which he understood was an Act which enabled a judicial authority in Ajmere to invoke the assistance of this Court on questions of law which might arise there. Similar power was given to the Judges of the Small Cause Courts. In the Ajmere Act it expressly provided that the parties need not appear, and he assumed that the persons who framed that Act thought there was a necessity for that expressed provision. But, even whether those views were expressed or not in the Act, he failed to see how the duties of this Court on references of the Ajmere Court, or the Small Cause Court Act, or under the Stamp Act could apply. The object of those references was that this Court, as the highest judicial authority in these Provinces, should assist the Commissioner of Ajmere or Judge of the Small Cause Court, as the case may be, on points of law on which the difficulty arose. Looking at the Divorce Act itself under Section 16, in cases in which the High Court has itself passed a decree nisi, it was provided that the High Court should fix a time, at the expiration of which a decree absolute may be made. It was expressly provided that if the petitioner did not apply in a reasonable time to have the decree nisi made absolute, the High Court might dismiss the suit. His Lordship had not a shadow of doubt that they had power to accede to the application, and that it was an application to which, in the interests of justice and of morality, they should accede. Suppose this Court made the decree nisi absolute, what would be the effect? After the time had expired for appeal to the Privy Council, these parties would cease to be man and wife, and they could the next day go and be re-married. In the meantime, the Court, by making the decree nisi absolute, would be keeping these parties in suspense until that time had expired with no possible object. In his Lordship's opinion the only order they could pass now was that the Court do not confirm the decree nisi of the 21st December against these parties."

That is conclusive from the point of English law, and we wonder how Mr. Justice Mahmood, who we believe was the dissenting Judge, could hold out against the logic. Had the question been one of Hindu Law, the Chief Justice's argument would not have been to the purpose. The principle of that Law is the preservation of purity of blood, and such condonation as that of the parties in this case goes against the Hindu grain. The Mahomedan Law too, with its Iddul, is against the confusion of paternity.

THE British Indian Association had packed off their Secretary to Simla to lay its objections, legal and other, against the Municipal Bill, before the authorities. According to the Englishman and the Bengalee, the Sarbadhicari deputation has proved unsuccessful, the Viceroy having assented to the Bill. Our contemporaries are premature in their announcement. So far as our information goes, the Viceroy is prepared to give his assent, but he would like to have the preliminary objection taken to the Bill on the ground of want of authority to alter the boundaries of Calcutta even for a municipal purpose, cleared up. Accordingly, the Advocate-General has been asked to give his opinion.

IN another column will be found a letter which gives a glimpse of curious practices in the Viceroy's Private Secretariat. We mean to return to the subject.

THE weather has been much cooler this week, and bearable. But the terrible heat was not reserved for us only. At Simla, the heat has been excessive—unusual for that station. In the language of an eminent member of the society of that place, writing in private under date the 25th, "the weather up here is unexceptionally hot." A private letter from Etawa of the 20th, the writer being a highly respectable member of native society in the Delhi county, says—

"This is an exceedingly hot place and the houses here burn like furnace all the day long. Although I have several tathies working at this time, yet the thermometer is 99° in my room, which I call tolerably cool. It is fearful outside. I never venture to go out of my room much before 7 P. M., and even then I feel quite scorched in the face. One must however have some fresh air even though it may be scorching."

It is cheering to turn to Ajmere, whence a high European officer privately writes on the 20th June—

"The hot weather here though very warm at times is very dry and not trying."

A TRAVELLER from Koostea to Scalda this week observed that rain was badly wanted—the crops—rice and jute—were dry, and that the former was likely to suffer.

It is widely rumoured in town that there will be no water supply for four days. In consequence, there is a larger sale of earthen vessels for storing water. No foundation, however, exists for the rumour.

Holloway's Pills.—Sudden transitions from heat to cold, or from raw inclement weather to oppressive climates, favour the development of manifold diseases, which may in most instances be checked and rendered abortive by an early resort to these purifying, regulating, and strengthening Pills. This well-known and highly esteemed medicine affords a safe and easy remedy for almost every constitutional wrong which unhealthy climates, rapid changes, or dietetic errors, can engender, and effectually removes any weakness self-indulgent habits may have induced. In all conditions of the system bordering on disease such as are indicated by apathy, listlessness, and restlessness, Holloway's Pills will prove especially serviceable in begetting the vivacity of mind and body appreciated by both sound and sick.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, JUNE 30, 1888.

DEATH ON BOARD FROM POISONOUS GAS.

THE "moving accident" of the week was one by flood. And in the sum total of its lamentable result, it was sufficient to rouse the very stones of Rome or London or Calcutta to rise and mutiny against the system to which such a calamity was due. It was a massacre of innocents on the high sea, the victims being of the unsuspecting crew. The hecatomb was offered on board one of the well-known Clan line. In the Clan Macintosh's passage to Madras, on the 16th June, the Chief Steward went down with two native servants to the provision store for the week's rations of the native crew. All three were asphyxiated as soon as they reached the hold, while a man who stood on the second deck, ready to receive the rations as they might be handed over to him, fell down into the hold. This sudden and extraordinary fall attracted the notice of the fireman, who accordingly reported the matter to the Second Officer. Mr. Macpherson, the Second Officer, immediately got a lamp and went down, but the lamp was suddenly extinguished and he fell insensible. Then the First Officer, Mr. Shortland, got down provided with slings and removed Macpherson. He again went down to look after the others, and himself fell dead alongside of them. By this time, the cause of the successive deaths became plain, and there was no indiscreet haste to enter the fatal hold. Measures were doubtless taken to consume the deadly gas and purify the atmosphere of the bowels of the vessel. Then the bodies of the poor victims were brought up on the upper deck. They were five in number, Williams and Shortland, and three native seamen. The bodies were thrown into the sea, after the usual ceremonies. Mr. Macpherson recovered. Several others had a narrow escape. The men, who after all went down to search and haul up the bodies of the five victims, encountered no ordinary risk in the heroic discharge of ordinary duty. They abandoned all hope of life when they descended down the valley of death in that steamer's hold, and escaped by the skin of their teeth, so to say.

THE DANIEL OF BATNA.

MR. KIRKWOOD is an old sinner and obviously incorrigible. Under any other system of government, he would long since have been deprived of the opportunity for mischief. The stuff of which he is made, was long since disclosed. Early enough in his official career, he was found out, but cui bono? He belonged to the governing Civilian brotherhood, for whom there is no punishment. There was no check even, properly so-called, and no watch kept. So he went on, developing and acquiring notoriety as a cantankerous Zubberdust—a Magistrate who was a law unto himself and had scant respect even for his superiors in office, not excepting the highest. These Kirkwoods and Beameses have the quality of history of repeating themselves! Throughout all changes of scene or situation, they maintain their identity. What Mr. Kirkwood was in Orissa, that he was in Chittagong, and now in another and a distant part of the country, in Behar he is the self-same Kirkwood.

He arrived in India in 1863. How he comported himself in the early years, we cannot now recall and have neither time nor inclination to inquire. He must have been laying the foundation of his after renown. It is certain that, after a maturity of eight years in the public service, in 1871, he challenged public notice by his conduct as Magistrate in Orissa. It was so gross that even the rule of practical immunity for the members of the European Covenanted Service, had, in very decency we suppose, to be departed from, in order to make an example of him. Even this measure of justice was perhaps due to Sir George Campbell. Whatever his other eccentricities, and however great his partiality in favour of European officials, specially those of the Covenanted Civil Service, that Lieutenant-Governor was a disciplinarian, and he reluctantly passed the severe censure on Mr. Kirkwood for "the highly irregular character of his proceedings in Orissa," and removed him from the District. Mr. Kirkwood was not the man to submit so easily, without a tussle with the great Autocrat of Belvedere himself. He was keenly conscious of his being an Indian Civilian and of all that is implied in the term. He believed in the Creed that a Civilian can do no wrong, unless perhaps he became a Lieutenant-Governor—for Sir George Campbell belonged to the same service with him—and he knew that he could never be punished. And he took full advantage of the privilege. Accordingly, he hurled at the head of the Lieutenant-Governor a sort of defiance in the shape of a critique on the Censure. Sir George Campbell's opinion of Mr. Kirkwood's letter was that it "shews an indisposition to accept instructions and orders in a proper spirit, and an inclination to a controversial style of correspondence which affords little hope for the future."

"Affords little hope for the future," deliberately thought the Lieutenant-Governor. And yet he was left in a position of great responsibility, without due control, over myriads of Her Majesty's subjects without guarantee, and without proper steps for watch and ward. He was even promoted, as if in approval of "the highly irregular character of his proceedings in Orissa" and his highly insubordinate conduct. Accordingly, he soon enough again brought himself to the fore in a characteristic way. Towards the middle of 1876, he was, as Magistrate and Collector, head of the important frontier District of Chittagong. He has left an undying reputation in that quarter. His folly and high-handedness soon showed themselves. Wrong-headed, without command over temper, impatient, reckless of consequences, he at last caused a consternation among the people. The finishing touch was given by his persecution of a local notable and most popular citizen, the late Baboo Lal Chand Chowdry, a liberal Zemindar and public-spirited gentleman, who held, by gift of the Crown, the offices of a Municipal Commissioner and Honorary Magistrate. Him he insulted at a meeting of the Municipal Commissioners, at which Mr. Kirkwood presided, turning him out of it, because this flower of British delicacy and scrupulosity could not sit in the same room with a man, who, as he had there and then been told in an informal way, before the Baboo's appearance, had, on a previous day, made a stump oration in coarse vernacular, he being a man of no education risen from the ranks, though estimable withal. He was reminded by an English gentleman that he was giving the Baboo an insult by forcing him to clear out, and he maintained that he was doing it on purpose! Thereupon, Sir Richard Temple, then Lieutenant-Governor, remarked—

"The Lieutenant-Governor finds that Mr. Kirkwood treated Lal

Chand on this occasion in a manner which ought not to have been adopted by the head of the district towards a Municipal Commissioner. It is not to be expected that native gentlemen of position would serve as Municipal Commissioners if such instances were to become common. The Lieutenant-Governor hopes that that they are very rare."

The insult was followed up by the wrong of the next day, when Mr. Kirkwood, without any excuse whatever, had poor Lal Chand arrested on seven trumpety charges. Those who were at Chittagong in 1876 still remember the consternation caused by these tyrannical proceedings. The local bar was paralysed by dread of the great Magistrate. Fortunately for Lal Chand, he was a man of property, and he poured out his money freely to save his liberty and what wreck now remained of his honor under the iron sway of Kirkwood. He telegraphed for advice and assistance to Calcutta. Mr. Manomohun Ghose left for Chittagong. But it was a long journey. Meanwhile, the Magistrate was applied for time to allow of Mr. Ghose's coming, but Mr. Kirkwood would not grant it. Nor would he transfer the case to another Magistrate who was not so intimately concerned in it. Then Lal Chand moved the Judge to call for the record. He gave a patient hearing and finally, on the 15th May, in the language of the Government Resolution,

"recorded a judgment to the effect that having gone carefully through the case, he had failed to find any evidence in support of the charges framed, or to perceive how the evidence could be held to bear any construction favorable to the case for the prosecution, which had been instituted and carried on by Mr. Kirkwood in person, and that it appeared to him, the Judge, 'that framing charges which are entirely unsupported by evidence, and calling on a defendant to answer to them, was unlawful.'"

With every disposition to leniency, the Lieutenant-Governor, on a careful review of the matters, was "constrained to hold that Mr. Kirkwood's proceedings were hasty and ill-judged, and shewed great want of proper discretion and reasonable care in the exercise of the extensive powers which have been conferred upon him by law."

On most of the other points judgment went against Mr. Kirkwood. We have space only for the final deliverance.

"Having repeatedly considered the subject, the Lieutenant-Governor is obliged reluctantly to hold that Mr. Kirkwood is amenable to grave censure, and has been found to be so far in the wrong as to render it necessary to remove him from the charge of the Chittagong district. It will be impossible to maintain Municipal discipline, which has been so much weakened by these proceedings, without ordering a change in the administration of the district. Orders will accordingly issue immediately for the removal of Mr. Kirkwood from the office of Magistrate and Collector of Chittagong, and for his appointment to some other office in Bengal."

Thus, anything like real punishment was not visited on the culprit. Chittagong being a bad District, unhealthy and out of the way, transfer from there to any other is a relief. It is usually considered as good as a promotion. Nevertheless, the proud spirit chafed under the condemnation of its acts and the grave censure, howsoever tenderly administered. According to his wont, therefore, Mr. Kirkwood hurled a protest against the Government Resolution. •It was a voluminous letter, almost a pamphlet, and its impropriety was aggravated by its being sent direct to Government. But poor Mr. Lewis the Commissioner, whom he ought to have addressed, was himself a party to this breach of discipline. He had been persuaded to give Mr. Kirkwood a certificate for presentation to Government. In noticing the matter, the Bengal letter concludes—

"The Lieutenant-Governor regrets to be obliged to point out to you that your demi-official letter to Mr. Kirkwood was not called for, and is open to the objection of being calculated to weaken in Mr. Kirkwood's mind the moral force of the censure and sentence passed upon him by Government."

Such is the officer who, having failed as a magisterial and executive officer, got, under the beautiful system in vogue in our country, into the Judicial Service, and has now, as Judge of the Metropolitan

District of the Province of Behar, so disgraced himself on the bench. It will be seen that he has simply acted like himself. The responsibility of the outrage on poor Budhia, the little milk-girl, rests on the Government and system that allowed him, in the face of repeated misconduct, the opportunity to inflict on the girl a wrong without a remedy and scandalise the whole world.

We are glad that the Lieutenant-Governor promptly called for an explanation. Official fervour is apt to subside when Civilians are in danger. The news that Mr. Kirkwood is going on furlough is suspicious. Luckily, the Viceroy is not yet an Indian Civilian, and Lord Dufferin will doubtless keep his eye on the matter. Indeed, he may have to report to the India Office, as a question may any day be asked in Parliament. We only hope that the antecedents of the man will not be forgotten. It will be enough to call for the papers of 1876, including the representation of the British Indian Association.

INFRINGEMENT OF TRADE MARKS.

THERE are superstitions in every profession—law has its fictions, in name as in reality—what wonder if commerce should not be without them? The peculiar marks of merchants on their goods are by many regarded as the symbols of some irrational faith or old-world tradition. They are no doubt so represented in court by lawyers when paid for discrediting them. Certainly, the stress laid by merchants and manufacturers on the letter-press, or picture-writing, or absolute Hieroglyphics inscribed on their wares, might seem to outsiders a ludicrous exaggeration. But those who have given the matter serious thought or examine in the light of a wide experience, there is no invitation to ridicule—such men know what is what. They know that in the multitudinous competition of commerce—the effort of each article of the same kind to elbow its way to the front—these special characters and pictures of each house are so essential that they may well be revered as sacred symbols. They are a sine qua non. Commerce itself would languish without them. It is all very easy to cry, What matter marks if the things are the same? But where is the proof of identity in the absence of the external sign—the merchant's mark? The cheap philosophy of scepticism would not stand the crucible of the experience of the market. Talk of applying tests! There is simply no time for it. Life is short and commerce is long. There is neither leisure nor opportunity in the busy market-place for patient examination of every piece of every merchandise. Hence the need of marking goods in proof of their source of issue and guarantee of sameness of quality.

• Besides, who is to apply the tests? Few have the necessary confidence in their own powers. It is not every man who can measure and discern fineness. Nor does every purchaser buy for himself. As for the lawyers who may be found from time to time arguing that trade marks and merchandise marks are nothing, the conduct of their own clients contradict them. If marks are nothing, why do they take so much pains to copy those of others. If the regard paid to marks is a degrading fetishism, why do they so reverentially bow their neck to the golden calf?

In fact, it was the frequency of invasions of these special marks by unprincipled vendors, that robbing right and left—the established merchant of character and the unsuspecting purchaser—seriously hampered and threatened to ultimately injure trade, that led the honest part of the business world to combine against a great and growing evil, and call for legislative interference for the protection of legitimate commerce. Accordingly, the English Merchandise Marks Act of 1887 was passed. The mercantile public have since been watching the operation of the measure.

A case was recently brought at Manchester in which a Mr. Brown, a cotton spinner and Mr. Misk, a shipper, were, under the Act, charged before the Magistrate with infringement of the trade mark of the well-known manufacturers Messrs. Robert M'Clure and Sons. The cloth of this firm is in high repute in Turkey and Egypt, notably among the Arabs, and a source of considerable profit to the manufacturers. It was in respect of this cloth that this contention arose. Messrs. Robert M'Clure & Sons complained that the accused had introduced to the market an inferior cloth resembling their own and marked with a mark little distinguishable from their own mark. If they were permitted to do so, they would, by imposing on the Arabs with a "Brown" cloth as if it were the "M'Clure" cloth or otherwise underselling Messrs. Robert M'Clure & Sons, ruin their trade. The defence showed that the representation of a mill on the "Brown" cloth was a correct copy of Mr. Brown's mill at Wigan. Mr. Schemeil, a Syrian merchant, was called, who swore that the difference between the two cloths was unmistakable and could not deceive even the Arabs, whom indeed he thought to be sharp enough. Great stress was laid on this witness as being a man not only acquainted with the Beyrout market and the cloths in question, but one who had recently come from the East. In passing judgment, the court discharged Mr. Brown as a sleeping millowner who had personally no knowledge of the matter, having left everything to Misk, who did not shirk his full responsibility. On the merits, Mr. Magistrate Headlam was clearly of opinion that "there had been an intention to imitate the 'M'Clure' cloth, and to pass off the goods of Mr. Brown as the goods of Messrs. M'Clure."

"There had been evidence called of a contradictory character, on the one side to say that it is calculated to deceive and on the other side to say that it was not. Looking at it himself he thought it was likely to deceive. They must not look at the merchant who bought the cloth in the first instance, for he did not think the merchant would be deceived by it. Neither did he think that an Englishman would be deceived by it. They had, however, to look at the ultimate purchasers, who bought these things in the bazaars, and see whether they would be deceived by the marks."

The defendants were very astute in their game, but the court unmasked them.

"The principal evidence against the defendants was the fact that they had continually been altering their marks. They had been gradually getting on. He thought the mark on the first piece was not so like that on the 'M'Clure' cloth as that on the second piece, but when they came to the third piece there certainly had been a great advance in the imitation of the 'M'Clure' cloth. The green marks were different, but the word 'mulahl' was certainly much more prominent. These were the things, they were told, to which the people looked, and if the defendants had desired to keep their goods separate, and to have a different mark, why should they go so near and keep on making the resemblance to the 'M'Clure' cloth greater. On the whole, therefore, he had come to the conclusion that this was a case that came within the Act, and that it was an imitation calculated to deceive. He therefore would fine the defendant Misk, who appeared to be responsible, £20 and costs."

The prosecution now urged

"that the stamps used in marking the cloth should be forfeited, in accordance with the second sub-section of the second section of the Act, and Mr. Headlam acceded to the request."

The result must be esteemed satisfactory. The judgment was reported in the Manchester Guardian of the 12th May. Two days after, in the same journal, the following letter appeared on the subject of trade marks, which we think worth quoting for the benefit of the mercantile community in this country.

"SIR,—The report of Lord Herschell's Committee on this subject, issued a fortnight ago, was brought under the notice of the Chamber of Commerce at its quarterly meeting held on the 30th ult., since when it has no doubt been extensively read and appreciated, as it deserves to be. It will well repay careful perusal. May I draw the attention of your readers to page 10 of the report? The Committee say:—

'We have had before us pieces of cloth, each of which bore different trade marks, tickets, words, figures and other marks, but on which those trade marks, tickets, &c., were so coloured and distributed as to convey the impression, in the absence of careful examination, that the goods bore the same marks. No one looking at those pieces of cloth could doubt that the resemblance was intentional, and was designed for the very purpose of deceiving. Although we arrived at the conclusion that it would not be possible to give to line headings the protection of registration, we felt that the fraudulent trading to which our attention had been called ought not to remain unchecked, and that something ought to be done to remedy a state of things so detrimental to sound and honest trading. We therefore procured the insertion in the Merchandise Marks Act of a clause having for its object to bring these frauds within the penalties of the law, and thus to check their practice.'

The clause in the Merchandise Marks Act referred to in this extract does not in the slightest degree lessen the value of any registered mark; but what it does is this, it gives protection to the prudent and honest user of woven headings, figures, words or marks, or arrangement or combination thereof without the expense and delay of registration. In all the trades affected by the clause in question it ensures to every man the peaceable enjoyment of his own property. The services of Lord Herschell and his learned colleague Lord Macnaghten in the Upper House in thus amending the bill have laid Lancashire under lasting obligations."

We may here mention that the subject is now engaging the attention of merchants in Australia. The London Chamber of Commerce has asked the Melbourne Chamber of Commerce to bring it before the local Parliament with a view to legislation on the lines of the English Act.

AKBAR.

The next year the strong hill forts of Rintanbor and Calinjer were obtained possession of; and then Akbar proceeded to the reconquest of Guzerat, which was in a very troubled state at this time and afforded him every facility. There were several parties in the field in opposition to one another; one of which was headed by the turbulent Mirzas. Everything being prepared for the campaign, Akbar marched from Delhi at the head of his troops, and just before he reached Ahmedabad, he was met by the pageant king of Guzerat, who offered submission and tendered his crown. Some time, however, was spent in the siege of Surat, in efforts to reduce the refractory chiefs, and an endeavour to seize the Mirzas; in an affair with whom, Akbar nearly lost his life, or ran a risk of being captured. It happened in this wise. On one occasion, Akbar, at the head of a light detachment of about 150 men, attempted to cut them off from their main body, which he learnt they were about to join. He marched with such inconsiderate haste, and on such slight information about the strength of the enemy, that when he came up with them he found them to be 1,000 strong. Nevertheless, with his usual reckless courage, he advanced and charged the foe, but was hurled back, and compelled to seek a safe position, on the defensive, in some lanes formed by strong cactus hedges, and which, fortunately, were so narrow, that not more than three horsemen could ride abreast down them. In the nick Akbar became separated from his men and was nearly overpowered, when the Rajah of Jeypore happened to perceive his position, and came with his nephew to the rescue—it was owing to the heroic exertions of those two men, Rajah Bugwan Sing and Rajah Man Sing, that he owed his personal deliverance and the ultimate success of the day. The Mirzas, however, could not be prevented from effecting a junction with their troops; but were soon after dispersed. The whole of Guzerat was speedily subdued, and re-annexed to his dominions, and Akbar was free to return to Agra.

Akbar's attention was now drawn to Bengal as a rich and fertile province, and, having determined upon its annexation, he bent all his energies to its conquest, which was held possession of at the time by a weak and debauched Afghan prince, and who was besides engaged in civil war. Seizing such a favourable opportunity, Akbar left Agra, though the rainy season was far advanced, availing himself of the Jumna and the Ganges, for the transport of his stores, and a part of his army. Daud Khan, king of Bengal, retired before him into Orissa; and Akbar leaving his lieutenants to pursue the conquest, returned to Agra. Daud Khan subsequently twice met and routed the royal troops, but was at length defeated, he was still strong enough though, to obtain, by treaty, Orissa for himself. Bengal, however, did not at once submit; the country was filled with Afghan chiefs, more than one of whom took the field against the Shah of Delhi, compelling him to employ his best troops and ablest generals.

Mirza Hakim, Akbar's brother, now again invaded the Punjab from Cabul, and laid siege to Lahore. Akbar proceeded in person to raise the siege and deliver the province; and forced Hakim to retire before him. Akbar crossed the Indus, with the determination of stopping for ever such invasions, and marched on Cabul, which he took possession of after a feeble resistance. He pardoned his brother, and, forgetful of the intention with which he had set out, generously restored him to his government.

We now come to a period, the circumstances of which led to the conquest of Cashmere. Mirza Hakim, Akbar's brother, died at Cabul, and his death occurred at an apparently critical moment in the fortunes of that Government, for it looked almost certain that Cabul would be invaded by the Uzbek, Abdullah Khan, which chief had just obtained possession of Badakshan, by driving out its ruler. Akbar therefore thought it necessary to march in person, for the purpose of repelling any attack of Abdullah's; but Abdullah Khan remained content with his new conquest. The Shah of Delhi finding himself in the neighbourhood of the northern mountains, a great portion of which were already comprised in his dominions, naturally felt a desire to incorporate the rest. Cashmere first attracted his attention by its internal dissensions, which its Mussulman ruler was not strong enough to subdue. Cashmere had long been ruled by a succession of Hindu princes, but had, about two hundred years before this period, fallen into the hands of a Mussulman adventurer, and had since been ruled by princes of the same faith. This celebrated kingdom is situated in the heart of the Himalaya mountains, at somewhat more than half their height, and is an extensive plain. Its climate is perhaps the most delicious in the world, being blessed with almost perpetual spring; as its elevation places it above the reach of the heat of the plains of Hindustan, while the surrounding mountains shelter it from the cold blast of the higher regions. Cashmere exhibits a scene of continual verdure in the midst of snowy summits. Trees of various climate are scattered over its surface, and fruits of different kinds. The flowers of this region are innumerable in variety and beauty, and are poured forth with spontaneous profusion over its hills and plains. It has been appropriately named a terrestrial paradise. The approaches to Cashmere are, however, difficult and dangerous, but not more so than all mountain roads.

Akbar, availing himself of the opportunity which internal disturbances afforded, sent a force under the joint command of the Rajah of Jeypore and Shah Rokh Mirza, to seize the prize thus exposed to hazard. The chief difficulty this army had to contend against, was the inclemency of the weather, snow blocked all the passes and considerably retarded their progress. At length their supplies became exhausted, while they were still among these unproductive and inaccessible mountains. Under these circumstances, and bearing in mind the difficulties yet to be overcome, the two generals concluded that they would be doing very well, if they could get the ruling power in Cashmere to agree to a treaty, by which the sovereignty of Akbar would be acknowledged. Such a treaty was agreed to, but the Ruler of Cashmere inserted a clause, by which Akbar was forbidden all interference in the affairs of the country. Akbar disapproved of this treaty and would not confirm it, but the following year sent another army, whose efforts were completely successful. The king of Cashmere submitted, was enrolled among the nobles of Delhi, and was assigned a large jaghir in Behar. Akbar visited Cashmere to enjoy the pleasures of his new conquest. During the rest of his reign, he only repeated his visits twice. His successors, however, made Cashmere their favourite summer retreat, which up to the present time maintains the proud position of being the most delightful spot in Asia, or in the world; its lakes being its special features, with their flower-covered banks and floating gardens.

XIX.

Akbar's next operations were against the Afghans, who inhabited the hill countries around the plain of Peshawar. They resisted obstinately, and he met with questionable success. The plain of Peshawur is of great extent and wonderfully fertile, combining the productive soil of India with many of the advantages of temperate regions; and it offered temptations and afforded facilities to these mountain men for predatory incursions. The chief commanders of the force sent against them, were Zein Khan and Rajah Bir Bal, who unfortunately were not on good terms, though probably this was unknown to the emperor—Akbar had assumed this title.—The open country was soon overrun and laid waste, and then Rajah Bir Bal attempted to advance up one of the valleys, but very soon found himself involved among defiles where there was no outlet, and thus was forced to give up the enterprise and return to the plains. The other commander, Zein Khan, manifested greater perseverance. He made his way, through many rugged and dangerous mountain passes, and even built a redoubt for the purpose of controlling the neighbourhood. But in the end he was compelled to retire and to form a junction with Bir Bal. They opportunely received reinforcements from Akbar, which enabled them to continue operations.

At a military council, Bir Bal advocated an attack on the Afghans, by the whole force. Zein Khan opposed this proposal in the strongest manner. But the former was determined to risk all in a desperate attack. The army advanced into the mountains. Bir Bal ascended a difficult pass with much labour and fatigue to his men, while Zein Khan remained inactive at the foot of the pass. Bir Bal's detachment was suddenly attacked by the Afghans, who seemed to spring up out of the rocks, and he was driven back in confusion to the plain. Meanwhile, a body of Afghans poured down on Zein Khan's troops, and scattered them over the plain. It was with the utmost difficulty that the two chiefs were able to come to a halt, and collect their dispersed forces. The Afghans afterwards prepared an ambuscade for Bir Bal and the troops under him. This leader lost his life, and his soldiers were completely routed. The Afghans immediately fell on Zein Khan, dispersed his men, killed many, and took more prisoners, while Zein Khan himself escaped on foot to Attock. Akbar was overwhelmed when he heard of this disaster, but soon recovered his usual tone of mind, and determined to adopt more vigorous measures against the Afghans. It, however, took more than a year, and necessitated the employment of the best troops and the most able of his lieutenants, before they were reduced to submission, and which subjection lasted only for a short time, for in the next reign they regained their turbulent independence.

Akbar now undertook the conquest of Sindh, and sent an army from Lahore for that purpose. These troops at first met with indifferent success, but eventually induced the chief to give up the province. He received very favourable treatment, and was appointed to a high rank among the nobles of the empire. The conquest of the Deccan was next the object of Akbar, and an army was sent thither, under the command of Prince Morad, supported by a contingent from Malwa, under Mirza Khan. The two generals effected a junction near Ahmednagar. It was at Ahmednagar that the famous Chand Bibi ruled as regent for her nephew. What a remarkable woman this Chand Bibi was! displaying tact, energy, and courage, of a high order. Her life reads much more like that of some famous knight in days of chivalry, than that of a woman. If she had not fallen while opposing the foes of her country and her king, it would have been a fitting close to such a life. How sad it makes one feel to know that this woman, who was one of the most distinguished of her sex, who ever appeared in India, should have perished ignobly, at the hands of a base and rabble soldiery, and in the sacred precincts of the female apartments, where she was foully murdered.

Chand Bibi no sooner saw the powerful foe she had to contend against, than she made the greatest efforts to reconcile the heads of the different opposed parties in her dominions, and applied herself to conciliate the Rajah of Bijapore. She was successful in reconciling all parties, and obtained the aid of Bijapore. Meanwhile, Prince Morad had besieged Ahmednagar, and now pressed the siege with vigour. The besiegers had run two mines under the works but these were discovered in time, by Chand Bibi, and rendered useless by countermines. This heroic woman personally superintended the workmen, and exposed herself to the same dangers as the soldiers. A third mine, however, was fired, before it could be rendered ineffectual by the besieged, and a broad breach was made in the wall; while the counterminers were blown up. The defenders were stricken with terror, and began deserting their posts, leaving the road open to the advancing storming party. At this critical moment, Chand Bibi, equipped in full armour, flew to the breach. She had a veil over her face and a sword in her hand, with which she waved on her recoiling troops, and inspired them with her own exalted courage. Her soldiers rallied round her, and opposed the Moslems with such vigour and determination, that they hurled them back, only, however, to witness the stubborn courage of their foe, for the Mussulmans again swarmed up the breach. Chand Bibi displayed wonderful powers for a woman. She was indefatigable in her endeavours to repel the enemy. Now she was encouraging the defenders of the breach, again seeing to it that the whole resources of the fortress were brought to bear on the assailants; obtaining lock balls and arrows, which she literally caused to be poured on them in showers; guns were brought to bear on the breach; rockets, gunpowder, and other combustibles, were thrown among the crowd in the ditch; and throughout the day the garrison offered such stout resistance, that human courage, however obstinate, could bear no more, and the Mussulmans were forced to retire, after a most bloody contest. The next day the breach was found so effectually repaired that it would be impossible to mount it; new mines therefore would have to be laid or recourse had to a breaching battery. Prince Morad, of the two, had the superior force, but yet, he seemed unwilling to risk all on the chance of a battle, though he had little hopes now of carrying the place by assault. Both parties at last came to terms, by which Berar was surrendered to the emperor. It was not till after the death of Chand Bibi, that Akbar obtained possession of Ahmednagar. Contemporaneously with the Deccan, Candahar and Kandeish were annexed to the empire. The military operations in the latter country occupied Akbar for nearly a year, after which, he appointed Prince Danyal viceroy of Kandeish and Berar, and himself marched to Agra. Before his departure, he had received embassies and presents from the kings of Bijapore and Golconda, and had married his son Danyal, to the daughter of the Prince of Bijapore.

JAMES H. LINTON.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

At the time of Lord Ripon, Mr. Panioty, Assistant Private Secretary, induced Mr. Primrose, the Secretary, to grant Rs. 500 a month, as his house allowance on the plea that he would perform night duties, such as deciphering telegrams, &c. A house belonging to a private gentleman was taken up for the location of the Private Secretary's office and Mr. Panioty's private residence. Before the expiry of the lease Mr. Panioty removed the office to his own house which is much smaller than the one previously occupied, on a rental of Rs. 500 a month. The whole building is occupied by Mr. Panioty and his two sons, one of whom has lately married, with the exception of a flat on the first floor where the office is located, and a room in the ground floor for the Press. Mr. Primrose once came to the office and asked Mr. Panioty to take down the sign-boards of his two sons, on the ground that the house was not the private residence of Mr. Panioty and his family. The sign-boards were taken down but were again put up as soon as Mr. Primrose left India. They can be still seen.

Those who have been in the Private Secretary's office will be able to bear me out that the rent of the house can never exceed Rs. 350 a month. Then again if slight damages are caused to the house by the negligence of the clerks or servants, they are taken to task by Mr. Panioty; sometimes repairs are paid for from the Durbar fund. Mr. Panioty does not fulfil his part of the contract on the strength of which he has the privilege of occupying a free house at the expense of the taxpayers, viz., he does not work in the night. This part of the work is being performed by the clerks in rotation, who are made to sleep in a close dungeon-like godown in the ground floor. What makes the lot of these clerks harder is that they are not allowed to leave their office next day to take their meals. They satisfy the cravings of hunger from the neighbouring sweetmeat-sellers' shops. One clerk is to attend office every Sunday and Gazetted holidays.

Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace is kept in profound ignorance of what goes on in the office. Even at the time of Saraswate Poojah the clerks were made to attend office. Then again Mr. Panioty's sons occupy the entire house during the Viceroy's absence from Calcutta. May I also inquire why is not the 55 years' rule enforced against Mr. Panioty?

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder
 Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet
 (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a representation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder;

 and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen
 could give individual instances of Bengalee
 faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India
 into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions,
 and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared
 speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body
 of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young,
 but grave and aged; some have, in the course
 of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted,
 so that on its return to them it has amazed
 none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

In the forefront of this little band is the author of this book of travels, Baboo Sambhu
 Chunder Mookerjee—a writer of high repute,
 as I have said, also an administrator, as the
 reader will see from the title-page to this book.
 A keener, yet a kindlier satirist, one might seek for and not find. His use of the English language has astonished many an educated Englishman; and the quality of his reading is shown by his marvellous power of quotation;
 not merely from authors like Shakespeare, and Milton, and Macaulay, and men eminent in science, but from out-of-the-way old ballads,
 and little-known old pamphlets, in the application of which he leaves one wondering—first,
 how he obtained the productions at all, and secondly, how, having obtained them, he learned to apply them so appositely to the subjects which he intends them to illustrate.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened
 the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens
 the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a
 Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice.
 A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and,
 though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles
 over their disputes while he astonishes them
 by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of
 his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but
 of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell:

 [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen,"
 ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor
 Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah
 dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that
 bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian;
 not English. Where an English artist's mind
 would be filled with European ideas, the mind
 of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive
 and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

On the eve of one of his journeys, our author was placed in a dilemma of a kind not unknown to travellers in India, but not on that account the less stupid. He wished to go by a particular boat, and took time by the forelock for that purpose. The fare was at first stated as 90 rupees, to pay which he offered "a new crisp, fresh British India" note for 100 rupees. "It was," he adds, "fresh from the Currency Office, and had been received only the day before from another Government department." The rest of the story is thus told: [Extract.]

The humour of the little sketch is worth something. I can fancy the author laughing even in his disney; for he can laugh well at others, and equally well at himself. I shall only venture on one more passage; and I give
 it as showing the spirit of the man who dares
 to call his newspaper Prince and Peasant.
 He desired to return to his home in Bengal,
 and to bid adieu, for a time at last, to Independent Tipperah, where he had been located
 "some two years." He received the Maha-rajah's permission to return home; but still he could not get away. [Extract.]

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers
 and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest,
 the man whose plans are the wisest as plans;
 but the man who, with plans or without them,
 gives confidence to the people, and confidence
 not merely in his justice, but also in his con-siderateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can,
 the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as
 I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra
 Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Anrita Bazar Patrika;
 and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side.
 They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times
 with men of kindred occupations at home,
 and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and
 often in very much more than mere manners.
 May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GUINDRAMOHINY DASSY
(Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression. It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srmati Guindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

A PSALM OF LIFE.

Through the wild Babel of our fever'd time
The song of Homer cometh, grave and stern,
With tidings from the world's fresh, healthy prime,— Tidings which our worn, wearied age concern.

Unchang'd, through all the long unnumber'd years,
The voice of Homer sings the song divine,
Which tells of godlike toils, of heroes' tears,
And of the punishment of Priam's line.

The battle in the plain is raging yet :
The watchfires blaze, the beak'd-ships line the shore :
For us the foe in grim array is set :—

Ah ! but do we fight as they fought of yore ?

For we, too, like the heroes long ago,
Must wage slow wars and sail the bitter sea :
Fierce is the conflict, loud the tempests blow,
And the waves roar and rage unceasingly.

Still must we wander o'er the stormy main :
'Twixt rocks and whirlpools a dread passage make :
Still must the Sirens sing to us in vain :
Still from the toils of Circe must we break.

Turn, then, to Homer's Psalm of Life, and see How they endured, whose pilgrimage is done ;
And hear the message they have left for thee :—
Only by Patience is the victory won.

YE MINISTERS OF ENGLAND!

Ye Ministers of England
Who pare the native cheese,
Who care more for the Caucas than
Our safety on the seas ;
Your old excuses launch again
Ye forged long, long ago,
As ye prate through debate
Of the things we must not know—
Of the questions about ships and forts
We must not " want to know."

Britannia does need bulwarks
And towers along the steep ;
She's scant of powder, ships, and men :
Her rulers are asleep.
The thunder from her phantom fleet
The French can overcrow
With thy might, Melinite,
While the stormy tempests blow,
While the battle rages, short and sharp,
And the stormy tempests blow.

The meteor flag of England
May yet terrific burn
Above the ruin of her trade
The ashes of her urn.
Then, then, ye bold officials,
Perchance you'll come to know
The hate of the State
In an hour of overthrow,
When a ruined people turns in wrath
On you that wrought their woe.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

THE Age of Chivalry may be past, but that of Loyalty clearly is not gone. A deaf and dumb painter, by name Kinder, of Bykovine, Silesia, offered his healthy larynx for the late Emperor Frederick. Sir Morell Mackenzie, in reply, wrote :—

" Your devotion is deserving of all honour ; but I cannot accept the great sacrifice which you offer, for it would unhappily neither help His Majesty the Emperor nor serve the cause of science."

What wonder, after that, at the Indian Suttee, or to suppose that she was invariably goaded to self immolation by fiendship Brahmins? Kinder is kinder to his sovereign than the Indian widow to her dead lord.

By refined chemical tests, Professor Muntz, of the National Agronomic Institute of Paris, has discovered alcohol in cultivated soils, in rain water, in sea and river water, and in the atmosphere. He is further of opinion that vegetable moulds may contain considerable quantities. What a revelation ! Everything and everybody—including Sir Wilfrid Lawson and the Teetotallers—are, ex necessitate, " half seas over." It is a drunk world, my masters !

A SUICIDE of an old miser, who preferred to dwell in one of the dingiest " slums " of Paris, and was suffering from an incurable malady in the eyes, leaves a fortune of 300,000 fr. or £12,000 sterling, in securities and railway and mining shares, as well as a considerable sum of English money in gold and bank notes.

We have just had among us the death of a young miser, who committed a slow suicide through a long course of illness without proper treatment or taking change, though rolling in wealth which he has not even willed away properly.

PRIVATE Brinn of the Leicestershire Regiment has been sentenced by the Allahabad High Court to twelve months' rigorous imprisonment for criminal assault with intent to outrage the modesty of a native woman Soobia. In passing sentence, Mr. Justice Straight remarked that " it grieved him to pass such a severe sentence, but that it was intolerable that men belonging to a regiment, or any man, should lay violent hands on unfortunate women in this way. It was necessary to inflict a severe punishment as an example to others, for it was the duty of the Court to protect all Her Majesty's subjects with the strong arm of the law."

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

WE reproduce the following deeply interesting account from the Army and Navy Gazette :—

"M. Napoleon Ney has just telegraphed to the Figaro from Samarkand that the Transcaspian Railway was inaugurated on the anniversary of the coronation of the Czar in presence of 100,000 Asiatics, who were very much impressed by this imposing spectacle. M. Napoleon Ney was one of a party of Frenchmen invited to witness this solemnity, and M. de Lesseps would have gone but for the Panama Canal business requiring his presence in Paris. Among the native princes invited were those of Khiva, Bokara, Khokand, and Khasgar. Writing from a place called Ozoum-Ada, M. Napoleon Ney, in a letter dated May 19, gave a brief sketch of General Annenhoff, of the Russian Staff, who was charged with the direction of the works of the railroad in question. He says that his promotion has been rapid, that he is hardly 50 years of age, that he was highly appreciated by General Chanzy, who was for a time French Ambassador at St. Petersburg, that he formerly had charge of the mobilisation service, and that before filling his present post he constructed several strategic lines in Lithuania. We are also assured that the General is a true friend of France, well versed in French literature, and, crowning complement of all for a Muscovite soldier, a refined Parisian. The General, it seems, paid a flying visit to Paris 18 months ago. He arrived from Turkestan one morning to see his sister, who was lying ill in the French capital; he dined out in the evening and was on his road back to Central Asia 12 hours afterwards. At the dinner-party we are told that the General astonished the guests with the 'fabulous history' of the railway upon which he was engaged—a line some 2,000 miles in length, running through arid deserts where one may travel for weeks at a time without coming across a drop of water. It was after two reverses experienced by the Russian Army in the Akkal oasis, 200 miles from the Caspian, owing to want of transport, that General Skobelev, sent to revenge the insult, conceived the idea of employing a railway. He made use of a portable Decauville line which rendered great services. In January, 1881, Géok-Tépé fell, the whole oasis of Akkal surrendered at discretion, and General Skobelev inaugurated Russian domination by terrible reprisals. In 1884 the Turcoman oasis of Merv, accounted to be inaccessible, made its submission, thanks to Colonel Alikhanoff's diplomacy and the definitive establishment of the railway to Géok-Tépé. In 1885 an Imperial ukase charged General Annenkov with the direction of the line now opened to Samarkand. He formed a railway battalion 1,000 strong at Moscow, and reached the scene of action on July 3. Great difficulties were encountered; at times the oases were separated by 100 miles of desert, in which neither wood nor water could be found. The General conceived the happy idea of a rolling camp,—a train of special carriages in which the workmen lived and which moved along as the line advanced. These carriages, two stories high, were regular houses, and the one in front was plated and armed. We are told that the last portion of the line was made at the rate of about six miles a day, and that the Tekkès were persuaded to work at a railway which deprives them for ever of their independence. As many as 22,000 Tekkès were employed at the rate of 18 roubles a month. M. Napoleon Ney remarks that when the news of the inauguration of a station at Merv reached Europe it was as if a thunder-bolt had fallen. 'To-day, however, the line to Samarkand, running northward, has somewhat reassured the English, who thought that the house was on fire. If this rapidity of execution astonishes Europeans, one may easily understand that it has absolutely stupefied the Turcomans. 'Of what use,' they say, 'to struggle against the Russians, who have just laid down, at a gallop, two hands of iron between our country and the sea? Who can resist such men? God willed it. The white Czar is our Sultan.' To-day the line reaches provisionally to Samarkand the noble, from whence, the Mongolian invasions used to start. The scream of Russian locomotives is about to trouble the sleep of Tamerlane. To conclude this colossal enterprise, conducted without noise, is an event of the greatest importance. By the boldness of its conception, the rapidity with which the work has been accomplished, and its political and commercial results, the extent of which it is impossible to foresee, the work of General Annenkov will rank in the history of our age with the piercing of the Suez and the Panama Canals and the American railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific."

We feel proud of Ali Khan Saheb as an Asiatic. But it is the "barbarous Russ" that has given him the opportunity for greatness. Which of us Indians has had anything like the same chance of distinction at the hands of the liberal and enlightened British?

EX-PLEADER J. C. Purcell is in trouble again. He has been sentenced by the Joint-Magistrate of Mussoorie, to Rs. 200 fine, in default one month's hard labor, for libelling Mr. T. Fitch in the Indian Mail. The particulars are thus given in a Mussoorie correspondence of the Morning Post :—

"We have here a very scurrilous paper, called the Indian Mail, managed (and to all appearances owned and edited) by a disbarred pleader, named J. C. Purcell. This paper attacked Mr. T. Fitch whilst it was published in Saharunpur, and Mr. Fitch summoned Purcell for defamation. It appears from the evidence given in the case yesterday (Jun. 25) that Mr. Fitch was induced to accept an apology on Purcell's promising to give up the real author of the defamatory attack: this he did by telling Mr. Fitch that Mr. F. Beatty, of Lahore, was the author, and showing him certain proofs, promising him more by post: these he never sent, and Mr. Fitch found himself in the unpleasant position of having taxed Beatty with the libel and having no proofs. Purcell wrote to him that he quite admitted that he ought to be set right as regards Beatty, and that he alone could do it and he was a poor man, &c., &c., (this letter was filed in Court), and the end was that Mr. Fitch had to enter into negotiation to buy the information; this he did, and Purcell gave up Beatty's questions and telegrams and made an affidavit before the Magistrate of Saharunpur as to Beatty's complicity in the libel. Purcell then brought his paper up here, and was not unnaturally pursued by some of his creditors, who had found out his whereabouts from the reports of the case. He then wrote to Mr. Fitch, threatening him, that the first suit that was filed against him he should proceed to expose him in his paper, to publish all his letters and telegrams regarding the purchase of Beatty's letters, and generally make his life a misery. It is to be presumed he did this as he knew Mr. Fitch had to file a case against him for the price of a press bought from the East Lancashire Regiment. Mr. Fitch did not reply, and the consequence was that the next issue of the paper teemed with the name of Fitch and was most insulting all through. Mr. Fitch thereupon filed a complaint for criminal intimidation and insult under sections 503, 504 and 506, Indian Penal Code, and the case was heard yesterday. Mr. J. E. Howard, of your city, appeared for the complainant, Mr. Fitch, and Purcell conducted his own case. The facts of the defamation case were brought out in Mr. Fitch's examination, and Purcell's cross-examination failed to help his case in any way: he of course endeavoured to bring in extraneous matter, but Mr. Howard's watchfulness and the Court's sagacity were too many for him. He called one witness, who failed. Mr. Purcell then endeavoured to make out that there was no intimidation. Mr. Howard made a most able address, laying every portion of the law relating to intimidation clearly before the Court, and proving incontrovertibly that the letter itself constituted the offence without the articles in the paper immediately following. The Court, in a long and careful judgment, accepted the view of the prosecution."

That Purcell is a pest.

A WAR steamer—Medea—has just been launched at Chatham. She is 265ft. long over all, 41ft. broad of beam, of 2,800 tons displacement and 9,000 horse power, with a speed of 20 knots an hour. She may carry six 6in breech-loading 100 pounders, ten quick-firing guns, and torpedoes. We hope she will not prove too unwieldy lumber for management in actual warfare, nor go down to the bottom of the water in the first decent gale.

THE express railway speed in America averages from 35 to 40 miles an hour; in England from London to Manchester the journey is at the rate of 48 miles, and between London and Grantham close upon 54 miles. In Italy, it averages only 29½ miles; in France and Germany, 33; in Spain, 22; in Portugal, 18½; Switzerland 22; Holland 33½; Belgium 33; Scandinavia 21; India 33; and Russia 34. Portuguese lines seem conscious of the limitation of their territory. Switzerland is smart for her rocky ups and downs, her undulations and sinuosities. Scandinavia too has her peculiar physical difficulties. Spain is shamefully slow for all her ample room and verge enough.

HERE, from an English monthly, is an interesting episode of the History of the Press, and an instructive glimpse of how they order matters in the enterprising West:—

"There recently died in Vienna a most remarkable man, says a correspondent of Galvani. This was Herr Zang, who introduced into France the Viennese bread, and made a fortune by it. While busily engaged in establishing his bakery in the Rue Richelieu, he was struck with the new departure in journalism due to the genius of M. Emile de Girardin, and determined to do for Vienna what Girardin had done for Paris—namely, to give the public a good political newspaper at a low price. So he sold out his bakery to one of his French rivals, and with this money in his pocket started off on an entirely new line. The baker now turned journalist, as easily as the army officer had become baker. As soon as the revolutionary storm of 1848 had blown over, Zang founded his Presse, preserving the name of Girardin's famous journal. At that epoch Vienna was governed by a military officer, who was very gruff and stiff, but who, like all human beings, had a weak side. He believed he was a grand orator and a brilliant writer. Shrewd Herr Zang never missed an occasion to insert at length in the columns of the Presse the speeches of the dreaded General Welden, and to praise the literary merit of his proclamations, which so tickled the old soldier that, notwithstanding the state of siege which then oppressed Vienna, the Presse was given the greatest latitude. Editor Zang made the most of this advantage, and the result was that the paper grew in importance and wealth the list of subscribers and advertisers increasing rapidly from year to year. It was a rule with him that all public men, ministers, ambitious millionaires, and financial concerns, especially the last named, must pay if they wished a good word from his widely-read newspaper. He drew up a regular tariff, where the prices were arranged according to the importance of the man, his wealth, or the services that the paper could render him either by praising him or by simply not attacking him. The driving, avaricious ex-baker was not in the least ashamed of this business. He used even to boast of it. On one occasion I heard him say, 'Why, I should make the Queen of England pay me if I printed her Speech from the Throne.' But he was destined to receive a hard blow himself, and in the tenderest spot—his purse. Not a trained writer himself, but an excellent business man, Zang had drawn about him a corps of able editors and contributors, who often complained that they were underpaid and even badly treated, for the proprietor and chief editor of the Presse had become a veritable autocrat, and, like the founder of the New York Tribune, did not mince matters when vexed at any of its subordinates. One fine morning the potentate of the Presse nearly had an apoplectic fit when two of his principal editors informed him that they had had enough of it, and meant to establish a rival, backed by the money of several bankers, who were also anxious to throw off the yoke of the Presse. This was the origin, in 1864, of the Vienna Neue Freie Presse, now known throughout the world. Its rebellious founders were Etienne and Friedlander, both of whom died prematurely, but not until they had had the satisfaction of knowing that the Neue Freie Presse was a formidable rival of Zang and his journal. Poor Herr Zang was terribly affected by this 'desertion' of his 'pupils,' as he called Etienne and Friedlander. His despair was even amusing. He filled all Vienna with his lamentations. Zang kept up the fight for three years, when, weary of the struggle, he sold out his journal for about $400,000."

Not a bad sum to retire upon from the incessant struggle of such an investment, many proprietors would think!

ENGLAND having, for the moment, washed her hands of the Tunnel Scheme, France comes forward with her alternative programme of bridging the sea:—

"A scheme for building a bridge over the Straits of Dover has been brought out in France by the Creusot Company and M. Hersent, the well-known contractor. The bridge is to be about twenty miles long, the superstructure to rest 160 feet above the sea level, and the span between the piers to be 1,600 feet. It is to bear four lines of rails, and each of the piers will contain a place of refuge and be surmounted with a powerful light. The estimated cost of the work is £32,000,000. The metallic framework will weigh two millions of tons, and the construction will take about six years."

Who shall, after that, talk of the Colossus of Rhodes? But how many people, we wonder, will have the nerve for the horrors of that "middle passage?" Besides, who will risk their capital on such an undertaking? Till war and vandalism can be more effectually checked, it seems premature to embark on such costly enterprises.

BABOO Obhoy Chundra Dass, the wellknown retired Deputy Collector and Deputy Magistrate, has been permitted to retain the title of Rai Bahadur of his office for life. Considering the great influence he exercised in the East country, for a long series of years, through the Commissioner's office, it is a considerate concession.

NOTWITHSTANDING the severity of the weather, there were, in the 21 days that the Indian Museum was open to the general public, as many as 35,590 visitors, giving a daily average of 1,694. The bulk were more than ever natives, 26,016 males + 9,171 females = 35,187. Only 403 Europeans visited, 340 males and 63 females.

THE meeting of the Syndicate for the appointment of Examiners for the next year, was a rather lively scene. A lucky University official seemed to be on his trial. A good deal of thorough honest work was done. The List in the last few years had grown to a serious scandal and a blow on the education of the rising generation. Between the weeding of personal favourites and the infusion of fresh blood, the cast is a decided improvement. The Examiners of the Calcutta University for the year 1889, are—

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE weather continues cooler from occasional rains throughout the Province, although there has been no down-pouring in wild earnest yet. In Benares and other parts of Upper India, it is still very hot.

THE Emperor William and Bismarck will sail in a week for St. Petersburg. They will be escorted by eight ironclads. The place of meeting between the Emperors has not been yet fixed, it is said; we should think not announced yet, for fear of the Nihilists, against whom Life Guards are no protection, much less ironclads: The object of the meeting seems to "dish" France. Great Britain may as well be on her guard, though. Messrs. Conybeare and Saunders got up a demonstration of 3000 in Trafalgar Square, to protest against the closing of the Square against public meetings. They succeeded in addressing the gathering. In dispersing it, the Police were attacked and there were fights, and several arrests were made. Mr. O'Donnell's suit for £50,000 damages against the Times has terminated in a verdict for the defendant. Lord Coleridge ruled that Mr. O'Donnell had no case against the Times. Mr. Bradlaugh's Oaths Bill has passed in Committee. On the 2nd July Mr. Balfour introduced a Bill for raising large loans for arterial drainage in Ireland.

THE Board of Revenue is still investigating the charges against Mr. Goodricke. In the meantime, Assessor Rakhaldas Ghose has been dismissed the service and Mr. S. J. Kilby, Superintendent of the Customs Preventive Service, has been put in charge of the Income Tax in addition to his own duties. A queer appointment that, but not more extraordinary than was Mr. Goodricke's own to the Collectorate. Mr. Goodricke himself is anxious to get away. He had applied for one month's privilege leave, but he was then advised to go on furlough, and he withdrew his former application and pressed for six months' furlough, telegraphing to Darjeeling medical certificates in support. But the Board scouts the idea of leave, at any rate—leave out of India. How Mr. Goodricke bewails the absence of Mr. Peacock from the Board! That Patron Saint of panders and noodles had tried to smooth matters for the Collector, but the Government would not be satisfied and wanted more information. Hence the present protracted enquiry, in which great credit is due to the Commissioner. Once he was in for it, he pursued the subject with zeal and singleness of purpose. One of the clerks—the Objection Clerk—named Anbinash has already been the victim of the Collector's wrath. He had been examined by the Commissioner, and had deposed to the delinquencies of the office under his observation. He was turned out by Mr. Goodricke. He appealed from the order of the Collector to the Commissioner. In his explanation to the Commissioner, the Collector wanted to prove too much against the clerk. Mr. Smith, without taking the responsibility of reinstatement upon himself, has referred the matter to the Board.

Rakhaldas also considers himself injured and threatens to proceed against Government for wrongful dismissal. He can afford the drain on his purse.

The last news is that Baboo Doorgagutty Banerjee, Personal Assistant to the Commissioner, has been appointed to act in Mr. Goodricke's place as Collector. An unexceptionable choice. His very enemies acknowledge Baboo Doorgagutty to be one of our best officers in the Executive Service.

THE rules regarding the Benches of Magistrates for Calcutta have been further revised and are published in this week's Calcutta Gazette. The Benches seem not to have given satisfaction to the Chief Magistrate. For, these rules aim at uniformity of practice and regular attendance and work. For these purposes, there will a Registrar who will at once be a check on the Magistrates and their Guide, if not Philosopher and Friend. It will be his duty "to assist the Unpaid Presidency Magistrates on any question of practice, &c., that may arise." He will also report weekly to the Chief Magistrate

"(a) the names of such Unpaid Presidency Magistrates as are absent without or on insufficient notice;

(b) the hour at which the Benches sit; and, in the event of any Bench of Magistrates taking its seat after the appointed hour, the reason thereof;

(c) the hours at which the Benches rise, and whether their file of cases has been disposed of;

(d) list of cases disposed of;

(e) list of cases adjourned, and the grounds of such adjournment."

The fifth rule says "the Chief Magistrate may, should he deem it desirable, appoint any Unpaid Presidency Magistrate sitting singly to be a Court, and on business being sent to him by the Chief Magistrate, he shall dispose of the same, but not otherwise." We are afraid the Chief Magistrate goes beyond the law in thus depriving an Unpaid Magistrate of the powers he enjoys equally with the Paid Magistrates. The legislature has made no distinction between a Paid and an Unpaid Magistrate. They are all Presidency Magistrates. The Honorary Magistrates, by these rules, "shall ordinarily open their Courts at noon and rise at 5 P. M. on the dates fixed by the Chief Magistrate. A special Bench may, however, be convened on any other day or at any other hour by the Chief Magistrate." "Adjournments should be, as far as possible, de die in diem."

When rules were first framed, we believe the names of the Honorary Magistrates who were considered eligible to be Chairmen of the Benches were Gazetted. In the first revision, the Benches were empowered to elect their own Chairmen. In the present rules, the Chief Magistrate takes to himself that authority. No Bench then can begin work without permission of the Chief Magistrate. Is that permission also necessary in adjourned proceedings under rule 12, namely,

"Any part-heard case adjourned by a Bench composed of three Magistrates may be proceeded with on the day fixed for the adjourned hearing before any two of the said Magistrates; provided always that the accused person or persons give his or their consent. All subsequent hearings of the case, where further adjournments are necessary, shall be before the same two Magistrates."

supposing the Chairman of the first day is absent at the adjourned hearing?

The jurisdiction of the Bench had hitherto been unlimited. It could try cases transferred both by the Chief Magistrate and the other Stipendiary. But rule 2 enjoins "Unpaid Presidency Magistrates shall try only such cases as may be referred to them by the Chief Magistrate."

A Correspondent in the Indian Mirror, who seems to be a rather knowing wight, is indignant at these rules. He characterizes them as "absurd," "ridiculous," "extremely offensive," and "insulting" to the Honorary Magistrates and the Hon'ble Stipendiary. He leaves Syud Ameer Hossein to fight his own battle and advises the "Bencher" to resign. May it not be that Mr. Musden has begun to take greater interest in the working of the Courts and proper administration of justice?

Note—true to the name—is easily appeased, forgetting and forgiving. This week it is gracious indeed to the supreme head of the Postal Department in India. To begin with, it grants him the distinction of the opening paragraphs of his opening column. Then it proclaims with the exactitude of a herald all the names and titles of the object of his kind attentions. In fine, our young friend begins his Sabbath—he publishes on Sunday—with the fervid interjection:—"All honour to Sir Frederick Russell Hogg, K. C. I. E., C. S. I., Director-General of Indian Post Offices," And why? The writer is prepared with his answer, though it rather lessens the effect—"for one of his recent acts of discrimination." A general call to the world to honor a European official for a single act of discrimination! And that from the Young Radicalism of the country—the very Yankee Radical of the Native Press! Surely, the Millennium is within a measurable distance in India, when the lion and the lamb will drink of the same stream and lie down together under the same shade—when the Briton and the Baboo will recognise and treat one another as brothers. Who, after that, will accuse the Bengalis of sedition against Government and of making the lives of officials miserable by continually finding fault with them or carping at them? One instance of discrimination may be an inadequate reason for laudation, but it demonstrates more conclusively the spirit. It shows how ready we are to praise if we have the ghost of a chance. The vials of vitriol might be reserved for the Viceroy or the local Government, but an official below the highest may easily obtain more than fairplay.

In point of fact, our contemporary does not build his complaisancy on a single case. He speaks of "one of his (the Director-General's) recent acts." Evidently there have been other recent acts. The writer does not specify them, but roundly avers—

"He (the Director-General) has upheld his reputation of being a friend of the Natives by appointing as his Secretary Rai Kam Outar Sing Bahadur, Superintendent of the Sorting Division of the Railway Mail Service. This is the very first time that a Native of India has been appointed to the responsible and honourable post in question."

So far as honor is due for this act, we are ready to give. But we know nothing of other acts. The reputation which is ascribed to Sir Frederick Hogg has been just the other way. Perhaps he was too distracted by the gallantries in his family to cultivate any other kind of reputation.

WE are all familiar with—many of our military readers at Divisional Head-Quarters in the interior and at up-country cantonments to their cost—"Mrs. General" and "Mrs. Colonel." It was left to the Salvationist movement to introduce the further anomaly of "Miss General," "Miss Colonel," and so forth. Bad form and awkward as it is, a "Mrs. General" or "Mrs. Captain" is not quite unintelligible—the meaning may be guessed with some hope of a hit. But a Miss with a military rank is a mystery. As for guessing, one is afraid to launch into it. A "Miss General (say) Florence" is suggestive of not the most proper associations. Of course, the idea would be monstrous libel in the Joana Arc of Salvation. But so long as the human is as it is, the influence of language on it is not, cannot always, be thoroughly staid. On this ground, therefore, if for no other, we are glad that the Joan of the War of Righteousness has been fairly tired of the state of single-blessedness. In joining herself to Major Tucker, Miss General Booth may seem to have married beneath her—her rank at any rate. But it is not so, for the Major is the head of the Salvationists—that is Field Marshall commanding the Army to which the lady also belongs.

There is perhaps a touch of unpleasant self-consciousness in the reasons the late—we do not mean the deceased—Miss gives for the important step she has just taken. She was actuated by no yearning of her own heart. She received a "call." That call was not like the call to the ministry, a call from Heaven, however. It was a call from India—the reverse of the famous Baxterian call, "a call from the unconverted." Notwithstanding, we hope to see of this holy union the usual fruits—prosperous fruits of flesh and blood we mean. In prudent consideration for the present and prospective wants of the new household, the Salvationist brethren and sisters have provided a dower of £5,000. And this not a matter of settlement on paper or parchment, but the money was paid down at the wedding ceremony, before the guests dispersed. An exemplary proof how British religious Fakirs and Derwishes even in their sublime flights of religious excitement, do not allow themselves to be unmindful of the main chance, and are careful of guarantees in respect of such needs of the flesh as they might still acknowledge. The whole thing was characteristic—orderly and prudent to perfection like a bank transaction. Our Asiatics would have gone wildly about it from beginning to end, unconscious of the morrow.

The event may hereafter prove an encumbrance, but the Cause will not be without its compensations. The Holy Army will be recruited by the operation of the physical laws of Nature, just as population is increased. Whether this is a gain on the whole, let the Romanists question. In any case, the Salvation Army by this step proves itself Protestant to a fault.

SPIRITUALISM—a distinctly American produce—has lately been brought to unenviable notoriety in the Empire City. In the course of the trial in New York, in April last, of a notorious wench, Editha Montez alias Madame Diss Debar, the wretch who was the partner of her bigamous or polygamous marriage, if such an adulterine intercourse deserved to be dignified with that name, Diss Debar, with perfect sans froid, admitted having a wife and children at Philadelphia, but then that was his "financial wife." As for the "lady" at his side—meaning the harlot Montez, Madame Montez if you will—that was his spiritual wife.

At the same time, news came from Europe that one of the famous American professional spiritualist sisterhood the Misses Fox, whose fame as "mediums" has gone to the ends of the Earth, has come to grief in Holland. It was Kate. Her elder sister had fascinated the sturdy American Arctic discoverer Captain Kane and become his wife. Kate ran a more distinguished and brilliant career. After the highest reputation in her native country, she went out to conquer the world, and she earned the right to the Cæsarian boast. She performed throughout Europe, before crowds as before crowned heads, under the eye of mature men of the world as well as men of law and scientific enquirers, with perfect success, without a single contrectatus, without the slightest suspicion of deceit. She had innumerable offers, and at last deigned to accept the hand of a German nobleman, by whom she was installed in his castle with princely appointments and concomitants and accessories, till she ruined him. Again she reverted to her mediumship, gave séances and again found herself in wealth and at the head of a luxurious establishment. But her extravagance knew no bounds. Besides, this spiritual girl was by no means a lady or a nice person at all. Her habits were gross and she kept bad company. In this manner, she ran through several fortunes. And now she is a drunken old hag at Haalem with barbarous children "growing" in Topsy-fashion without care. It was her inability to support them that brought her to the Police Court of that city and discovered her whereabouts and very existence. No wonder that in America her case should attract special notice and cause some sensation and no little discredit to the influence of spiritualism. When the very Sybils and prophetesses of the Faith are not refined, what may be expected of the rank and file of believers? it is naturally asked.

Under the circumstances, the Rev. Dr. Talmage, the eminent New York preacher, who from the pulpit has lately denounced spiritualism in no measured terms, can scarcely be blamed. The sermon called up a well-known advocate known as Judge Daly in America a lawyer who has once held judicial office may be ever afterwards called Judge—in reply. Mr. Daly seems to be the successor in spiritualist circles of Judge Edmonds, whose name used formerly to be invoked in evidence of the claims of Spiritualism. He has challenged Dr. Talmage to a conference in the longest hall in the city, undertaking to pay half the expenses, where he pledges to give substantial ocular proof of the phenomena. But the Rev. Padre shows no signs of taking up the glove. He contents himself with calling names, denouncing the Spiritualists, mediums and operators as cheats, and their believers as dupes and fools.

We are bound to note that "Judge" Daly on his honor declares that "he has seen materializations, and that they have approached him and he touched them, and then that they vanished into thin air."

WE see that the Madras Law Times & General Observer reprints from our columns Mr. Justice Trevelyan's judgment in the Jain case, nearly three columns, without acknowledgment, although it duly names the Englishman for three quarter columns of a law report.

The leading article in the same issue is headed, sensationally to be sure, rather than meaningly, "Foe or Friend." It opens with the remark, "Mr. Meredith Townsend is one of those Anglo-Indians that have the courage of their convictions," and seems to have for its subject that gentleman's last utterance. But no such thing. Only a second time does his name occur among those of "persons of the sort of Sir W. Hunter, Mr. Meredith Townsend, Sir H. Mayne, &c." A fine assortment, surely! It would be impossible to mention two writers so dissimilar in every literary and political characteristic—in style, in method, in cast of thought, in views on Indian affairs—than Sir William Hunter and Mr. Meredith Townsend. Neither is a typical Anglo-Indian, the latter is hardly one at all. Sir William has just retired from India, Mr. Townsend was here in the last century as it were. Sir William retains full touch of India—Mr. Townsend keeps the slightest possible. He had been in India, that is all. The whole of the modern epoch since the Mutiny, he has no personal experience of. Several years ago, he wrote to a correspondent in this country that, after twenty-five years, Calcutta has become a name to him. Mr. J. Fergusson, the great architect and archæologist, might just as well be called a Bengal Planter, because he had, in early life, been engaged in the indigo Districts, as Mr. Townsend called, without reservation, an Anglo-Indian, because he had, a quarter century back, been in India.

As for Sir H. Mayne, we positively know no such person or sort of persons. There was a Mayne in Madras, but he has not yet been knighted, though he would make a better knight than several of the lucky dogs in either of the Indian Orders, and, besides, he is J. D., not H. Mayne. But supposing there was an extraordinary mistake here, where has Mr. J. D. Mayne ever distinguished himself except in the quiet profession of the law? Where did he give "the concurring, sanctifying, and unimpeachable evidence," of which the Observer makes such laudatory mention? There is another surname of the same sound, that of Sir Henry Sumner Maine, but he is dead, and if the testimony of the dead were eligible, the writer had the choice of dozens on either side. Nor can we guess what deliverance of Sir H. S. Maine he refers to. Our impression of that unamiable Pandit has ever been unfavourable.

THE Criminal Sessions commenced on Monday and continued the whole week, Mr. Justice Wilson presiding. The first case taken up was the boy Sunnoo's torture by the Police. It concluded only yesterday. The Jury were unanimous that the Police had inflicted the torture, and that Inspector Boyd had no hand in it, but they were not agreed as to the identity of the three native constables. Six were for acquittal and three for conviction. The Judge accepted the verdict of the majority and the doubts of the Jury as to identity, and acquitted all the four prisoners. The Jurors were either Europeans or Eurasians, all the Native Jurymen called being challenged by the defence. Mr. Hill defended the Inspector and Mr. Palit the constables. The European barrister threw the whole blame on the constables, torture being, in his opinion, an Eastern mode of extorting confession, to which his European client could not possibly be a party. Poor Mr. Hill apparently had not heard of one Francis Bacon who somewhere, in the 16th century, successively held the offices of Attorney-General and Chancellor in some country in Europe. But, then, whose word is it and what is its derivation? And the rack, thumbkin and thumbscrew—what language are they? Or, are they European vocables coined in philologic philanthropy and shipped to the East, with mercenary soldiers, civilians, barristers, missionaries and such other blessings, for the temporal convenience and eternal salvation of the Orientals? The native barrister resented in Court the imputation on his country and meanness to his clients, and out of it had almost a scuffle with his learned friend.

The Police is in jubilee, for it was the Police that was on its trial. The Force raised a defence fund which was administered by the Deputy Commissioner. The trial proves that torture is in the ascendant in the Police, and difficult to detect. Its effect will be to make the Police still more cautious to keep out evidence of their guilt.

THE other sensational case—the commitment of a whole family for forgery—was early in the week postponed for a fortnight.

THE death of the adopting mother has precipitated the suit by the Dowager Maharani against the late scandalous adoption in the Burdwan Raj. Her plaint is ready and will probably be filed next week. Messrs. Woodroffe, Pugh, Gasper and O'Kinealy have been retained by Maharani Nairain Kumari. Sir Gregory Paul and Mr. Evans already hold general retainers from Lala Bunbehary Kapur. The Dowager Maharani claims the Raj as the next heir after the death of her husband, his adopted son and that son's widow. The suit is a matter of course, Sir Stuart Bayley himself sanctioned the adoption that the matter might be taken to court, which alone could decide it satisfactorily. The plaint is to be filed in the Original Side of the High Court. Baboos Nalinaksha Basu, Pleader, Burdwan, and Gonesh Chunder Chunder, the foremost attorney of the High Court, will instruct counsel on behalf of the Maharani.

IN the meantime, the local Government has begun to treat the Maharani more liberally. It has ordered an increase of Rs. 4,000 to her monthly allowance making up the sum to 9,000.

THE claim of the Maharani to the jewellery, her stridhan, is being investigated. It was originally agreed upon that the Collector Mr. Coxhead would arbitrate the matter, or that four-fifths of the jewels be handed over to the Maharani. But Mr. Coxhead is away from Burdwan, the Court of Wards would not agree to part with the jewels without a contest. The matter was ultimately referred to the arbitration of Mr. Pugh. Lala Bun Behary ignores altogether the claim of the Maharani to the jewellery. According to him, they form part of the Raj, she being allowed only to use them during the lifetime of her husband. Mr. Pugh has not yet made his award.

THE Lieutenant-Governor arrived from Darjeeling to-day. His Principal Secretaries of State are however left behind in the Hills. Mr. Macaulay will, he believe, soon join his Chief, but Mr. Edgar, we are sorry to learn, is ailing, and Dr. Ray has been called up.

We believe the Lieutenant-Governor has come especially to inquire personally on the spot into the scandals of the Calcutta Collectorate and the Income Tax department. The Presidency Commissioner has for some weeks been daily attending the office of the Board of Revenue on that business.

It would be as well if Sir Stuart Bayley took the opportunity to inquire into the connection of one of his officials with a Jain litigation.

WE have but one fact to add to the history of the official career of an Indian Civilian that we gave last week—all from official papers—in the leading article "The Daniel of Patna." To the honor of the British Indian Association, that body, under the hand of their Honorary Secretary, Maharaja Jotendro Mohun Tagore, sent up a spirited representation against Mr. Kirkwood's extraordinary proceedings in Chittagong to the Lieutenant-Governor, and got a snub for their pains from the Civilian Government. The matter, however, went up in due course to the Government of India, and this is the notice which the Viceroy in Council took of the matter, to wit—

"In reply I am to say that the Governor-General in Council feels bound to express the gravest disapprobation of Mr. Kirkwood's conduct in the matter, and is of opinion that he has been leniently dealt with. But under all the circumstances represented, it is not considered necessary to disturb Sir R. Temple's orders or to press any further action against Mr. Kirkwood. That gentleman should however be warned that any repetition of similar intemperate and insubordinate conduct, especially in connection with his judicial duties, will be most severely dealt with."

LAST Tuesday, in a well-known thoroughfare near the Aphim-ka Chowraha, Burrabazar, at 9 in the morning, a Marwari dealer in Germansilver ware, while sitting in front of his shop writing up his account book with his back to the street, was struck from behind by half a dozen Upcountry roughs called goohdas, who have become more than ever the pest of that busy part of the native town, who pursued their victim even when he ran into the recess of his shop for shelter, and there dealt blows on him, and then made themselves scarce. The man bled profusely and reported himself to the Police. But no enquiring officer came to the spot. On Friday, in front of Baboo Juggannath Khanna's place of business, in the same quarter, there was a street fight in which the knife was freely used and a man was cut in the arm. Whether out of regard for Baboo Khanna or what, the Police bestirred themselves in the matter and succeeded in arresting the parties, and there was an enquiry on the spot.

These are now common occurrences in Burra Bazar. No man's honor or person is safe. The city has been flooded with bad characters, who live by blackmail or by lending themselves to be tools of revenge of others. If Mr. Lambert can give a good account of these rascals, he may be pardoned for not finding stolen property.

And here we may as well draw his attention to the pest of volunteer brokers—Dalals—in common shopping in the same quarter, which has become simply intolerable. It is another phase of the same Rough business.

BY this our readers have had time to ponder on the judgment in the late Jain case which we published in full a few weeks back. We have neither time nor space to-day to enter into a narrative of this interesting litigation—so interesting indeed that a Government official has voluntarily gone to the risk of nearly seven lacs for one of the parties—but one remark we may make. It will be seen that the High Court admittedly decides the case on the general principles of the law applicable to Upcountry Hindus, instead of on those of Jain Law. It called for evidence on Jain Law, but did not after all care for it. Pandits were invited at great expense from the Jain country in the far West, who produced their Scriptures—venerable manuscripts—and then the Court fell back upon Custom—a few unauthoritative modern instances. And yet both sides appealed to the Jain Law—not Custom but veritable Sastra—the Jain Scripture. At first, indeed, the Claimant Lab Chand claimed under the Mitakshara—the authority which governs the non-Bengali Hindus generally—but, at a later stage, he declared, in his answer filed, that that had been a mistake on his part, and he prayed that his case might be decided according to the Jain Law. The opposite side, from the first, contended under the sacred Code of the Jains. Yet, in the face of this concurrent prayer, the Court went out of its way.

There are some recent or still pending Jain suits in Calcutta and Moorshedabad, which have a bearing on the point. We shall try to give the particulars in our next.

J. X PROGRESS OF LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

DIFFICULTIES OF THE EXPERIMENT.

THE Government of Bengal has won no small degree of popularity, by its recent abandonment of some of the privileges which it had originally retained in its hands, under the scheme of Local Self-Government. A large number of Municipalities have been allowed to elect their own Chairmen, and Sir Stuart Bayley is also prepared to give up the power of nominating a proportion of the Commissioners in favour of the people. Both these measures are intended to afford an extension to the elective principle on which Local Self-Government is based, and as that principle is highly valued by the people, they are naturally much pleased to find that the jealous caution with which the late régime guarded the working of municipalities, has given place to more trustful confidence in the people on the part of their present Ruler.

So far as these measures afford a proof that Local Self-Government has already proved a success in the eyes of Government, they are a gratifying testimony to the fitness of the people to take care of their own parochial affairs, while that success gives force to the demand which the entire country, through the mouth of its Congress, has put forth for a more substantial concession of representative government. Indeed, there are indications from more than one quarter that the Government cannot long be deaf to that demand. Lord Dufferin, as we said last week, is credited with being in real sympathy with the political aspirations of the people, and, for aught we know, his administration may, before its close, connect itself with a measure of constitutional reform for which posterity will not let its memory soon die. Time may be wanting to carry his views into practical execution, but it will be enough if his Lordship places them on record, and endeavours to give the weight of his influence to obtain their recognition by the Government at Home.

In the meantime, anything likely to place the working of Local Self-Government upon a wider and more satisfactory basis, cannot but be welcome to those who have the political advancement of the country at heart. As an instrument of political training, Local Self-Government is destined to exercise a great influence for good, and we cannot but congratulate our local bodies in the country upon the attitude of Sir Stuart Bayley towards the scheme. The extension of the elective constitution, which will take place under the orders of the Government referred to, will have a most reassuring effect upon the administration of Local Self-Government. The time, however, has fairly come when the Government might go a step further, and take such steps as would tend to more really strengthen the hands of these local magnates and invest them with greater dignity. The present measures proposed by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal relate to the constitution of the municipal Boards, but what is wanted for the efficient conduct of business by these Boards, is an extension, under discreet safeguards, of their power. Their position should be invested with an air of more authority, and more cordial support should be accorded to them by Government, when they are beset by difficulties of detail in the transaction of business.

The success of Local Self-Government, like that of many things besides, is often a question of money. If our local authorities have adequate funds placed at their disposal, the administration of affairs will presumably be efficient, and successful in general estimation. But the financial difficulty is a powerful drawback everywhere, so far as our information goes. The local authorities are, indeed, invested by law with power to impose and levy a number of taxes, which are expected to yield a revenue sufficient for their purposes. But the municipal taxes are so devised and, in fact, are so repugnant to the spirit of the people, as to be a more fruitful source of irritation than of profit. We think the people are well pleased to pay a land tax, and are scarcely conscious of the taxation which is collected by indirect means. But the house-tax, modelled and practically administered on the principle of the Income-tax, is an object of universal detestation, and is submitted to only through fear of the officiousness, which has all along administered it. The official administration of the municipalities having terminated, there is now the greatest difficulty felt in the collection of the municipal rates. A thorough unloosening of authority has taken place, and municipal bills are now realised much under the same terms as bills for voluntary subscriptions. Such, at any rate, is the information brought to us from some quarters, and we have no reason to distrust it. The tax is essentially so unpopular that people are not unlikely to evade it, where they possibly can do so with impunity. The collecting staff under the non-official authorities are put off under one pretence or another, till the regular time fixed by the law for the collection of the bills expires. Bills for several quarters accumulate on their hands, and neither they, nor their masters, the municipal authorities, dare put the legal machinery of distraint in operation. The orders for distraint issued by non-official authorities carry no terrors, and instances have happened where they have been resisted with every circumstance of violence and insult. Nor have the non-official town-corporators any practical redress at the hands of the constituted magisterial authorities in such cases. A case in our knowledge lately took place in a neighbouring municipality, where the municipality, after suffering disgrace and loss of prestige from violent resistance to its order for the attachment of property, lodged a complaint against the village Hamden, but the magistrate, upon some technical plea, dismissed the case, and the municipality had to recover its composure of mind, if not its violated dignity, after spending some good money after bad. Other cases with a similar termination, illustrating the absence of touch between the magisterial and municipal authorities, and tending to lower the dignity of the municipal administration in public estimation, are not unknown.

As a consequence heavy arrears in the collection of the taxes have accrued in most places, and there are some municipalities which are hardly in a position to maintain their credit. We have stated the facts as they have been represented to us. Without offering any suggestions on the subject, for the present, we must say that the above* discloses a state of things of too grave a character to be allowed to continue, while it cannot fail to have the most paralysing effects upon the administration of municipal affairs. The financial administration of municipalities, and the methods by which Government may well strengthen it, are matters which we have scarcely left ourselves space to dwell upon in the present article, and we must return to the subject soon.

THE SUPPLEMENTARY HONOURS LIST.

THE Crown in India seems to labour under an unaccountable infirmity of purpose. As the Fountain of Honour, it hardly knows its mind. It was understood that the Fountain had been drained to the dregs in the Tropical showers and Deluge of Her Majesty's Jubilee, and was finally left dry by the tapping on New Year's Day. And it was authoritatively announced by those who most speculate on the grave subject—including in our community the Mirror—that there would be no drop forthcoming on what may in Hindu parlance be called the Ambabachi of Her Majesty's Birth-day. Nevertheless, there was a drizzle on the holiday in question, just enough to revive a number of thirsty loyal subjects. It was a surprise, however—a surprise, we were afterwards told, as much to the Government of India as to the public.

But there is no end to the graciousness of the Crown. The Fountain is an inexhaustible reservoir, prompt to relieve with its healing waters respectable citizens afflicted with doxomania, and even capable of blessing with its sprays of recognition the lives of honest human worth, or recognising good service to the state. So, surprise upon surprise, here comes, in the middle of the year, a Supplementary List—a few late drops—of Honours. We are informed by telegraph, from the Press Commissioner's office, that the following gentlemen have been made

Knights Commander of the Indian Empire.—Maharajah Harendra Kishore Singh Bahadur of Bettiah; Hon'ble Gregory Charles Paul, C. I. E., Advocate-General, Bengal; and Maharajah Narendra Krishna of Calcutta.

His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General is pleased to confer, as a personal distinction, the following titles on the gentlemen named against each:

Nawab.—Syed Mahammad Takee Khan, Zemindar in the District of Mozufferpore.

Raja.—Kumar Gyanoda Kant Roy of Chanchra, in the Jessore District.

Khan Bahadur.—Syed Kazi Reza Hossein of Patna.

Rai Bahadur.—Babu Ganga Pershad of Durbhungah; Babu Hurry Mohun Thacoor, Zemindar of Berary in the District of Bhagulpore; Babu Shanker Dyal Singh, Honorary Magistrate, in the Shahabad District; Babu Bepin Behary Dutt, Government Pleader of Midnapore; Babu Surja Kumar Pundit, District Engineer in Moorshedabad.

Many of the names are too local for recognition by the general public, but the District officers who make the recommendations doubtless know their men well, and their favorite Chaprasis best of all. We are glad that poor Bettiah, weighed down by the double encumbrance of body and estate, has got this crumb of comfort. Our Sobhabazar noble is also to be congratulated on his attaining the acme of ambition. He had been balked too long. Sir Steuart Bayley has stood him in better stead than his own patron Sir Rivers Thompson. The young Zemindar of Chanchra has only got his due, being Raja by vox populi, whether an alien Government recognise him or not. Son of Barodakanta the Good, he is the representative of one of the old landed Houses in the land. We hope he will merit higher honors: Hurry Mohan Thakur Sheb could scarcely in decency be longer overlooked. After so much has been made of the Kalwars in the Monghyr and Bhagulpore country all this time by the officials, the poor Brahman has been rescued from the shade. The best name to our mind on the list of the new Roy Bahadoors is that of the Government Pleader in Midnapore. We do not know this gentleman and we are not partial to pleaders as a class. But he is highly spoken of, and there is no doubt of the great influence of the class in the country, an influence which is on the increase, an increase which nothing can check. It is wise in the Government to recognise the importance of these native lawyers. We would not have titles indiscriminately showered on them however, and for two reasons. It does not matter that they are new men. The British Court is a new Court, and its lesser Omrahs must, many of them, be new men. But the vakeels, as a rule, are wanting in public spirit, and they usually do not live as befits their position and opulence. Baboo Bepin Behary Dutt is an exception. His style, we are told, is that of a thorough gentleman. We shall return to the general subject, with special reference to the native pleaders and attorneys of the High Court, on a future day, and will now conclude with our hearty satisfaction at the well-deserved recognition of the Advocate-General's claim. We have not the pleasure of his acquaintance, but have had ample opportunities of watching him as one of the prominent members of the Calcutta community, and we can honestly say that Mr. Paul has been much too long neglected. He has not only been for a long series of years the official leader of the Calcutta bar and chief law adviser of the Crown, but he has been for a generation one of the opulent citizens of the town, ready to every call of duty, and in all the amenities of life. He is one of the leading Omrahs of Christian Calcutta. His knighthood is also a just recognition of the claims of that Armenian community which once played so important a part in the history of India, specially in building up the fabric of British Power, and still plays it in Turkey, Egypt, Persia and Burma, of which Mr. Paul is now the head.

WE have great satisfaction in laying before our readers the results of the last medical competition. The following have passed the 1st M. B. Examination.

- | | |
|--|-------------------|
| 1. Virginia Mary Mitra. | } First Division. |
| 2. Noreesh Chunder Mitra. | |
| 3. Grish Chunder Dey. | |
| 4. Manmatha Nath Chatterjee. | |
| 5. Trishita Nath Sinha. | |
| 6. Grish Chunder Ghosh. | |
| 7. Bidu Mukhi Bose, also
Chuni Lal Nandi and Gopal Chunder Ghose. | |

The list is in order of merit. The last two, Nandi and Ghose, have barely passed. The first and seventh of those marked for distinction, are, it is worthy of remark, ladies. Two girl graduates among seven candidates of both sexes, who have passed with distinction, is indeed a remarkable success and proof of social progress. The education of women has nowhere yet proceeded so far and so generally, specially in the sciences and the learned professions, but that such a fact would be one for gratulation in any part of the world, howsoever advanced. In India, where this education for the males has just commenced as it were, where the University is scarcely a generation old, where women have been admitted to the medical school within the last few years, the fact is of proportionally greater significance. We have been at some pains to inquire and we are assured that the examination was strict; no favour was shown to creed or sex. The ladies have won in fair field. Both are gems of students and Virginia is a brilliant.

The First M. B. is the serious part of the business, the second or final examination being comparatively a formality. The nine who have passed the First Test are, therefore, sure of their degrees, if they care for it. With or without it, they are recognised proficient.

In view of the great movement inaugurated by Lady Dufferin for the relief of Indian womankind, the success of the ladies is most timely. We are sure both ladies will find honorable and useful employment under the Society. If Miss Mitra is the first in the First Division, Miss Bose, we learn, is a remarkable student of science with powers of observation keener and knowledge more practical and, therefore, genuine than all the rest of the competition.

The results of the Second M. B. are as follows :—

FIRST DIVISION.—Nilratan Sarkar.

SECOND DIVISION.—Sureschandra Basu, Syamnirad Das Gupta, Purnachandra Nandi, Akshaykumar Pal, Mahendranath Sen.

Only two students have been admitted in the First L. M. S., namely, — Bhagabatikumar Chaudhuri and Amritalal Sarkar.

IN Engineering, only eight students have passed the First Examination, in the Second Division :—

W. S. Bremner, Adharlal Chandra, Kshiradchandra Mukhopadhyay, Krishnadhan Bandyopadhyay, Saratchandra Sen, J. B. Godfrey, Jnanendranath Gangopadhyay, Satyaranjan Khashtgir.

AKBAR.

Akbar probably would not have left his new conquest so early, but he hastened his return to Hindustan, by reason of the accounts he had received of the refractory conduct of his eldest son Selim. This prince was now about thirty years of age, and it would appear that he was not deficient in natural abilities, but had almost ruined these natural powers, by gross indulgences. He was addicted to the excessive use both of wine and opium, and by such habits had no doubt impaired his mental powers; as a fact he did so impair these faculties, that he became liable to ungovernable fits of fury. In one of these outbursts of rage, he ordered an offender to be flayed alive. When Akbar heard of this atrocity, he turned away, in unconcealed disgust; for Akbar could not bear to see even a dead beast flayed, without a sense of pain, and therefore he could not but feel the greatest repugnance and surprise that a son of his could be guilty of such conduct to a fellow being. On another occasion, Selim instigated, and had carried out by his Agents, the murder of Abul Fazl, one of the most trusted and honoured of his father's ministers. When Akbar heard of Abul Fazl's sad fate, he wept bitterly, and past two days and nights without sleep: he seems never to have discovered his son's share in the base crime. We are told, by Selim himself, that in his youth he used to drink about five quarts of wine a day, and that in consequence he was thoroughly nerveless, and his hands shook, as if palsied, if he remained for a single hour without his accustomed stimulant. After he ascended the throne, we are told, he reduced the quantity he drank daily to one-fourth, and that he never drank in public, but after nightfall. It is probable that he did not adhere to the rule regarding quantity, though he avoided any public display of intemperance. Drinking seems to have been the vice of the age among Mussulmans, their kings and their great men alike drank hard; Baber and Humayun are notable examples, while Akbar is an honourable exception.

Akbar, on his departure for the Deccan, had declared Selim his successor, appointed him Viceroy of Ajjair, and committed to him the conduct of the war with the Rana of Oudipore; for that restless young chief was again trying to obtain possession of his hereditary dominions. After many delays, and much hesitation, Selim at last set forth to, accomplish this task, but he stopt on the way, and then attempted to seize the province of Hindustan, unrighteously for himself. He marched to Agra, but the governor of that Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Vicissitudes of climate, exposure and hardships, tell heavily on soldiers and sailors, sowing the seeds of diseases which may ultimately break up the constitution. Naturally careless of their health a word in season may avert many evils, and may cause them to resort to timely measures without any difficulty or publicity. Holloway's effectual remedies are so suitable, and are so easily adapted for the varied complaints to which our soldiers and sailors are liable, that a supply should always be obtained before proceeding abroad. It may with confidence be stated that many a valuable life might have been saved, or confirmed cripples prevented from begging in the streets, if Holloway's remedies had been used in time.

city foiled him in his attempt to get possession of it. He then proceeded to Allahabad, and soon held possession of Oudh and Behar. At the same time he seized the local treasure of the Government, amounting to thirty lacs of rupees, and assumed the title of king. Akbar, as might be expected, was much afflicted when he received intelligence of the conduct of his son. He determined, however, to act with prudence, so as not to drive him to extremities. With this intention he wrote a very temperate letter to Selim, setting clearly forth his evil acts, and showing him what the consequences would be if he continued in his present course. After warning him thus, he changed the tone of the epistle to affectionate entreaty, and concluded the letter with assurances of his undiminished affection, if he would return in time to the path of his duty. Akbar followed this letter in person, and doubtless his near approach had more effect than the epistle. Selim replied in very submissive terms and marched to meet his father, then changed his mind, stopt at Etayah, and began raising troops with much assiduity. Akbar hearing that he had collected a considerable body of men, desired him to advance with only an escort, or to return to Allahabad. Selim fell back on Allahabad.

Akbar was still desirous of avoiding an open rupture with his son, and for the purpose of conciliating him, offered him a grant of Bengal and Orissa, which latter had also been absorbed in the empire. This offer was accepted by Selim with renewed and profound professions of fidelity and devotion, all which expressions, however, had a hollow ring. A more satisfactory reconciliation was at last effected through the intervention of Selima Sultana, one of the emperor's wives, who had adopted Selim, after his own mother's death. It was Akbar, however, who sent this lady to him, to endeavour to soothe his mind and heal the breach. The attempt proved successful, and the prince repaired to Court, and made his submission. He was received by Akbar with much kindness, and the privilege of wearing the royal ornaments, was conferred on him. Selim afterwards returned to his almost independent position at Allahabad, and became more than ever debauched.

Selim was now Akbar's only son, for both his other sons, Morad and Danyal, were dead; the latter a victim to intemperance. Akbar's only hope of continuing his great empire, rested on this remaining son, and, failing him, on his two most likely grandsons, Khusrow, and Khurram, the former was the eldest, but was as bad as his father, or even worse, being full of levity and of a violent disposition. Khurram was Akbar's and a general favourite.

XXI.

Akbar's public life was one of astonishing magnificence, yet the pomp of his court was befitting so great a potentate. It is stated that his stud comprised 5,000 elephants, and 12,000 horses, besides vast hunting and hawking establishments. His camp equipage consisted of tents and portable houses, which used to be enclosed in a high wall composed of canvas screens, and contained immense reception halls, apartments for entertainments, galleries for exercise, with chambers for retirement. The whole was made of the most costly materials and well adapted to the purpose of the most luxurious enjoyment. The camp itself covered a space of nearly five miles across, and, viewed from a height, afforded a most glorious spectacle, looking like a beautiful city of tents, with regulated streets. The whole wall and each tent was painted red on the outside, but within were varied colours and patterns; and all being surmounted with gilded globes and pinnacles, added to the gorgeousness of the display.

Such was the ordinary camp of Akbar. But it was at the annual feasts, and on the anniversary of the king's birthday, the Eastern grandeur was fully displayed, and this display was continued for several days, during which a fair was held. All this time there were pompous shows and processions. On these occasions the emperor's tent was set up, and it occupied at least two acres of ground, which was spread with silken and gold carpets. The tent was of the richest materials, while the hangings were of valuable velvet, embroidered with gold, pearls, and precious stones. The pavilions of the nobles, which were scattered around the emperor's tent, were on a similar scale of magnificence—here they received visits from each other, and sometimes from the emperor.

During these days of festival the emperor bestowed rich presents on his nobles, which consisted of dresses, jewels, horses, and elephants. It was also customary for the emperor to weigh himself in golden scales, against silver, gold, and perfumes, in succession, when all this wealth was distributed among the spectators. Afterwards, large trays, filled with almonds and other fruits, made of gold and silver, were placed before him, these he scattered with his own hand, and they were eagerly caught up by the courtiers, though of small intrinsic value.

On the great day of the festival, the emperor repaired to his marble palace and seated himself on his throne—around him, in groups, stood his nobles of high degree, arrayed in gorgeous apparel, their turbans adorned with high feather plumes, sparkling with diamonds and other precious stones which glittered like stars in the firmament. While the emperor was thus seated and attended, hundreds and hundreds of elephants marched past in the open, in companies, the leading animal of each band having his head and breast adorned with golden plates, studded with rubies and emeralds. The elephants were succeeded by trains of richly caparisoned horses, and these were followed by lines of rhinoceroses, lions, tigers, and panthers, hunting leopards, hounds, and hawks. An innumerable host of cavalry glittering in cloth of gold, closed the procession.

Nothing shows more clearly Akbar's self-government, than the fact, that in the midst of all this pageantry and splendour, he was always remarkable, as much for his simplicity, as dignity. It is stated that there was nothing of the coldness or stiffness of other Asiatic Princes, about him, he was affable though majestic, and when severe, always merciful. It is memorable that he always stood or sat below the throne, when administering justice. This action of his conveys a wholesome lesson. Justice was meant to be independent of power.

To the common people of his realms he was most affable, ever receiving them, or their presents, with more grace and ceremony, than he bestowed on the great and the noble. Hence he was loved and revered by his own people, while he was a terror to his enemies, or to evil-doers within his realm. It must puzzle the student of history, why Aurangzib is the favourite of Mussulmans of the present time, as he was of generations gone by. Aurangzib was a ruthless bigot, and his life was lived on a much lower plane than that of Akbar. In fact, there can be no genuine comparison between the two. For it is to his internal policy that Akbar owes his place among the highest order of princes, whose lives have been a blessing to mankind; and his policy was ever marked by a spirit of toleration in matters of religion, even during that period when Akbar was a strict follower of the Prophet and held to the infallibility of the Koran. It was late in life that he openly declared his latitudinarian opinions.

Akbar was a great patron of letters and literary men. His constant and deep attachment for the brothers, Feizi and Abul Fazl, was owing to the great literary ability of these men; and it was Feize who, under the emperor's directions, applied himself to the diligent study of Hindu literature and science, obtaining a mastery over these subjects, as taught by the great Hindu savants. It was Feizi also, who showed great industry in conducting a systematic inquiry into every branch of the knowledge of the Brahmans. Besides Sanskrit poetical and philosophical works, he made a version of the "Bija Ganita" and "Lilavati" of Bhaskara Acharya, which were considered the best Hindu treatises on Algebra and Arithmetic. Akbar likewise had translations made from the Sanskrit, by other learned men, among which may be mentioned, the Vedas, "Maha Bharata," and "Ramayana," also the "History of Cashmir," which last was the only specimen of that sort of composition in Sanskrit prose. Further, Akbar obtained the services of a Christian priest from Goa, to undertake the education of young men, who would afterwards be employed as translators of Greek literature into Persian. A correct Persian translation of the four Evangelists was produced under authority.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

tation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee purih, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standground purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there, is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY
(Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression. It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

MATTHEW ARNOLD.

WEEP, if ye have the power to weep,
All flowers of odorous and musical names
That haunt the woodland or the wave of Thames—
Weep, if ye have the power to weep,
Let soft dews your quaint eyelids steep,
Fling incense from your many-colour'd flames.

Mourn, if ye have the power to mourn,
Glaciers and Alpine firs—ye too, sea-isles!—
For he is gone who sang your primal smiles,
Ere each was from the other torn,
In those strange Summers unforlorn
Ere ye were parted by the sad blue miles.

Spirits! if joy perforce must dwell
Where Arnold's graceful light upon you breaks,
Goethe and all his golden-thoughted Greeks,
If ye must hail such stranger well,
At least amidst your asphodel
Let roll in silver up the shadowy creeks

Some rippled tidings of our woe,—
For ah! we miss the voice that nobly sings
The central calm thro' all disquietings;
The far-off light that circles so
The line of everlasting snow;
The beauty hidden in the heart of things.

And we in these cold April bowers,
Since Laleham's sod enwrapp'd his hands and feet,
Are poorer by a stately presence sweet—
And miss thro' all the wealth of flow'rs
The phrase that made them doubly ours,
Poet of fields, of moons, of Marguerite.

Poet, in our poor flurried time,
Of fine completeness and of lucid ease;
Fair Master of old songs' superbest keys,
Magician of the fetterless chime,
Free from the fatal sweets of rhyme,
In Sophoclean form and cadences,—
Poet of exquisite regret;
Of lines that aye on Time's confused height
Out of the storm shall stand in stars of white;
Of thoughts in deepening distance set
Perfect in pictured epithet
Touch'd with a pencil-tip of deathless light,—

Poet of high untrodden snows,
Of ocean's indefatigable roll,
And of the everlasting human soul
Hush'd in immutable repose,
On whose white calm no gold or rose
Colours with change the pale immortal whole,—

If we miss sore in songs of thine
One Name (which missing, so much more is miss'd), Breath more austere pure hath never kiss'd
Our fever'd brows than blows divine
Over thy lofty starlit line,—
All virgin pages somewhere whisper—Christ!

AN APRIL LOVE.

NAY, be not June, nor yet December, dear,
But April always, as I find thee now:
A constant freshness unto me be thou,
And not the ripeness that must soon be sere.
Why should I be Time's dupe, and wish more near
The sobering harvest of thy very vow?
I am content, so still across thy brow
Returning smile chase transitory tear.
Then scatter thy April heart in sunny showers;
I want nor Summer drouth nor Winter's sleet:
As Spring be fickle, so thou be as sweet;
With half-kept promise tantalise the hours;
And let Love's frolic hands and woodland feet
Fill high the lap of Life with wilding flowers.

ALFRED AUSTIN.

IN MEMORIAM.

OH, to recall the days when, on the road
That led me, cheerful or depressed, towards home,
My little timid son was wont to come
Within my ken, not far from my abode!
On seeing me his eager joy he curbed,
Uncertain of my mood. He peeled his stick
With anxious mien, while casting glances quick
To learn my humour; if I seemed disturbed
As I drew near, he loitered by my side.—
A thought behind—and looked intent on work;
But if I smiled—then, with a sudden jerk,
His stick flew far, and such a whelming tide
Of love burst forth, in smiles and misty tears,
And pressure of his loving little hand, and eager confidence of hopes and fears.

Oh, that we did not fail so oft to find
God's angels in our children! How our eyes
Are holden, while we deem that we are wise;
Whereas we are but very dull and blind!
For what are trifling faults—a noisy tone,
A broken platter, or a missing hat?
Can we not foster love so passionate,
Yet gently chide? Alas! why be so prone
To silence lips so loving, or to make
The little heart e'en for a moment ache
Because our nerves are jarred? How soon we lose Perception of the treasure of its love!
Shock our fastidious sense, and we refuse
The love that fills the little heart with joy—the solace that could half our griefs remove.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

MANY of our countrymen have doubtless heard of the Heavens having rained blood at certain places, as of showers of frogs and snakes. They are not such utter myths as Horatio is apt to think. The former phenomenon was lately observed in Ceylon—no longer the land of fable and the ten-headed Ravana, but a British Colony. There was at Galle a heavy downpour of rain which at places, from 15 to 20 minutes, seemed to be a red liquid. In fact, it seemed to rain diluted blood. We are glad that samples have been kept for analysis. We are curious to learn the result, and should specially like to hear the cause ascribed. It can hardly be blood, but then what is it? Above all, how—it got there?

THE powdered seeds of the Jam, Jamon, or Jambol (Eugenia Jambulana or Syzygium Jambulanum) has been introduced into Europe as a remedy for Diabetes miltus. It is said to have been tested by the Faculty in England, Germany and the United States, with the best results. The Lancet however questions the virtues of the seed.

POST CARDS may be cheap and convenient, but there is danger in using them, being exposed to the gaze of the whole world. It is therefore satisfactory to learn that the Postmaster-General of England has under consideration a new kind of close postcards which will have the privacy of a letter and be sold at less than a penny. We hope the Director of the Department in India will now lose no time in ridding the Empire of the nuisance.

THE Bengal Act to amend the Bengal Municipal Act III of 1884, empowering the Local Government "at any time, by notification in the Calcutta Gazette, (to) exclude from the limits of any Municipality any lands or holdings in the occupation of Government for Military or Naval purposes," was assented to by His Excellency the Governor-General on the 27th June last. This probably accounts for the premature announcement in the Englishman that the new proposed Municipal law for Calcutta had received the final sanction of Lord Dufferin.

GLORY to Gotama! The wisdom of the Farther East is asserting itself. A Burman has beat all the Middle Templars. Mr. Chan Toon has just been called to the bar. He had competed for and won all the principal eight prizes open to law students, and has obtained the following unusual compliment—of a resolution of the Benchers of his Temple at a parliament:—

"The Masters of the Bench of the Middle Temple desire to offer their best congratulations to Mr. Chan-Toon on his most distinguished career as a student of the Inn, and, recognising the great honour Mr. Chan-Toon has by his success gained for the society, the Masters of the Bench express the sincere hope that his career throughout life may fulfil the promise of its commencement."

That is a success of which any nation might be proud.

THE following startling discovery is noticed by the Moffussil Notes man of the Indian Planter's Gazette:—

"Dr. Vincent Richards has our heartiest sympathies in having been forestalled in the discovery of an antidote to snake poisoning. A Mr. Patrick Cunningham of America has discovered an arrangement by means of which the result of a snake biting a man is sudden death to the snake. It consists of a lotion which, when swallowed, makes the swallower a poison barrel. When a snake's fangs strike him, an electric current is generated, which drives the virus in the reptile's body through every blood vessel in its system, causing almost instant death. Thus is the bitter bit. Mr. P. Cunningham is, we believe, no relation to the luminary of the Calcutta High Court."

That should be eminently satisfactory, no doubt, but "something too much of it!" To our feeble mind, the man would be unenviably endowed—over protected. Converted by the Cunningham process into a living—or moribund or dead—electric barrel and battery, he might proudly confront all comers—good, bad and indifferent. Neither friend nor foe would be welcome. Who would care to approach a being so armed cap-à-pied at all points? Angels and monsters alike would be in danger from such a doctored being, let serpent alone. The horrid loneliness of such an invulnerable unit of humanity might be insupportable, and the bearer of the charmed life might finally throw up the burden in despair, but then the attempt itself would probably be defeated by civil war—an intercorporeal conflict.

The bitter-bit may be a desirable result, it is certainly an orthodox punishment. But the friend who attempts to shake hands would be repelled by this powerful human battery with a violence truly dangerous to limbs, if not life itself.

In the beginning of the century, such men might have been made man-traps of and fixed on game preserves, as intelligent substitutes for spring-guns. Even now, the Forest Department might try some of them in the wilder jungles infested with dangerous beasts and desperate robbers of forest produce.

Is our contemporary's allusion to Judge Cunningham meant for a compliment? It does not look like coming from the right hand.

RUKMABAI has at last compromised her case with her husband Dadaji. She pays Rs. 2,000 by way of costs and he agrees not to execute the decree obtained against her, ordering her to go to the husband and pay him his costs. The Appeal Court has allowed the compromise and confirmed the original decree. The appeal last came before the Chief Justice Sir Charles Sargent and Mr. Justice Bayley on the 6th July, when Mr. Jardine, on behalf of the wife appellant, thus addressed the Court:—

"In this case I think your lordships will be relieved from the necessity of a further consideration of the appeal. As your lordships know this was a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights, brought by the husband against the wife, who has from the commencement uniformly resisted all the attempts of the husband to induce her to live with him as his wife. So far as the courts are concerned, the law has been against her, and the decree has passed ordering her to return to him. When the appeal was before your lordships the other day, I said your lordships would affirm the decree of the lower court on the main question, the only question then to be dealt with being whether or not the order made by Mr. Justice Farran, that the costs were to be paid by the defendant, should be upheld. Since then proposals have been made to us—

Mr. Vicajee: By mutual friends.

Mr. Jardine (continuing)—And on behalf of Rukmabai I have seen my way to accept them. I would therefore ask your lordships to pass a consent decree in these terms. The defendant undertaking to pay Rs. 2,000 to plaintiff in satisfaction of all costs within a fortnight from to-day, the decree of the lower court be affirmed, the plaintiff undertaking not in any way to execute the decree, nor in future to assert any claim by suit or otherwise as a husband against defendant's person or her present or future estate. The appellant to have leave to withdraw the monies or Government paper lodged in the court as security for the execution of the decree of the court below and of the costs of the appeal."

Mr. Vicajee representing the husband assented:—

"For the respondent I assent to the terms my learned friend has proposed. But I may say that the proposal, though it was a wise one, did not emanate entirely from us, but it was brought about by the assistance of mutual friends. It must, however, be understood that if within a fortnight from to-day the money is not paid, the decree is to be executed in the ordinary manner. The question was originally raised in order that it might be decided whether a Hindoo husband is entitled to a restitution of conjugal rights. That point has been decided in the husband's favour, but since the defendant has apparently no affection for the plaintiff, I think he has acted well in determining not to press his claim further."

This is a kind of divorce by mutual consent. Rukmabai consents to be the wife but not to live as such with Dadaji. Is she entitled to any maintenance from him? By the last decree she may claim it, unless otherwise excluded.

THE Slavery question has raised its head again in America. We read—

"Judge Tulay, of Chicago, has decided that marriage between slaves could not be legally contracted, the parties being irresponsible chattels, and that all the offspring of such marriages must be held illegitimate. The point arose during the hearing of a will case, in which the descendants of married slaves claimed property. The decision seems to be in conflict with the Constitutional Amendment, which was intended to legalize slave marriages. An appeal will be taken, and the matter settled by the Supreme Court."

THEY have invented in America what is called the cyclone pulverizer.

In this apparatus, it is said, gold quarts are reduced to the finest dust in remarkably short time.

"The principle is the bringing together of two whirling and opposing currents of air, the substance to be crushed being introduced into the vortex thus created. The particles are pulverized by constant and violent attrition against each other, and are then withdrawn in the shape of fine dust by an ordinary fan blower. The mechanism is very simple, the currents of air being produced by a pair of discs armed with blades similar to those of a screw propeller, and rapidly revolving in different directions. The pulverization is thus precisely similar to the havoc that would be caused by two cyclones meeting each other, and, indeed, the first idea of the invention was suggested by the action of this force in nature. Those engaged in gold mining will be interested to know that a cyclone pulverizer, weighing 5,000 lbs., can do the work of a battery of twenty head of stamps. Strength, simplicity of construction, cheapness, effectiveness, and economy of labour are thus all on the side of the new invention. Considerable expenditure on gold mining plant is still being incurred in India, and it is well that this powerful pulverizer should be brought under the attention of engineers. Of course, it will be evident that the invention can be applied to a variety of other substances besides quartz, and altogether the discovery of the principle opens up some important possibilities in mechanical science."

SIR STEUART BAYLEY starts on his tour on the 27th. He visits Midnapore, Bancoora, Raniganj, Deoghur, Dumka and Suri, and returns to the capital on or about the 12th August.

WE read:—

"Twelve anarchists called at the office of the Intransigent on 30th May, to demand the insertion of some notice or other, and when it was refused, threatened to burn down the house. Thereupon M. Rochefort drew a revolver and threatened to blow out the brains of the first man who approached. The twelve anarchists drew in return, and the 'shootin' was just about to begin, when the police arrived and prevented further mischief."

Journalism in the Territories of the American Union was scarcely encompassed by more serious difficulties than it is now in the French Republic.

IN the Benares defamation case against the station master Mahendranath Sircar by the Parcel Clerk Soshibhusan Chatterjee, the Joint-Magistrate Mr. Hope has found the station master guilty. He is of opinion that the words "this shows that the parcel clerk has some selfish interest in despatching fruits by night train" are defamatory, and has fined him Rs. 51, in default of payment one month's simple imprisonment. Mahendra of course paid down the fine.

A NEW pleasure has long been called for, but it has not been forthcoming these nearly two thousand years. Pain is not so shy. New diseases are continually cropping up. Here is one. In the last annual report of the Scottish Presbyterian Medical Mission at Moukden, in China, occurs the following:—

"A peculiar case of spasm of the tongue appeared recently among the out-patients. Patient stated that nine months previously, after a drink of cold water while heated he became stupid and delirious. This was followed by a feeling of fear and sleeplessness; and shortly afterwards the tongue was attacked. Now, other symptoms have passed off, but that organ is in a state of constant spasmodic motions which makes it almost impossible for the patient either to speak or eat. When the mouth is closed a peculiar sound is produced, and when open the tongue moves backwards and forwards with extraordinary rapidity, over which the patient has no control. Otherwise, he enjoys good health."

He must be a marvellous creature to do so under all his disadvantages! Why don't the missionaries learn from him the secret of good health without eating?

THEY have been running a passenger train experimentally between New York and Boston, with electric lights. Each car is illuminated by 18 sixteen-candle glow lamps.

THE Mysadul estate in Midnapore has been deprived of its head. Coomar Iswar Prasad Garga had been living with his family in Calcutta for some time. He had been ailing and died here Wednesday week. The family last Sunday removed to the family seat. The last of the three brothers Jyoti Prasad will now represent the family. Iswar Prasad was only 26 years of age.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

EMPEROR WILLIAM II. was to have embarked for St Petersburg at Kiel yesterday on board the Imperial Yacht in command of his brother Prince Henry—a name reminding one of the famous Portuguese "Navigator." His Majesty will be escorted to the Neva by five ironclads. Count Herbert Von Bismarck, not the Chancellor, accompanies. The Czar comes to Cronstadt to welcome the emperor. The emperors meet on board the Russian Yacht, thence proceed up the river to Peterhoff.

FORTY-TWO ironclads have been collected at Spithead and Portland for war manœuvres. The Bill concerning the constitution of the House of Lords has been withdrawn. At the instance of the Duke of Argyll, the House voted without division confidence in the Government as regards its Irish policy. In the House of Commons, a resolution, supported by Mr. Gladstone, to remunerate the members, was rejected by a majority of 57 votes. Mr. Parnell gave notice of a motion for a Select Committee to enquire into the Times' charges against himself. Mr. Smith at first referred him to the law courts, but, being better advised, now offers him a Commission of Judges. The House adjourns in the middle of next month and reassembles at the end of October.

In the French Chamber of Deputies, General Boulanger suddenly moved for its dissolution with bitter attacks on the politicians and the régime. The Premier made a passionate reply criticising the General's conduct. Boulanger was in rage. He called Floquet an impudent liar and left the House preparatory to his resignation of his seat in the Chamber as now constituted. The Premier, however, has not done with the General. He has challenged him to mortal combat. The fiery General hesitates.

King Milan of Serbia has grown sick of her Queen Natalie. He is said to be suing for separation for incompatibility of temper. She is at Wiesbaden with her son Prince Alexander, whom she refuses to deliver to the King. A process is out against her.

Distressing news is telegraphed from Cape Town. Five hundred persons are said to have been burnt to death by a terrible fire occurring in the entrance shaft of a mine in Kimberley owned by one DeBeers.

THERE had been a check in March, but since then gold digging in the Transvaal has been making good progress, so that in the four months from January to April, the Cape Colony has exported £2,41,391 worth of gold against £2,36,487 worth in the same period in 1887.

In British Columbia, there is a rage for the diggings. Sites supposed to be highly auriferous, as being in the lucky region, are fetching fabulous prices. One which lately cost 400 dollars is now 36,000 dollars.

MEANWHILE, a new gold field of extraordinary richness has been discovered in Guiana, South America. A French traveller, M. Condreau, after a careful inspection, has declared it equal to the famous Australian and Californian reefs. The site, which is situated between the Lava and Papanahoni rivers in Surinam, is likely to be a bone of contention between the Dutch and the French. The Dutch have long held Surinam, which is mentioned by the old voyagers, before the French visited that coast, but then, at this moment, France is suffering from a canine hunger for earth—one of the sequelæ of the drastic and antiphlogistic treatment to which she had to submit in 1870, and the effect specially of the amputation which Surgeon-General Bismarck performed on her, by which she was dismembered of Alsace and Lorraine. If she dare not think of recovering from Germany, she is any day strong enough to rob from Holland.

THE country has beat the city in the last Entrance Examination. The Prajabandhu attributes this to four causes, inimical to the education of the boys of Calcutta, namely, Baboo Surendra Nath Banerjee's political agitation, Sasadhar Tarkachuramani's Hindu revival, the Brahma Samaj, and the Bengali theatres. The Panchayet, coinciding generally, points out that theatres and the Brahma Samaj are not of recent growth. Nor, we may add, are they confined to the city, having spread to the country as well. Surendra is still a hero in the Mofussil, and Sasadhar commands there large audiences. But then, the country is only from time to time invaded by these locusts. The capital is under a permanent blight, from the evil presence. For one formal address to all classes in Oolooberia or Tarkessur, there are fifty lectures, formal and informal, public and private, confined to the unfortunate youth of Calcutta. The nation will some day awake to the deep injury—educational, moral, social, and political—which that one restless man, with the glib tongue and boundless energy, has inflicted on it. There is no doubt that these several propagandists have more or less completely spoiled a great many boys and distracted nearly all, diverting them from timely pursuits and burdening them with thoughts beyond their years. But there are special causes of the present examination results. These are probably to be found in the examinations themselves. The matter is so important that we invite the press to the discussion.

THE Boy of the Period has found his way to the quiet rural society of our Bengal hills. According to the Panchayet, Kumar Srinarain has sued his father Raja Ramnarain Singh of Khaira in the Bhagulpore District, for maintenance. He was educated at the Benares College. On his return home, he, having no occupation perhaps, naturally enough wanted a wife, and let the father know of it. The Raja was in no hurry. The returned Prodigal called for the thing instanter. The article was not to be had in the market, and it was a grave question of race and pedigree, of expense and organisation, pomp and ceremony. That exasperated the son and he left his father's protection and has commenced to molest him. Friends of the family attempted to bring on a reconciliation but failed. Such is progress!

BABOO NUNDOLAL BOSE is one of the luckiest men in the land. He was leading an obscure life in penury when he awoke one morning and found himself one of the biggest landlords in the country. His luck continued. He is now above law—municipal. The very efforts of the Corporation to injure him redounded to his advantage. The municipality inflicted a sumptuary tax on the new palace he built, improving and beautifying a neglected slum of the Black Town, and the result was that he has been relieved of the rate altogether. He is enjoying his vast premises as a sort of municipal freehold. He gets all the benefits of the municipality at the expense of the rest of the city. And now the nightsoil service too is to be done to his premises free. Only recently, the Town Council recommended a scale of night soil fees for unassessed houses which was confirmed at a special meeting of the Commissioners, and the Corporation, instead of proceeding by distress warrant, sued the Baboo for the fee for service done to his house. The case came on before Mr. Chatterjee in the Small Cause Court. He has dismissed the suit, for defect of certain formalities required by law. He made no order for costs. It is curious that with so many legal members on the Board, the legal formalities are not insisted on at meetings of the Commissioners.

It will be remembered that at the last assessment, in 1883, the assessment on Baboo Nundolal Bose's house was raised from Rs. 150 to Rs. 400. He appealed against the executive to their masters, but being dissatisfied with the decision of the Commissioners, he took the case up to the High Court, and the High Court quashed the proceedings as irregular and not according to law. The order of the High Court paralysed the Corporation. Since then, the Commissioners have not ventured to demand the rates from the Baboo. They were advised they had no power to reassess the premises till the next six yearly assessment, the previous assessment having ceased under the operation of law.

We admire Sir Henry Harrison for his respect for the law, but we are not sure that the law precludes the Commissioners from moving in the matter at all. The present Municipal Act IV of 1876 came into force on the 1st July 1876. At that day, the Bose brothers had not built their house. It was not till 1880, that any building was raised which, being a portion of the present residence, was assessed at Rs. 150 a month, and the house was only completed before the next revision of assessments in 1883. At that assessment, it was valued at Rs. 400, the proceedings whereof have been quashed by the High Court in appeal. The question now is, Can the house be valued again during the current period of assessment? The proceedings being quashed, both sides have been put in their former position, and the Corporation is free to proceed to valuation, if not prevented by any positive provision in the Act. The Act makes no distinct prohibition, although there is no express sanction. The house as it now stands is unassessed for the purposes of the Act, and the Commissioners can, under the Act, at any moment, fix a valuation.

A NATIVE gentleman has preferred a claim for damages through one of the Attorney Commissioners against the Calcutta Corporation for injury done to himself and his conveyance whilst driving on a road which gave way. The matter has been referred to the arbitration of three of the Commissioners, who, we understand, have recommended payment of Rs. 250 to the Baboo. The attorney's fees for attendance come up to about the same sum.

THE Assistant Government Agent of the Mannar District in Ceylon, is a benevolent officer who has the good of the people at heart. Mr. Boake sympathises with them under the oppression suffered by them from the tax imposed by his Government on their food grains. He has the courage of his convictions. He has written a monograph in which he takes Government sharply to task for its inhumanity. We wonder what the Governor thinks of this performance. It is impossible not to admire the self-sacrifice involved in such advocacy of the dumb peasantry. Would that this generosity were accompanied by sobriety of language! This is how he allows himself to speak of the objects of his philanthropic interest:—

"The Mannar man is somewhat retrograded from the civilization he had attained when our fathers were mere barbarians, and I am not sure that the Wanduras who have stuck to their tails have not done wisely. They have not to pay a tithe of their grain, nor to be worried about every transaction of their simple lives."

There is no accounting for tastes. Here is a man who abuses his own fathers in order to justify his contemptuous treatment of his own Eastern protégés!

AT the French Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, among other canine friends of man, were exhibited a country postman's dog which had assisted in rescuing a drowning child, and a brave Newfoundland which only in December last saved its mistress from murder by springing at the throat of a burglar who having entered the house was taking aim at her. Such dogs are more valuable servants than our lazy Durwans and bearers. Indeed, as a rule, dogs are more faithful than men. What a pity that our people have not yet learnt to utilise the honesty and honor of one of the noblest species of God's creatures.

A NATIVE magazine was some time been started in Bombay under the name of the Literary Album. We received the first issue, but no others, and so concluded that it had been dropped. But no! still it moves and has its being, if the columns of our contemporaries are to be believed. Thus the Daily Atheneum (Hyderabad) publishes under 'Extracts' a characteristic article purporting to be taken from the Literary Album. It is a characteristic effusion, and the character of the publication is labelled by its name. That is no misnomer. The Album is indeed a good deal below the designation. Album or Keepsake literature is sublime before the feebleness of this Bombay business in letter-press—rather than literature. The article to which we refer, the only one which we have seen reproduced in any paper, is evidence. It purports to be brief but full biographical sketch of the Earl of Dufferin. All the research and literary power of the establishment have apparently been lavished on the composition. The conductors no doubt desire to be judged by it. The result is by no means disappointing but it is sufficiently poor and puerile. Here is an instance of how matters are put—

"His [Lord Dufferin's] appointment to the Governor-Generalship of Canada opened a still wider field for the display of his high administrative faculties—facilities which only a few years ago averted a Russo-English complication on the frontier. On his return from Canada he was appointed....."

It is difficult to fix the chronology of the "few years ago" or the locality of the "frontier." Apparently, the proof of the high administrative faculties displayed in averting a Russo-English complication on the frontier opened to Lord Dufferin a wider field for their exercise by his appointment as Governor-General of Canada. But which complication was that and on which frontier? One can scarcely resist the suspicion creeping in that the writer refers to years long subsequent, in fact to Lord Dufferin's career as the Viceroy of India of the hour.

The following paragraph, though of a piece with the rest, is the least objectionable :—

"His Lordship has occasionally turned his mind to literary matters, and his Letter (sic. in Daily Atheneum) from High Latitudes written after a visit to Iceland and Spitzbergen, is a work well-known and appreciated. He is also a good shot and a keen sportsman. During his stay in India he has travelled about a good deal, and has gathered information from all sources relative to the state of the people and the condition of the country."

The writer attempts a more ambitious height in his criticism of the Viceroy's oratory :—

"Lord Dufferin is too well-known as a public speaker to need eulogy from our pen. He is known to be one of the best speakers in England, and as a descendant of the celebrated Richard Brinsley Sheridan it is but meet that His Lordship should have inherited his powerful eloquence."

And then finishes, not unexpectedly nor inappropriately, by a plunge into the pool of his own bathos, as follows :—

"In concluding the memoir of one whom future historians will mark down as one of the greatest rulers India ever had or will have, and under whose regime a vast area of new territory has been added to the Empire and many other beneficial reforms introduced, it would not be inappropriate for us to thank his Lordship publicly for his ardent zeal in the advancement of literature, and as a token of which His Lordship has been pleased to subscribe to a copy of our humble periodical,—

THE LITERARY ALBUM.

It is not difficult to imagine how Lord Dufferin will feel under this serious effusion of gratitude to him for his ardent zeal in the advancement of literature in subscribing for a copy of this wonderful magazine. Let it be his Lordship's consolation that he has saved his credit for taste by not going beyond the compliment of taking in a single copy. Men in his position—or their personal staffs—are not always so discriminate in their patronage, whether in letters or in generals.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Bilious affections, with all their concomitant annoyances induced by atmospheric changes, or too liberal diet, should be checked at once, or serious consequences may ensue. When any one finds his ideas less clear than usual, his eyesight dimmed, and his head dizzy, accompanied by a disinclination for all exertion, physical or mental, he may be quite sure that he is in immediate need of some alterative medicine. Let him at once send for a box of Holloway's Pills, a mild course of which will remove the symptoms, and speedily renew his usual healthful feeling. If the bowels be irritable, Holloway's Ointment should be diligently rubbed over the stomach and liver every night and morning.

MORE than thirty years ago, a European foreigner announced his intention of flying from the top of the Ochterlony column to Government House. He was a professional on tour throughout the globe and claimed to have accomplished such aerial flights in other lands. His language though vague suggested the idea of aerial locomotion by means of mechanical wings, but it was understood, or supposed, that he depended for success on, and would descend by, a powerful specially constructed parachute. But his profession proved to be that of "doing" the good people of the Dutch literally "in the eye." They collected in force on the scene, but he prudently kept away, preserving his neck and making money into the bargain. Since then, no venturesome wight has appeared in India even to make an empty boast of such a deed. Yet the theory of the feat is not difficult and suggests itself easily to minds of the slightest speculative turn. The idea indeed of descending from a height by means of an umbrella—to call a spade a spade—is an old one and it has been put to the test on a greater or less scale, with more or less success, by amateurs as well as professionals, in Europe and America. With the progress of the science and art of ballooning, it became a matter of course. At first, in the one as in the other, there were failures and accidents, but gradually the mechanism was perfected and the performers acquired skill and presence of mind and showed satisfactory results. In ballooning pure and simple, France has made the greatest and most steady organised exertions and maintains the precedence. But in the parachute part of the business, America has for sometime greatly distinguished herself and secured the palm. An American of the name of Baldwin is famous for proficiency in the line. He makes light of coming down from the tops of high steeples and the peaks of almost perpendicular hills with his stout umbrella. He has more than once gone up in a balloon to 5,000 feet above ground and then alighted easily with his parachute. His fame has now been eclipsed by another compatriot, Edward D. Honan, who has performed the same feat in the state of Michigan from the height of 10,000 feet. It was an astonishing feat, trying to the nerves of beholders.

IN consequence of the perfunctory way in which the High Court has lately decided the Jain case in the goods of Dhensook Das Seth, there is naturally considerable anxiety in Jain circles not only at the capital but at other centres of this commercial people. There have been several cases of late in the Courts here and elsewhere, and some are pending. About a year ago, in Moorsheedabad Hoolas Chand of Azimgunge's case was decided in the District according to the Jain Law and against the dicta of the Mitakshara. One Gopal Chand Sacla in Calcutta has, under the advice of Mitakshara practising lawyers, sued his father who has disowned him for a moiety of the estate of his grandfather. The father of course stands on his rights under the Jain Law. The great case of the Jagat Sett family of Moorsheedabad has just closed in the District Court, the Sub-Judge having taken time to deliver judgment. The Moorsheedabad Correspondents of the papers testify to the deep interest with which the decision is awaited.

THE following learned speculation, in an educational magazine, must be beyond common flesh and blood and sense :—

"Who would suppose that any tie existed between the name of the Isle of Wight and that of the kingdom or province of Oude? The two places have half the world between them; the two words have not a letter in common; yet they are linked together in a very singular way. The derivation unfolds a remarkable instance of the wanderings of races, and shows the distant affinity existing between the English and the people of the Indian peninsula, whom the former have subjected by their northern energy and strength. The word Oude appears to be derived from the Sanscrit a-yudhya, 'not to be warred against' (a, not; yudh, fight). The word Goth, by which we designate one of the most important members of the great Teutonic family, probably comes from the Saxon guth (pronounced yudh) signifying 'war battle, fight'; and this seems to have had its origin in the Sanscrit yudh, expressing, as we have just shown, the same idea. A kindred race to the Goths were the Jutes, otherwise called the Gytas, Ytas, Wights, Guights, &c.—words which seem to imply 'ravenous warriors.' The Jutes settled in the delicate little island which now forms part of the country of Hants, and from them it derived its name. It was at first called Ytaland or Gytaland; afterwards Wiht-land; and subsequently Wight, or the Isle of Wight. In the laws of Edward the Confessor the men of the Isle of Wight are called Guti, i. e., Jutes or Goths. We have also the intermediate forms Geat, Gwit, Wiht, and Wight. According to Dr. Taylor, Jute is analogous with the syllable Joud, occurring in the name Joudpore, in India, and with the word Oude. Goth appears also to be from the same root as the sacred name, God; and it is not improbable that the primitive idea of God among the Goths was that of a warrior. The asserted affinity between the words Goth and Oude is supported by the fact that the Teutonic race originally migrated from the northern parts of India."

The next etymological flight defies reason and Grimm:—

"A similar relationship between an English and an Indian word has been asserted in connection with the name Himalaya, applied to the great range of mountains in the north of Hindoostan. The name is simply described as signifying 'the abode of snow;' but it seems to have been identified with the English word 'heaven.' Thus: Sanscrit (the ancient language of India and according to some authorities, the noblest and most perfect tongue in the world) himala; Mæso-Gothic, himins; Alemannic, himil; German, Swedish, and Danish, himmel; Old Norse himin; Dutch, hemel; Anglo-Saxon, heofon; English, heaven."
—Student's Friend.

If himalaya and himin, and himil and heofon are the same word, we begin to have an idea that they are all connected with Yang-tse-kiang. But we are a tyro in the science of language. A greater Pandit might prove to satisfaction—of the professors of philology, mythology, and folk-lore—each in the Comparative degree—that the words in question are all derived from Nebuchadnezzar! Who, after that, can wonder at the contempt of positive science for such Diversions more contemptible than those of Purley?

JUST as we are going to press, we hear that Government has called for an explanation of the Registrar of Calcutta of his connection with the Jain case.

IN a previous issue, we had but time to indicate some of the practical difficulties which surround the question of a national system of technical education for this country. To be something more than the make-believe we have—a few scattered industrial schools here and there—it must be organised upon a wide basis, and incorporated with the University system. The Government of India has accepted this view. In the Note to which reference has been made, it is said:—

"If, therefore, our Industrial Schools are to lead to any practical good, they must be an integral part of the Provincial educational system. The District Industrial School must be a department of the District High School; all the prestige which attaches to the High School must attach to it, and so on with all other Industrial Schools in their various degrees. Further more, these Industrial Schools must be linked to a Central Institution, which should be the highest embodiment of Instruction in the particular art or industry with which the School is concerned. This Central Institution, be it the Presidency School of Art or the Engineering College, must not only direct and control the teachings of the Schools scattered throughout the province, but inspire them with new ideas and furnish them with new designs."

This view is based upon a recommendation of Mr. Tawney, then Officiating Director of Public Instruction in Bengal, in whose opinion, the failure of past efforts in the direction of technical education is due to the subordinate and isolated position given to it. Mr. Tawney's opinion on the subject is worthy of special attention. "The institutions," he says,

"were isolated and out of connexion with the general system of education in Bengal. They had no prestige of any kind attaching to them, and were therefore unable to make way against the general current of native prejudice. They were insufficiently supplied with funds, and no bright prospects were opened, even to the most successful of their pupils, resembling those lying before the more distinguished pupils of the School of Naval Architecture and the Economic School of Mines. If they had been furnished with Schools leading up to them, in which the head and eye were trained to do their work efficiently, and if they had been in any way connected with the system of education centralised in Calcutta, their fortunes might have been different. There can be no doubt that the horizon of Young India is widening; that a great many of the more energetic of our native youths are beginning to be dissatisfied with a purely literary education and an official career under Government, and are eager to take part in undertakings which shall advance the economic welfare of their native land. They naturally look to the Government to give a definite aim to their aspirations, and to furnish the machinery necessary for their realization."

In these few words is set forth the whole gist of the question. Mr. Tawney appears to be the first Indian official to take a liberal view of what has to be done in regard to the effective promotion of technical education. In the first place, it must be incorporated with the system of general education, and possess the same prestige, and open the same prospects of respectable careers in life. Towards this end, there must be technical schools of various grades, having their basis in the primary school, and ending with the University College. Just as for the purposes of literary instruction, there are institutions of various degrees providing instruction from the most rudimentary to the highest stage of culture, technical education must cover an equally wide field. The provision of funds must, at any rate in the beginning, be on a thoroughly liberal scale. The Government has in this but to take a leaf out of the example set by Western nations. Let us for a moment see how in Europe and the United States they order things in this respect. A few examples will suffice for our purpose. In Switzerland, primary education is compulsory, and, as the pupils advance in age, their education becomes more and more practical. There are, first, the primary schools, from which they are removed to what are called "Improvement Schools," where they learn the practical application of the knowledge acquired in the primary schools, and then follow the Cantonal High Schools, which are divided into trade and classical Schools. Above these, there are five Universities, and the Zurich Technical Institute, which last is liberally supported by the Federal Government as well as the Canton. The Institute has a large staff of professors and teachers, and so numerous is its attendance of students that, notwithstanding the magnificent accommodation which it already possessed, a sum of £50,000 has recently been spent upon additional chemical laboratories. In France, every manufacturing town has its technical school. The Institute Industriel at Lisle and the Ecole Centrale of Lyons are examples of these, and it will be a sufficient indication of the liberality with which the Government supports these institutions to say that, with the view of attracting the best talent in the country to these colleges, 500 scholarships have been founded for these two institutions only, at an annual cost of £30,000. In Germany, the arrangements are made with a more unsparing hand, of which no more convincing proof could be given than the fact that the New University of Strasbourg alone costs £30,000 for its physical laboratory, and £35,000 for its chemical department. The twenty-four Universities in the German Empire, are all furnished with science departments and direct a complete system of technical schools subordinate to them. Nearly every large town in Germany has its "Real Schule," where the children perfect their elementary education so as to be qualified to enter commercial or industrial life. In the United States of America, each State is required to provide at least one Technical College and to defray its expenses by the grant of public lands. Under this system, the State of New York has received nearly a million acres of land. Private liberality has in all these countries supported the hands of the Governments, but in every case it was the State which first laid the foundations.

That we did not exaggerate the financial difficulty of the problem in its application to this country, will now be obvious. The Government of India, however, is so crippled for want of funds that it can hardly be in a position to advance the cause of technical education in the only way in which it can be advanced, namely, by munificent endowment. A liberal expenditure of money is the more necessary in this country, as the whole work here will be one of initiation. Centres of manufacturing industry furnish the best places for affording practical instruction. Such places in India are owned by foreigners, and how far these, with their jealousy of natives encroaching upon their occupation, will lend themselves to the undertaking, has to be seen. Then, there is almost a complete dearth of men to teach the practical applications of science, and as to professors of the higher sciences, the difficulty is still more formidable and to be overcome only at prohibitive cost.

Fortunately, the original obstacle to the successful establishment of a system of technical education, arising from the caste prejudices of the people, is almost gone. "Although among the higher caste natives of India the obligations of caste still give a quasi-religious sanction to the distinction between the employments deemed menial, and those deemed honorable, there are, nevertheless, indications that this sanction is losing something of its force, and that natives of all castes are in increasing numbers looking to technical Education as affording an honorable livelihood and career in life." In this official view of the popular feeling on the subject, we agree, but, at the same time, the prospects of employment to those who put themselves under a course of practical instruction, must be sufficiently tempting, in order to induce them in large numbers to seek it. This part of the question has difficulties of its own of almost an insuperable kind, and no one who knows how all the industries in this country dependent upon some knowledge of scientific principles are now entirely in the hands of Europeans, will be sanguine of success in remedying these difficulties. To provide suitable careers to the ex-students of our technical schools, something will have to be taken away which is now exclusively enjoyed by Europeans in this country, and in this is involved a collision of interests analogous to what obtains in the administration of the Public Service. Apart, therefore, from the inherent elements of difficulty in the general question of making adequate provision for practical education, there are additional difficulties in this country arising from its political condition, that is, chiefly from the prevailing conflict of interests among its various races and nationalities, and, above all, the permanent economical struggle for existence between native and European.

THE CALCUTTA COLLECTORATE.

UNDER the head of "Bengal," the Advocate of India records the protest of a European contemporary of this city against the appointment of Baboo Doorga-gutty Banerjee to the office of Collector of Calcutta. Says the Advocate:—

"Our contemporary thinks this will give rise to a strong feeling of dissatisfaction, as it has always been understood that the office is essentially a European one, and 'almost requires the guarantee of a European name!' Why?"

Why, indeed! Is it because of the ill-odour attaching to European names as contrasted with the pure perfume of native ones? The less said about European pretensions the better for Europeans themselves. By this time, with the scandals confronting us, the days of tall talk should have ended—for the time at any rate. Just now European officering seems to secure neither efficiency nor integrity in administration. The Calcutta Collectorate was the worst possible department that could be selected for asserting the inherent virtues of a Christian skin. There the guarantee may be the other way. It is remarkable that the European officers in it have always been good for nothing, without possessing the negative virtue of being above suspicion. On the other hand, the native Collectors have always discharged their office with marked ability and integrity. The pretence that the appointment is one specially reserved for Europeans, is ridiculous in the extreme. No such subordinate employment can be so reserved. If anything, it is reserved for natives, falling as it does within the category of those, which, under the Secretary of State's ruling, are to be set apart for the people of this country. If any class has a preferential claim to it, it is the native servants of Government. In point of fact, it was in our time first and longest held—for a long series of years, and with thorough usefulness and honour—by the late Babu Koylash Chunder Dutt, the accomplished father of the accomplished Collector to the Corporation (Mr. O. C. Dutt.) He was succeeded by a European, an amiable superannuated old man, whose administration was a scandal. After his and his native Assistant's retirement, came the present régime, which has continued the intermediate traditions. For six months, however, Baboo Rajendra Nath Mitter acted in the office, with his accustomed devotion to the state and satisfaction to the public and without a stain on his fair fame. There is, therefore, no real break of continuity in the appointment of a native again. Sir Steuart Bayley has simply given the natives what was their own. Mr. Goodricke's appointment was a mere accident and a scandal. He had no claim to it—he was not even fit for it. Neither Nature nor education meant him for the Collectorate of a great capital. How he got there was a wonder to all the world except those who knew. The advocates of the European cause are not doing it good by challenging scrutiny and reviving buried memories. The origin of that appointment is not of a kind to redound to the honor of the great Covenanted Civil Service which is responsible for the government of this Empire. Such a shameful and unblushing abuse of patronage can form no precedent. The Lieutenant-Governor deserves the thanks of the country for breaking the fictitious spell.

And commendation too for the particular appointment he has now made. His exercise of patronage is judicious. He has chosen just the man for it. He knew the merits of his man, who had served the crown loyally and with conspicuous ability under his eye, for many years, as his own official Personal Assistant, while he himself was Commissioner of an important Province of this administration. Yet this very knowledge and this personal relation so well-known to the world, might have been in the way of Sir Steuart Bayley's doing the doubly proper thing—advancing the efficiency of his administration by employing at the head of a demoralised department the only man within his knowledge who could sweep the Augean stable and rewarding well-merited merit. But he has proved himself a strong man by not succumbing under a maudlin delicacy, nor allowing himself to be terrified out of his clear perception of duty by the bugbear of a possible clamour. He must have been gratified in observing that, with the exception of one influential journal in the European interest, all the organs of opinion, European and native, have supported his choice. Even the objecting journal, in its pure and undisturbed first thought, fully recognised the individual fitness of the nominee. Indeed, an appointment which is warmly approved by both the Mirror and Reis and Rayyet, carries the presumption of popular consensus in its favor

A feeble attempt is being made to stir up jealousy among the native members of the Executive Service to which the Baboo in question belongs. But we hope they are no woodcocks to be caught by such "springes." The charge of supersession is irrelevant. The rule of seniores priores is by no means absolute. It is daily broken through in the higher interest of state efficiency. Some of the officers said to have been passed over, do not care for the worry of the Calcutta Inland Revenue; one wants health, another inclination. Others have been too long mere criminal magistrates. As for qualifications, one may be more learned and another the more accomplished penman, but not one has such a record of executive success in his favour as the Collector elect. Be that as it may, certainly none is so favorably known to the head of the Government. And that is conclusive of the question. "The Lieutenant-Governor, as a human ruler, can only act according to his lights—his own knowledge of men and instinct for character.

We regret we cannot speak so favourably of the other arrangements simultaneously made in the same department. Mr. Kilby cannot possibly do justice to the Income Tax. He was already Superintendent of the Customs Preventive Service, and he has been charged in addition with the collection of this difficult Tax. He simply cannot afford the time for the two duties. This sort of vicarious performance of functions leads to loss to the State and harrassment of the public. Surely, the Income Tax can pay for its realization. The collections of a great city cannot be made properly except by a special machinery.

MR. GOODRICKE moved heaven and earth to have his furlough sanctioned, compromising, in the attempt to set up a case of serious illness, the honor of the Faculty. But now he seems in no hurry to make over charge. To repeated enquiries of the Divisional Commissioner, he has not fixed his last day in the Collectorate. Poor man, he may well hesitate to leave the office with all its imperfections on its head. His accommodating Assistants may still need his presence.

AKBAR.

Taking the whole period of Akbar's life, as regards what his own religion was, we conclude that he was a pure deist. He appears to have been naturally devout, with a tinge of superstition pervading his character, despite all his avowed scepticism, and public declaration that only that religion was to be individually sanctioned which had the approval of reason. His fundamental doctrine was that there were no prophets. His appeal therefore, on all occasions, was addressed to human reason: he based his right to interfere at all with religion, on the ground of a Civil Magistrate.

When Akbar lost his faith in Mahomet and the Koran, he made a confession of the new faith he had acquired, and which put concisely was, "that there is no God but God, and that Akbar was his Caliph." One would have thought, judging from historical precedents, that the emperor would have had a host of disciples, who in a courtier spirit would have followed the lead of so august a personage. But in fact, it was just the reverse; for he made but few converts, except among his courtiers and some learned men. The reason for such failure is said to be his relying solely on the power of persuasion in propagating his opinion. This, however, is not a satisfactory statement, because the powers of persuasion, when an absolute monarch is the person who stoops to use it, are very great, wellnigh irresistible. The truth is Akbar was not fitted for the position of a religious leader. To be a religious leader, needs a man of versatile gifts, one who can persuade as well as one who can command, a man who is golden-tongued but withal as firm as adamant in purpose and resolution. Akbar was too philosophical.

We have, however, instances of Akbar interfering in religious matters, but not to serve his own doctrines. The matters religious which he meddled with, enforcing his decisions with a firm hand, will doubtless be considered by most persons as a justifiable procedure, as occasions when the interference of secular authority was right and judicious; and it is remarkable that such interference created no disturbances, nor did it lose him the good will of the Hindus. When similar questions are discussed to-day, and restriction or removal of certain social customs, through legislation, is only hinted at, what a turmoil it seems to create among the Hindus, and yet it goes without question that these men of to-day are certainly much more enlightened than the Hindus of Akbar's day. Why is this so? It would puzzle Mephistopheles to answer, I am sure. Akbar forbade trials by ordeal, marriage before the age of puberty, while he permitted Hindu widows to marry a second time; he most positively prohibited "Suttee" except with the free will of the widows; and his precautions were effectual to ascertain that the women were uninfluenced. It is given as an illustration, that the Rajah of Jodhpore was about to force his son's widow to ascend the pile, and that the knowledge of this fact was conveyed to the emperor, who instantly mounted his horse and rode post to the spot, his presence taking the Rajah by surprise and preventing the intended sacrifice.

Akbar's revenue system has been justly extolled for the benefits it conferred on the country. The system may be classified under three heads. 1. He obtained a correct measurement of the land. 2. He ascertained the amount of the produce of each biggah of land, and fixed the proportion each ought to pay to Government. 3. He settled an equivalent in money for this portion.

For the first purpose, a uniform standard was established, the instruments of mensuration improved, and a complete survey made of the arable lands in the whole empire. For the second, the land was divided into three classes according to its fertility; the amount of each sort of produce that a biggah of each class would yield was accurately ascertained; the average of the three was assumed as the produce of that biggah, one third of which formed the Government demand—such was the assessment. This was the maximum, and every cultivator had a right of appeal if he thought it too high, and could insist on a readjustment of the division of the crop, by actual measurement. As lands of equal fertility might be differently circumstanced in other respects, there was a modifying clause added to the above. Land which never required a fallow, paid the full one-third every harvest. Land which had to be left fallow only paid when cultivated. Land which had suffered from inundation, or had been three years out of cultivation, and needed an expenditure of money and time to reclaim it, paid only two-fifths the first year, which proportion was increased every year till the fifth year, when it paid the full demand. Land that had been out of cultivation for a longer period than five years, enjoyed still more favourable terms. For the third purpose, statement of prices current of the products of the soil, for nineteen years previous to the settlement, was obtained from every town and village, the average of the prices was fixed as what the cultivator had to pay in money, in lieu of grain, as the Government's portion. Every husbandman was allowed to pay in kind, if he thought the money rate was fixed too high. At first, these settlements were made annually, but this plan being found unworkable, they were fixed for ten years. These measurements and classifications of land were all carefully recorded; the distribution of land, and increase or diminution of revenue, were all yearly entered in the village registers.

XXIII.

Akbar's instructions to his revenue officers, shows his anxiety for the liberal administration of his system, and for the ease and comfort of his subjects. There was no farming, of any branch of the revenue, in his system. His collectors were enjoined, in their agreements and other matters relating to their duty, to deal directly with the people, and not to depend implicitly on the headman or accountant of the village. Where Akbar could have obtained the information, which gave him such correct views of the chicanery of these functionaries, seems surprising, so well does he put his hand on the sore of nearly all Eastern agricultural systems.

Akbar divided his empire into fifteen provinces or Subahs—Allahabad, Agra, Oudh, Ajmir, Guzerat, Behar, Bengal, Delhi, Cabul, Lahore, Multan, Malwa, Berar, Khandeish, Ahmednagar. The chief officer in each Subah, was the viceroy (Sipáh Sála.), who held both civil and military control, subject only to the emperor. Under him was a revenue officer, called later a devan, who was appointed by the emperor. Then there were the military commanders of districts, or fanjdars, whose authority extended over the local soldiery or militia, and over all military establishments and lands assigned for military purposes, as well as over the regular troops within their jurisdiction; and whose duty it likewise was to quell all disorders arising within the same limits. Each Subah was divided into a certain number of Sircars, and each Sircar into Purgunnahs or Mehals. An aggregation of Purgunnahs was called a duster, or district.

Justice was administered by a court, the presiding officer of which was a Mir-i-adl, or lord of justice, assisted by a Casi. The Casi conducted the trial and stated the law, the other passed judgment. In large towns, the police was under a Kotwal; in small towns, the collector or revenue officer had charge of it; crime was kept in check in villages, by their own internal arrangements.

The reforms in civil administration were laboriously effected, but they were peacefully introduced when compared to the long and arduous struggle that Akbar had with his army, before he could get that body to submit to the needed reforms. It had been the custom to grant lands also assignments on the revenue, in payment of military service, and the holders of these orders were left to realise them without any check; while the musters of the troops were irregular and deceptive, servants and camp followers used to be mounted for the day on borrowed horses. Akbar by paying his soldiers in cash from the treasury, stopped the first of these abuses; the other was rendered impossible by having compulsory musters before pay, and by a descriptive roll of each man in the imperial service, and by branding every horse with the Government mark. All commissariat supplies, necessary for the movements of the troops, such as camels, oxen, carts and so forth, were all mustered and paid for at fixed rates. The commanders in the army were divided into classes, from commanders of 10,000 to commanders of 10. None but the King's sons held a rank above the command of 5,000. Those enumerated as commanders of 5,000 comprised only thirty persons, including princes of the blood, and the Rajput Rajahs.

The organization of the troops was in this wise—each Mansabdar or commander was obliged to keep half as many footmen as horsemen, and a fourth of the foot soldiers were required to be matchlock men, the rest might be archers. Besides these troops, there was a large body of horsemen, who were ranked on a different scale, as they were considered superior troops. These troops took services individually, and their pay was much higher than that of the ordinary horsemen, and ranged from Rs. 20 to Rs. 25 per month. It is supposed that Akbar could command the services of 200,000 effective cavalry, a fourth of which body were really dashing and gallant soldiers, as they were more a sort of gentleman soldiers than ordinary troopers. The militia of the provinces, which could be called out for active service on an emergency, numbered, it is stated, 4,400,000 men.

Besides the fort at Attock, many other military works were erected during this period. Agra and Allahabad were encircled with walls and citadels, comprising lofty turrets and towers of out stone, ornamented with turrets, domes and battlements, the whole encircled with deep ditches. The gateways need to be mentioned, as they were stately edifices, befitting the entrance to a royal palace.

Fatehpore Sikri was Akbar's favourite residence, and was built and fortified by him. Bishop Heber has described it in suitable terms—its commanding situation on a hill, the noble flight of steps by which one ascends to the portal tower, the extremely rich carving which ornaments the palace, its great extent; all these are treated most fully. But the Bishop is most graphic in his description of the majestic proportions and beautiful architecture of the quadrangle and cloisters, and of the no less beautiful mosque which formed a part of it. Bishop Heber has also written about Agra as it must have been in pre-British times, through a description of what it was in his own day. Some of the buildings at Agra are thus described by the good Bishop. "A beautiful mosque of white marble, carved with exquisite simplicity and elegance; and the palace, built mostly of the same material, and containing some noble rooms. The great hall is a splendid edifice, supported by pillars and arches of white marble, more nobly simple than that of Delhi. The ornament, carving and mosaic of the smaller apartments are equal or superior to anything which is described as found in the Alhambra." The tomb of Humayun at Delhi should be mentioned, because it shows filial affection and because it may be reckoned among the principal of Akbar's architectural works. It is raised above the surrounding country, on a terrace, and is a great and solid edifice, surmounted by a vast dome of white marble.

The last days of this great and good man and king, still show the usual bent of his mind. There was no warping or clouding of those generous faculties of soul which were so prominently manifested through his whole life; though he appears to have been ailing for some time previous to the attack which proved fatal. It has been said, and probably with much truth, that this illness was owing to the strength of his attachments, and he was so unfortunate as to lose by death, one after another, several much loved and valued friends, and lastly his son Danyal, for whom his sorrow was deep and bitter, for his death was a very sad one. Danyal was cut off in the prime of manhood through his gross love of wine. Some time previous to his death, Prince Danyal became dangerously ill, from excess, and on his recovery was made to pledge his word to his father, to give up the use of wine. To enable him to keep his promise, Akbar wisely and tenderly took care to surround him with faithful friends, when he happened to be at a distance from him. The unfortunate young man being unable openly to gratify his propensity, which had become irresistible, had recourse to stratagem, and had liquor secretly conveyed to him in the barrel of a fowling-piece, and soon drunk himself to death.

The last ten days previous to his death, Akbar was unable to take any part in business, being confined to his bed. During this period he held farewell interviews with his principal nobles and took leave affectionately of the members of his family. His son Selim thus describes the closing scene of this eventful life. He says that Akbar desired him to bring all his Omrahs into the chamber where he was lying, "For," said he, "I cannot bear that any misunderstanding should subsist between you and those who have for so many years shared in my toils and been the companions of my glory." When the nobles were assembled, the dying monarch collected his remaining strength, and suitably addressed his faithful friends; then after wistfully regarding them all round, he asked each one to forgive him any offence of which he might have been guilty towards them. His son Selim was deeply affected and conscience stricken; he threw himself at his father's feet and burst into a passion of tears. Akbar seemed much moved and endeavoured to speak, but he was completely exhausted; he then raised his hand and pointed to his favourite scimitar, and by signs conveyed his desire to his son to bind it on in his presence. Akbar recovered from his exhaustion, and was able to have another interview with his son, during which he conjured him to look to the comfort of the ladies of his family, and not to forget or forsake his father's old friends or dependents. He then received the visit of one of the Chief Mullahs, and in his presence repeated his Moslem confession of faith, and died in all the forms of a good Mussulman.

Akbar was buried near Agra. His tomb is thus described by Bishop Heber: "The central building is a sort of solid pyramid, surrounded externally with cloisters, galleries and domes, diminishing gradually on ascending it, till it ends in a square platform of white marble, surrounded by the most elaborate lattice work of the same material, in the centre of which is a small altar tomb, also of white marble, carved with a delicacy and beauty which do full justice to the material, and to the graceful forms of the Arabic characters which form its chief ornament."

MONGHYR.

Jamalpoore, July 10.

The cry of water in this part of the Province is now over. We have had incessant rains for the last three or four days and the weather is cool enough for the people to enjoy at ease. This heavy downpour has also done material good for sowing of the local crops --- Bhoota or Muccai --- the staple good of the Beharees.

The roads in the native quarter of the town, especially in Naya-goan, are sadly in want of repairs. In fact they become impassable during the rains. Mr. Editor you can well imagine the inconvenience the people are subjected to, especially in dark nights. What is the Municipality about? May not the rate payers expect an inch of Kunkur or brick dust for the roads in question?

I hear that the Sub-Judge of Monghyr is not pulling well with the Pleaders of the Monghyr bar. Ipsa facto, it looks very bad for both sides, being people of the same country. Complaints of this kind are not uncommon as will be seen on a reference to newspapers, and the sooner this state of things is put right the better.

The heavy showers of rain have driven out the venomous reptiles from their holes, and they take refuge in our dwelling houses and glide about the compounds to the great danger of folks going about without lights. Some cases of snake bites have come to my notice.

There has been a rise in the price of food grains here, especially the staple food rice.

The climate of the place is now pretty fair.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,---The question that strikes most is whether Dr. P. K. Ray is fit for the Presidency College. The College wants a full man. But the Dr. has no hind-toes, and therefore not a full man, and is not fit for his present post. Last year a single stroke of the pen set him a-reeling with such convulsions that he could hardly stand on his fore-legs. Some one threw at him a shaft of dishonesty in the dark; and his agitations were violent although it did not strike him. We fear something might be found out from this, if we are to believe in the story about the learned Kalidass of stolen ring notoriety detected by his agitations on seeing Bararuchi, while anointing his forehead with earth after bathing. The facts speak for themselves, and the wise reader is to apply the rules of probability for himself, taking care to notice that the members of the Brahma Somaj, whether they have cut-tail or cock's-head, are hedged by Divinity, and your sharp logical shafts are but blunt against them. Brahma dishonest! suspicious, reasonless. But be that as it may, Dr. Ray could hardly control himself, and at last has revenged himself by plucking 48 P. C. of the candidates for the last B. A. in Philology. A secret whisper of his in the long ears of the examiners has produced this unprecedented havoc in the A. course. But this is not all; his infernal rage is not to be so easily appeased; he has succeeded in procuring the best set of examiners in philosophy for the next year, himself becoming a checking examiner (so much the better for merciless slaughter). He has meek outside but sulphurous fire within, we hope he would change it for Heavenly Fire. In addition to his own work, he has to keep the seal of the University; and his time is so short, that he cannot perform either of his work with neatness. It is better his pupils were not his; for he has hardly time enough to take sufficient care for them; and no time to dictate useful notes to assist their memory and understanding. He has assumed that his pupils are wise enough and need no help (in the form of notes) from their professor, wiser even than the students of other Colleges who need copious notes. But why is he not wise enough to think that if they really were such they would not attend his lectures? Any other man would be better for the place. The better the sooner he is removed. Yours &c.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

tation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoam" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee purih, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "He serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY
(Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

APRIL.

LOVE and Youth, the gods of verse,
Pour dew and flowers on Winter's hearse,
At the sun's kiss, Nature's eyes
Open with a glad surprise !

And the heart of life thus stirred,
Throbs again in flower and bird,
Glow upon the young man's face,
Fills the maiden's form with grace.

Wood and meadow, sky and sea,
Catch the impulse, feel the glee ;
And the lark upon its wing
Bears the music of the Spring !

Though in London streets to-day,
Yet with restless joy I stray
Where the primrose, tender-eyed,
Smiles upon the copse's side ;

Where the river, mountain-fed,
Rushes through its rocky bed ;
Where the stream, by willows bound,
Murmurs with a silvery sound.

April's breath upon my face,
Many a woodland path I trace ;
Many a heath'ry track explore,
Pass by many a cottage door,

Watch the swallow darting by,
Hear the far-off cuckoo's cry—
Till my heart with them takes flight,
Filled with measureless delight !

Straight the happy dream has fled,
Houses tower overhead,
Newsboys shout, and cabmen ply,
London smoke obscures the sky.

Yet with sunshine in the heart,
From the eager crowd I part,
And a sense of sweet content
With the vision's loss is blent.

Richer far am I than they Whom I pass upon the way ;
Richer far,—for I have been
In the fields where poets glean !

And although my song be weak,
Yet of Nature I can speak,
And a lover's tribute bring
To the treasures of the Spring !

JOHN DENNIS.

SONNETS.

DRY.

COME, April, come with gift of smile and tears,
Not with thine eyes unable thus to weep,—
Hast thou no store of sorrow from the deep
To loose and laugh through, as in former years ?
Come, let Lodore make music for our ears,
And rouse Helvellyn from his winter sleep,
Hang rainbow glories from the sunny steep,
And shroud at night with dew the glittering spheres.

For now the mountain faces, faint and pale
For lack of thy revivifying hand,
Swoon on beyond their time, expressionless.
And now the flocks are milkless in the dale,
The cuckoo calls not, and the larches stand
Without a heart to don their jewelled dress.

WET.

CAME April, and beneath her feet the cloud.
Broke into song upon our silent hills ;
Primroses wakened, thirsty daffodils
Tossed up their golden cups, a merry crowd :
Then visibly beneath his cold grey shroud
Helvellyn moved to hear the cuckoo-thrills
Make echo down the valley ; danced the rills,
The Greta sounded glad, Lodore was loud.

For joy the lambs leapt whitely thro' the grass,
With jewels of the sloe the hedge was pearled ;
And golden shone the coltsfoot in the lane ;
No foot, no heart, but did the merrier pass,
For April's tears had wrought another world
Wherein was life and laughter after pain.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—As winter advances and the weather becomes more and more inclement and trying the earliest evidences of ill-health must be immediately checked and removed, or a slight illness may result in a serious malady. Relaxed and sore throat, quinsey, influenza, chronic cough, bronchitis, and most other pulmonary affections will be relieved by rubbing this cooling Ointment into the skin as nearly as practicable to the seat of mischief. This treatment, simple yet effective, is admirably adapted for the removal of these diseases during infancy and youth. Old asthmatic invalids will derive marvellous relief from the use of Holloway's remedies, which have wonderfully relieved many such sufferers, and re-established health after every other means had signally failed.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

WE have never palliated the excesses of our own countrymen. But it is simply fair that Englishmen who are indignant with the violence of the Native Press, should know the provocations of our people, on every occasion and no occasion. Does the reader want to know what is a provocation on no occasion? Here is one. This is how the Lieutenant-Governor's return to town is announced in the ultra-Britisher press of Bengal:—

"Return. Sir Steuart Bayley, Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, accompanied by Capt. Rawlinson, Private Secretary, returned to Calcutta from Darjeeling last Saturday. Sir Steuart's short stay in the Hills may be taken as a hint by future occupiers of Belvedere. In all he does, he is conscientious, upright, and manly, with rather too strong a leaning towards Bengalees, who, as the slaves of a people we have conquered, have no sort of claim, upon being restored to freedom, to oust Europeans, or Eurasians, from the sympathy of Government; while their rights—as they call their privileges—exist merely in their pampered fancies. They never possessed any but those of slaves."

There! That is prose run mad to be sure. That is the way to convey ordinary news and to point a compliment. Seriously, it speaks not a little for the meek law-abiding of the people that this Malay of journalism is permitted to insult them. In almost any other country, the man would have found his occupation gone—suppressed. In this very country, in the last century, the "slaves" would have made short work of such foreigners. The writer is too ignorant, or he would have known the shoe-beating which sent Job Charnock crying to the swamps of the Salt Water Lake.

MR. RHYS DAVIDS, Head Assistant to the Chief Commissioner of Stamps, N. W. P., shot himself dead on the 7th at his residence in Allahabad. It was one of the common cases of sordid suicide. He was in pecuniary difficulties, we are told, and unable to meet his obligations. He is to be pitied, if it was only that—pitied specially that he could not stand it, for the services of his poor wife and children and the world at large. But it is possible that the case is not so simple. Mr. Davids may have had a more peremptory incentive to "bolt" out of earth by the backdoor than the fear of a summons at the instance of Peerumal or Brown or Jones in any Court, Small or great. The Chief Commissioner of Stamps had better look into his office. The local Government might too with advantage keep its eyes and ears open. Mr. Davids was a gentleman of respectable connections. He was the brother of the eminent Pali scholar, late of the Ceylon Civil Service, now a Professor in England.

DR. LIDDERDALE, the Sanitary Commissioner of Bengal, has recorded the following opinion against the Serampore Municipality:—

"The Commissioners' works are quite insignificant, and not at all commensurate with the wants of the town. The insanitary conditions noticed on the last occasion still exist, to the detriment of the health of the whole community. In fact, this town is one in which Municipal government may be said to effect little or no good. The Chairman is a non-resident gentleman who only apparently attends meetings, so that the head of the administration takes no effective part in it. The mistake which the Commissioners and the rate-payers have made in this respect should be early rectified. The Chairman should be a local resident of good standing who has time to devote to the affairs of the Municipality. In no way has the place advanced since my last visit. The Commissioners hoard their money, and do not even incur the necessary expenditure on public latrines, and seem to take no active interest in public concerns. No one seems to look after the conservancy or other establishment, who neglect their work in the most barefaced manner. The town is overgrown with jungle which the owners of land are not required to keep down. It is riddled with dobas and old tanks, and the Commissioners permit the formation of new ones for bricks and house-making. They also allow the drains to be built over for private conveniences. The whole management of the town, as a specimen of Local Self-Government, is a complete failure. The Commissioners effect no good to the people. They tax them and give no adequate return. They support a large establishment which seems to study how to neglect work, and succeeds in finding out the way. Altogether, the state of Serampore is highly discreditable to all concerned. What is wanted is life in the administration of the Municipality. The presence of cholera here all the year round, and the fearful loss of life therefrom, should have awakened the Commissioners to a sense of their duty and responsibility towards their constituents. But even these considerations seem to have failed to rouse them to a proper sense of their duties. As a body administering public fund, it is undoubtedly their imperative duty to work in a manner which is calculated to bring about the greatest good to the greatest number. I trust that the Commissioners will now accord serious consideration to the suggestions offered under the several branches of sanitation in the present, as well as in the previous report, and take adequate steps to materially improve the sanitary condition of the town committed to their care. If they do not, I shall consider it my duty to refer the matter to Government."

DIWAN PARUMAL KHURCHAND, Deputy Collector of Jacobabad, notwithstanding the advocacy of Mr. Monhomun Ghose, has been convicted by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate Mr. Mules on the prosecution of the Deputy Commissioner Mr. Giles for corruption. He has been sentenced to three months' simple imprisonment and one thousand rupees fine. In announcing the order, the new paper of Karachi—the Phoenix—remarks:—

"This information will not cause the slightest astonishment. It was known from the beginning that the trial was a mockery. It was not a prosecution but a mere formality of securing a conviction. The Court of Mr. Mules was selected at the suggestion of the Prosecutor. Senior Magistrates well known for their ability and impartiality were not thought sufficiently able to try this case, but an obscure place and an obscure Magistrate were selected for the purpose. While the case was going on the Magistrate and Mr. Giles were living under the same roof. Throughout the case the Magistrate showed a determined bias against the accused. But he knew that he had the support of the highest local officials who would be all exceedingly gratified if he could convict the accused. It was a great compliment to Mr. Mules that he was selected in preference to older Magistrates to try a man who held the same position long ago that Mr. Mules holds now, and who was in receipt of the same salary."

WE read in the Phoenix:—

"During the present Sessions in Karachi, there was a murder case tried by a jury who unanimously acquitted the prisoner. It appears that there was no other evidence against the prisoner than a confession by him before a Magistrate, which was retracted at the trial. The Sessions Judge has disagreed with the verdict of the jury and has referred the case to the Sudder Court."

What sort of people are these jurymen who unanimously acquitted a self-accusing prisoner? Are they students in the Temple or unfledged vakeels? The roles of judge and jury seem exchanged. As a rule men do not accuse themselves for nothing and it were natural for the jury to take them at their word, and for the judge to interpose any legal subtleties. In the state of the Indian law as left us by Sir Fitz James Stephen the Karachee Judge is right, we believe. But then the superior courts do not consider it safe to convict on an withdrawn confession in the absence of incriminating evidence.

Mr. J. Ware-Edgar, C. S. I., Chief Secretary, is allowed leave for one month. Mr. M. Finucane, Director of the Department of Land Records and Agriculture, is allowed special leave for five months, in commutation of privilege leave. Richards, Goalondo, is appointed to be Health Officer of the Port of Calcutta, vice Dr. S. S. Lynch, retired.

WE note with satisfaction that Kumar Girindra Narain Deb, officiating Joint Magistrate and Deputy Collector, Jessore, is Gazetted as Magistrate and Collector of Pooree, during the absence, on leave, of Mr. D. B. Allen, and Kumar Gopendra Krishna, Officiating Joint-Magistrate and Deputy Collector, Sealdah, is to act as Magistrate and Collector, Pubna, during the absence on leave, of Mr. G. E. Manisty. Both these gentlemen are scions of the Sovabazar Raj family, and Statutory Civilian.

At Naples, recently it rained black and muddy. Professor Palmieri, of the Vesuvius Observatory, explains that strong winds from Africa raise into the air any amount of dust, and rain, passing through this, is rendered black and muddy.

THE Home remittances from 1st April to 14th July, 1888, amounted to £4,130,000.

IT is curious and not a little mournful, to mark the process of religion-making. Already, myths are gathering round the career of Dayanand Saraswati, a preacher who died only yesterday. This is the most notable contribution—from one Radhe Lal Varma, of Fyzabad, who writes to the Indian Union—to the Lalita Vistara of the new Buddha:—

“He was born in the family of a respectable Audich Brahmin at Morwee in Gujrat in 1825. From his infancy he showed the signs of talent and mental precocity, and his wonderful capacity for knowledge enabled him to master a commentary on the Yajur Veda at the age of 14. One day his father took him to a shrine of Shiva. While engaged in service his mind was struck on seeing the mice come out of their holes and commence to run about the idol and help themselves with the rice put on its head. From this he inferred that it could not be the Omnipotent Supreme Being. This thought he expressed to his father who tried in vain to purge his mind from it. Shortly after the death of his sister and uncle the notion of the instability of the world impressed upon his mind and assured him that the pleasures of the world are transient. His father supposing that he would go astray determined to marry him. When everything was ready for the marriage, he quitted his home one evening. He took an unfrequented path and travelled more than 20 miles during the night. Every day removed him further from his native country until he reached Sedhipur. In the meantime his father was making a search after him, and no sooner he came to know the place of his retreat than he came to him with a few sepoys. His father was angry with him, but being told he (Swami Dayanand) was ready to start for home, he calmed himself. His father ordered a constant watch to be kept over him. On the 4th night the sepoy came under the influence of sleep, which gave him an opportunity to escape. He went out of the town and hid himself over a tree in a garden. He passed that day over it and no sooner it was dark than he started off. This was the last meeting, and his parents heard nothing of him since. For many years he wandered all over India. Wherever he heard of a learned man, he at once went to him in spite of every difficulty, and if he found him better informed than himself learned it from him with great attention. It would be too tedious to give the details of the places visited by him. It is sufficient to say that on his return from Himalayan scenery he went to Swami Virja Nand, the famous divine philosopher of Muttra. With him he read the Vedas and the glosses on them and revised all that he had formerly studied. On the completion of his studies he set out on his mission of the regeneration of Arya Varta. He became a travelling preacher and with the view of reviving the true and extirpating the false religion, he refuted the wrong opinions of the so-called Pandits wherever he went. His last plan was that books should be composed, and meetings held in every large town to lecture to the people that they might see their fallen state and try to improve it. It succeeded and societies under the name of the Arya Samaj, have been established in all the provinces of India.”

THE Czar and Emperor William have met, and landed at Peterhoff. Their greetings were most cordial.

THE House of Lords have passed the Bill extending the jurisdiction of the Indian High Courts. Lord Cross has introduced a Bill to amend the India Council Act—how, is not stated in the telegram. In the Commons, Mr. Smith has brought in a bill appointing a Special Commission to enquire into the Times' charges against Mr. Parnell.

IN the French Chamber of Deputies, a Bill has been read a first time for grant of credit of sixty seven million francs (£2,680,000) for the better defences of Brest, Cherbourg, and Toulon.

M. FLOQUET and General Boulanger have had their duel, both being wounded, the former very slightly, the latter rather seriously. The General, however, is getting over it.

A YOKOHAMA telegram of the 18th reports a volcanic eruption in Japan. Four hundred persons are said to have been killed and a thousand injured.

A DYNAMITE plot has been discovered at Chicago. It was planned to murder the Judges who sentenced the anarchists there and to destroy the public buildings.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE sensation of the week is the arrest of an eminent and popular member of the Covenanted Civil Service, with a view to his trial on serious charges of corruption. Such an event is startling enough, but its painful interest has been heightened by the romance of that officer's flight from justice and of the successful pursuit of the Police after him.

Mr. Crawford, Commissioner of the Central Bombay Division, was on Monday suspended by the Local Government. Next day, under cover of night and in disguise, he fled from his station, Poona. The following telegram from that place to the Englishman shows his mysterious disappearance:—

POONA, JULY 19.

“Mr. Crawford disappeared from Poona on Tuesday night. His brother arrived from Bombay that night, but did not find Mr. Crawford in his bungalow, so he enquired from the servants, who gave no particulars further than that he was in the bungalow half-an-hour before. A letter was found saying that he had gone for a walk near Holkar's Bridge. His brother went there, but could not find him. The police were then informed, and steps were taken to trace the mystery. On Wednesday information was received that Mr. Crawford went to Bombay and travelled in the third class, disguised. He was met at the Byculla station by Colonel Portman, Superintendent of Railway Police, and brought back to Poona last night. They alighted at the Kirkee station. Mr. Crawford's house has been sealed and locked, and placed in charge of the police. Mr. Crawford's late additional assistant has been suspended from his office, and the clerks have been transferred to distant stations.”

The following telegram from Bombay, condensed from the Englishman, gives the particulars of Mr. Crawford's escape and capture:—

“At ten O'clock on Monday, Mr. Crawford was suspended from his duties. Early on Wednesday morning, Inspector Jeffries, of the G. I. P. Railway Police, was visited by Mr. Ommaney, Inspector-General of Police, and Major Babington, Superintendent of Police, Poona, and was ordered by them to leave Poona for Bombay by the mail leaving at 5-15 A. M., and to keep a sharp lookout for Mr. Crawford. In the event of his entering a train Mr. Ommaney, was to be advised by telegraph of the circumstance. Jeffries was also instructed not to interfere in any way with the movements of Mr. Crawford. Armed with these instructions the Inspector prepared to leave Poona by the mail, but while waiting for its arrival from Raichore, the man whom he was set to watch made his appearance on the platform, disguised by a long grey beard, and a slouched hat, with the flaps drawn over his eyes. The disguise was completed by a handkerchief being wound round his neck, and a long overcoat reaching to his heels. The Policeman approached the fugitive, and asked him in an off-hand way whither he was bound. Mr. Crawford answered that his destination was Tanna. The Inspector offered to purchase him a ticket, and Mr. Crawford assenting he was provided with a third-class ticket for Tanna. Jeffries having communicated by letter with the Inspector-General, left with Mr. Crawford, but acting on telegraphic instructions received from Mr. Ommaney at Kurjut, he left the train at that station, and started to return to Poona by the early morning train from Bombay. His further progress was arrested at Lanowlie by another telegram from Mr. Ommaney directing him to return to Bombay, and keep Mr. Crawford in view.

Meantime Mr. Crawford had continued his journey from Kalyan to Bombay as a second-class passenger by a local train, and on alighting at Byculla station, he immediately drove to the Victoria Hotel, opposite the Prince's Dock. He solicited from Mr. Connell, the proprietor, the services of one of the barmen to get him a second-class ticket for Colombo from the P. and O. office in the Fort. Previously, however, he had written to the chief steward of the Teheran, the steamer which leaves to-morrow with the Australian mails, to arrange for a second-class passage to Colombo. The letter was signed ‘James G.’ and intimated that the writer had just arrived in Bombay from Jubbulpore in a very precarious state of health, and was advised to go on a voyage to Ceylon or further. He also asked to be allowed to go on board at once as he was extremely ill. The letter was handed to the second officer of the vessel, who replied that he had no power to take any passenger on board unless he was provided with a ticket from the head office.”

The Englishman's Poona Correspondent wires:—

“It is said that a Brahman has made various charges against Mr. Crawford, implicating Haveli Mamlatdars of Poona and Ahmednagar who also have been suspended. Humantrao Jaghirdar has been arrested by warrant. Messrs. Ritchie, Naylor, and Nugent have been constituted a Commission to enquire into the matter, and Mr. Kennedy, the Superintendent of Police, Satara, has been ordered to come here to take part in a police investigation.”

Another correspondent adds that Mr. Moore, the Akbari Commissioner, has been ordered to take charge of Mr. Crawford's office. The Englishman has shown resource and enterprise on this occasion. On Thursday, it published long telegrams while the other morning papers were silent. Probably their correspondents relied upon the Bombay papers which maintained a conspiracy of silence. We can understand this tenderness towards a high Civilian and popular member of “society”—the corrupt have need and can afford to be popular—but, in such an explosion and under the obvious determination of the Government, to do the right, the effort at suppression is a feeble mistake.

SINCE then, the Indian Daily News's man has bestirred himself and supplied fresh and copious intelligence.

The information up to yesterday, is that Mr. Crawford has been freed on bail for Rs. 70,000, and Himmat Rao on Rs. 50,000. The latter was the former's Head-Assistant who is charged with receiving Rs. 400 for inducing Mr. Crawford to appoint his head clerk a Deputy Accountant in Khandeish Collectorate. All sorts of rumours are afloat in the Presidency. It is said that the Secretary of State has telegraphed to Lord Reay, suggesting for Mr. Crawford a criminal trial. In consequence of this message, the Governor held a conference with Messrs. Nugent, Naylor, and Richey. Another story is that on leaving, Mr. Ozanne, Inspector-General of Police, left a sealed packet with Mr. Muir Mackenzie which the latter was to lay before the Governor. This packet is believed to have contained an account of the sale of a farm by Mr. Crawford. On reading it, Lord Reay went down to Mr. Richie's bungalow, where he met Messrs. Richie, Nugent, Taylor, &c. Nothing is for certain known about their nature and result of these conferences. Certain it is that the inquiry is being pushed with exemplary vigor. Thirteen other officials have been suspended, some apparently pending the trial of their good faith as witnesses in the coming inquiry. Mr. Moore, too, Mr. Crawford's successor as Commissioner of the Central Division, has commenced office with dismissing four clerks. Between dismissals and suspensions, so many have been rendered hors de combat, that in the exigency of administration the reserve force of pensioners have been called back to active service. There is a thorough overhauling going on.

The whole Central Division seem rotten to the core. The administration was peculiarly favourable to the growth of speculation. Looters of every hue, as befits its historic associations, abound in the land, in the service of Government. Chief of them—the St. Ethelbert of Bombay—seems to be Mr. Arthur Crawford, of the great Indian Civil Service, the admired of "society" in the West.

A great European speculator is not by any means a Dodo in these days. But the nett to catch him is rarely forthcoming. Since the trial of Collector Batson or the inquiry on Resident Colebrooke, there has not been such a whale fished out of the deep seas of administration.

WE shall not be surprised to learn that there is considerable uneasiness in at least rural Hindu society down South, though Europeans in the country—the nearest in the neighbourhood—might not suspect. We—the great majority—are still loyal to the old Faith, and Gods and Brahmins have still power to move us, for good or for evil. A distinct call in the name of religion is likely to draw. Signs of such a call seem to be in the air in the Carnatic country. A distracting, though, truth to confess, rather unnecessary but all the more suspicious because so unmeaning, document, purporting to come from the holy of holies, the shrine of the great Viswanath himself in Benares, and embodying a miraculous message, is being circulated in the Districts of the Madras Presidency. This is a translate of the Tamil Circular in its passage through Salem:—

"May Sri Kasi Viswanatha help us. A notice received from the temple of Sri Kasi Viswanatha Swami. The following is the inscription drawn on a beautiful gold parchment leaf that dropped accidentally from Heaven into the temple of Viswanatha Swamiar at the city of Sri Kasi (Benares):—'On and from Wednesday, the 24th day of Masi, of the year Sarnathari current (corresponding to 6th March, 1889,) Sukla Patcham, Panchami, Aswani star, after one Indian hour after sunrise in Meena Laguan, all things will begin to go on just and proper in this Kailiyuga: the day will be longer than the nights—the nights consisting of only 25 Indian hours (Naligais): each and every soul will be devoid of all disease and bodily pain and will live up to, or their age will be, 125: in the month of Karthigai (November-December) of the said year the Supreme Being (Begavan) will become Emperor in the northern country; as virtue and vice are now not discriminated in this world, it is said that, after that period, virtue and sages will become famous.' The foregoing are the inscriptions contained in the said parchment. Those that chance to learn this news should make a copy thereof, and should circulate this to the other villages. Those that so notify this will gain virtue worth the presenting or making gift of 100 cows, but those that fail to so notify will lose virtue worth the presenting or destroying of a gift of 100 cows. If anybody were to disbelieve this notification, they will become doimed to Hell, called Erowravathi."

Whether this message has come all the way from Benares, to say nothing of Heaven, may well be doubted. We don't hear of it nearer home, and it is as silly as the deliverance of a Spiritualist medium speaking in the name of the mighty dead. All the same it may be true—true as a fraud, that is. No enquiries have been made in Benares, and these things are kept secret. But it is just possible that the thing was started somewhere in the South. Be that as it is, the matter is worth inquiry, with a special view to find out if there is any political motive underlying it. Some Phadke may be at bottom. The stupidity may work mischief among the simple.

THE Poetry of the Burman War—the romance of its guerillanism—has yet to be written—its Humour makes its appearance, though in driblets from time to time. Here is a snatch in the shape of an Indo-Hebernian anecdote—from Mr. Kipling's new book:—

The British detachment could not discover where the Dacoits abode; but "Evenshually we puckarowed wan man. 'Trate him tunderly,' sez the Lift'nint. So I tuk him away into the jungle, wid the Burmese Interpret'r an' my clanin'-rod. Sez I to the man:—'My peaceful squreen,' sez I, 'you shquot on your hunkers an' dimonstrate to my frind here, where your frinds are when they're at home?' Wid that I introjuced him to the clanin'-rod, an' he comminst to jabber; the Interpret'r interprutin' in betweens, an' me helpin' the Intelligence Department wid my clanin'-rod when the man misremmbered.'" It has been explained just before that "'Tis only a dah and a Snider that makes a dacoit. Widout thim he's a peaceful cultivator, an' felony for to shoot."

Mr. Kipling draws from the life, of course. What a life! If the natives are dacoits, the strangers are not the most amiable god-fearing knights. Above all, what a society is this of India to Bahhova these puckarowallas among the Pahurowallas of the general peace of the Empire!

HERE is what the World said some time ago:—

"It is seldom that a Queen's Birthday list of decorations contains the name of anyone more worthy of recognition than Mr. Monro, the Assistant Commissioner of Police, who was last week gazetted a C. B. Mr. Monro has a distinguished record as an Indian Civil servant. After filling numerous posts of an important but less prominent character in Lower Bengal, including those of District Magistrate, Under-Secretary to the Government, District and Sessions Judge, &c., he became Inspector-General of Police, and finally Commissioner of the Presidency Division. No service that he ever rendered was better deserving of reward than was his action with reference to the Ilbert Bill and the Local Self-Government Bills. His reports against these measures were among the most important State papers which the controversy produced, and they attracted prominent notice both in India and at home. But the service thus rendered was at the expense of Lord Ripon's baneful policy, and, of course, when Mr. Monro left India in 1883 Lord Ripon's Government allowed him to retire undecorated. The following year he took charge of the Criminal Investigation Department at Scotland Yard, and his administration of that office has marked a new era in London police work. His brilliant successes in thwarting Fenian plots and bringing the dynamiters to justice have been frequently recognised by the press and the public; but it is only now that they have been thus tardily acknowledged by the Government."

Mr. Monro was an able and energetic public servant in India, blessed with a keen nose for crime. Placed in Bengal, a quiet country with a mild and generally inoffensive population, his blessing turned at most a curse, to himself and others. His genius was wasted and occasionally abused—to the injury of his reputation and his temper. That at least, is the impression left on us by a contemporary who knew him well, and had suffered from him. He was not the kind of officer to be popular. He was a live public servant, and thoroughly individual. He had too much "go," and he would always have his "say." He was a man of strong and not amiable views. Among the subordinate servants of Government, he led the opposition to the proposals formulated in the Local Self-Government Resolution and the Ilbert Bill. On the former in especial, he showed grasp and wonderful knowledge of the country.

THE Indian Union is looking up. For an organ of Citizen Singh, it is wonderfully sober. It is still disfigured by typographical errors, but that is a defect easily rectifiable up to the Indian standard of correctness. Anything like absolute accuracy is, of course, out of the question in this country. We are glad to note signs of new blood in our contemporary's veins. The paper is now being ably written and conducted with spirit. For a provincial native organ, there are perhaps too much of European politics. These, however, are handled with knowledge. Considering that Continental complications if the near future are destined to mould our destinies, it is a distinct advantage to have in the heart of Upper India a native journal able to take their measure and understand their drift. The last issue contains a good article on Foreign Affairs marred by an inapt quotation, feeble in itself and farther spoiled in the adaptation. Poetry is clearly not our contemporary's forte.

THE report which first appeared in the Srimanta Swadagar is being widely copied, that a Bengali Babu Jogendra Nath Mukhick, of Bhowanipore, has just married at Mandalay a Burmese girl. She is the daughter of a Muktear who is said to be both rich and respectable among his people. It is not said by what form they were united. We suspect the Registrar officiated as the Poongy on the occasion. Is the astute Soudagar sure that he has not been deceived into accepting what in Moslem Imameea parlance may be called the Burman Mhola as veritable marriage proper and pure. Such unions may be called marriages by courtesy but they are strongly differentiated from the orthodox Hindu institution. Foreign residents in Ultragangetic India have always availed themselves of the convenience offered by the customs of the country. Europeans have specially grasped at the opportunity of playing the Turk and enjoying Harew Life beyond the bounds of Christendom, without fear of the operation of the marriage law in Europe. From time to time attempts have been made to put down the scandal, but in vain Mormonism without fealty to Joseph Smith laughed at the fulminations of Chief Commissioners and Bishops. Recent events must have given it wider scope and expansion. It is as well, perhaps, that it is so, since men cannot be improved by act of Parliament, any more than by Papal Bulls.

THE Moorshedabad Correspondents of the morning papers were premature in stating that the great Jagat Sett family case had closed and only awaited judgment. We hear that the case for the defendant had closed, but the plaintiff's reply remained, before it were time for the court to decide and pronounce judgment. The court of the Sub-Judge of Moorshedabad is now occupied with the plaintiff's reply. His leading pleader Babu Gopal Chunder of the local bar being too ill to attend, Manick Chand (the Plaintiff) procured the services of Babu Taraprosunno Mookerjee, the able and accomplished vakeel of Burdwan. Baboo Taraprosunno appears to have already given proofs of his mettle. Having come late into the field, in a difficult and novel line of litigation, he presumably shows wonderful grasp of the contention as well as familiarity with strange institutions and tribal peculiarities to be able to engage the court for a week, as he has been doing. He has a foeman worthy of his steel in Babu Boikuntha Nath Barat, who is the leader on the opposite side, supported by almost the whole strength of the Berhampore bar.

"A silver gote, or chain, belonging to a lady of Rajbulhab was stolen some time ago. Madhub Roy, the head of the family, brought a charmer, or a man having the reputation of detecting a thief by batti chala, or setting a cup in motion. The charmer placed on the ground a batty or cup held by another person, which moved on by itself, according to popular notion, to the house of one Chundra Coomar Chuckerbutty, a neighbour. As this cup affair is an imputation on the character of Chundra Coomar in the eyes of his village men, he instituted criminal proceedings for defamation, under Section 500 of the Indian Penal Code, before the Joint-Magistrate of Serampore. The offence being considered proved, the Joint-Magistrate, on Saturday last, (23rd June) fined the accused Rs. 10, or in default, one week's rigorous imprisonment."—J. D. News.

That is like foolish Young Briton set to do justice among a strange people, without training or juridical knowledge or familiarity with the ideas and usages of the country, or indeed of any other. It was obviously a case for dismissal. And the pettifoggers who advised Chunder Coomar, should have been sternly rebuked. It is preposterous to convict a man for batti-chala or astrology. He may just as well be punished for practising Homœopathy. The offence was considered proved—because, forsooth, the batti-chala was. O lame and impotent conclusion! The utmost that the Joint could have done with propriety, was to discharge Madhub Roy with a dubious warning to be careful in future about the objects of such indigenous methods of thief-catching.

That case is sociologically and politically important, as showing the conflict between the institutions of the people and an alien jurisprudence and judicature. Herein is displayed the curse of subjection. It is because the little finger of the young Joint was superior to all sastra and shura and all the common law of the country, that this litigious Chuckerbutty could affect to make a grievance of batti-chala. Is there no council of elders and no excasting machinery at Rajbullub!

THE late General MacGregor's memorial portrait was lately unveiled, with befitting ceremony and in a good speech, by the Viceroy at Simla. It is a true work of art by the eminent Scotch Academician, who, happily for us, has been in India for these two years. Although Mr. Archer never saw his subject, he has been able to execute from a photograph not only a successful but a striking likeness.

Sir Charles MacGregor was not only an all round officer of great ability, successful alike in the camp and the field as well as on the staff and in the bureau, but also a literary soldier. We read in the Army and Navy Gazette that he has left a mass of writings on military and other subjects, in print and in manuscript, which may yet be edited for publication. By way of a preliminary to the official part of the work, Colonel Mark Bell, R. E., the head of the Intelligence department, in the Quarter Master-General of India's office, is engaged on a memorandum on the various gazetteers and handbooks, mostly of a confidential nature, prepared by the deceased, from the time of Sir Hugh Rose's Command-in-chief, who 17 years ago initiated the work.

Application has also been made to the Governor-General in Council for permission to publish an abridgment of the History of the Second Afghan War, in 6 bulky volumes compiled by or under the direction and superintendence of, General MacGregor, subject to the censorship of the Indian military department. This has raised the question of copyright between the heirs of the deceased and the Government. It is an interesting but by no means an easy question, and it is believed that a compromise will be effected. This is to be regretted. In the interest of military literature and of the growing class of officers with the gift of expression and the capacity for inquiry and patience for details, we wish the point were not evaded. We are far from desiring to see a plunge into the whirlpool of litigation. The Indian taxpayer cannot in these days afford such luxuries, and it were a pity to dissipate the departed soldier's hard-earned gain on respectable solicitors and eminent counsel. But could not a somewhat satisfactory, if not quite authoritative, decision be procured by a less expensive method—say, by reference to the final arbitrament of a single retired Chancellor or Vice-Chancellor or Master of the Rolls, or other Equity lawyer of reputation for literature and judgment? To our mind, such a private tribunal would be better for the end in view than the lottery of bench upon bench. The point is new and the best Judges would be reduced to decide it on imperfect analogies drawn from proximate or at most approximate precedents. From whatever machinery a decision is procured, to do justice and give satisfaction, the Judge or arbitrator should himself be a literary man, a man who has written and, if possible, published. Even a great Equity lawyer without the literary qualification, is likely to miss the point. He might see no cause of action at all. Prima facie, a man who writes under orders in his official capacity, while in the receipt of pay, has no leg to stand on as a claimant of copyright. A man is not twice paid for the same work. Thus the copyright in periodicals vests in the publishers, not in the paid authors of the different articles.

Meanwhile, Major-General MacGregor's Letters and Diaries, edited by Lady MacGregor, is ready and will soon be issued by Blackwood.

MR. MOSS, B. A., the new Head Master of Breck's Memorial School, at Ootacamund, has got into trouble. In advertising for a few boarders, he was particular in mentioning that none but "sons of gentlemen" will be admitted. He may just as well have poked his nose into a hornet's nest. The majority of Christians and English (more or less pure) speaking folks down South are up in arms against him. A contributor to the Madras Standard breaks out :—

"What does this young Head Master mean? What significance does he attach to the expression gentleman? Suppose I went up to him and told him I was the son of Mr. So, and So, on receipt of a salary of Rs. 250 a month, would he receive me into his house as the 'son of a Gentleman?'"

In his indignation the writer loses the perspicacity of his language.

"It is so difficult to see what this learned teacher is driving at. Is it the son of a Governor who is the son of a Gentleman?"

Does our Standard walah mean, Is the son of a Governor which Governor is the son of a gentleman, to be accounted a gentleman's son? But the next item in the angry catechism clears up the matter.

"Does he want the son of a Councillor and will he reject the son of an honest man—a gentleman withal—because he is in poor circumstances, although sufficiently above water to give his son a decent education?"

The interrogative mood ended, the writer goes on,

"I would advise Mr. Moss, inexperienced as he is, to be guarded in his expressions. He has only recently come out, and is quite a boy, and if he has learnt anything, he surely has learnt that it is not a white face and a fat purse that makes a gentleman; and let him not be contaminated with the significance of the word which is placed on it by the so-called Society of Madras. Society indeed!"

Which, rendered in vernacular, amounts to this—Puppy beware. Then he quotes from an article somewhere on the momentous question Who are gentlemen and who are not, written by an Englishman and a gentleman, (the Italics the Standard writer's,) from whom he quotes:—

"In one class, and not long ago, he was regarded as a gentleman who kept a gig. He is a gentleman in one house who does not eat peas with his knife; in another who is not to be discountenanced by any created form of butler. In my own case I have learned to move among pompous menials without much terror, never without much respect. So long as they publicly tread the boards of their profession, it would be difficult to find more finished gentlemen; and it would often be a matter of grave thought with me, sitting in my club, to compare the bearing of the servants with that of those on whom they waited. There could be no question which were the better gentlemen."

He repeats

"That to be the son of a Governor, of a Councillor, or of a Colonel is not necessarily to be the 'son of a Gentleman.'"

And finally ends with his theory of what constitutes a gentleman,

"He is a gentleman who is respected and thoroughly honest, no matter what his position in life; who pays his bills regularly; who thrives not on other people's earnings; and who has the courage to tell Mr. Moss as much."

That not only throws over-board the famous definition given at Thelwell's trial, but goes beyond Tennyson, who now as Lord Tennyson is more than ever an authority as to what constitutes a gentleman.

MR. GOODRICKE has obtained his furlough of six months. Baboo Doorgagutty Banerjee, First Personal Assistant to the Presidency Commissioner, is Gazetted in his place, as Deputy Collector of Calcutta and Superintendent of Excise Revenue. The jurisdiction extends to the district of Calcutta, to so much of the district of the 24-Pergunnahs as is within the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Police, Calcutta, and to so much of the district of Hooghly as is composed within the limits of the Municipality of Howrah. He will also act as Collector of Stamp Revenue, Calcutta. Within the same area, Mr. S. J. Kilby will act as Collector of Income Tax. Mr. Goodricke had charge of both these Departments which gave him a wide field for himself.

We informed our readers last week that Mr. Goodricke was loath to avail himself of the leave he had procured at no small sacrifice, even of life itself, and that Mr. Smith ordered him several times to fix his last day in the Collectorate, but he avoided. The Divisional Commissioner then reported the matter to Government, and on Wednesday peremptory order was issued and served on the out-going Collector, and Baboo Doorgagutty Banerjee took over charge the same afternoon.

Mr. Goodricke's sticking to his old love has not been all evil to Government. A gentleman whose duties constantly led him to be present before the Collector was never called upon or forgot to pay his income tax since its imposition and only last week forwarded a rather large sum as his quota of the impost.

THE Maharaja of Cooch Behar is coming down to Calcutta on the 25th.

OUR contemporaries are making themselves unnecessarily uneasy about the last news from Pelitana. There is not much in it. The affair has been exaggerated to the prejudice of the Jains in the telegram from Ahmedabad by an enemy or a sensation-monger. The fault is the Jains'. If the Thakoor Saheb has put seals on the temple property he is within his right, the Jains not having paid the Rs. 20,000 which they agreed to pay annually in settlement of their long standing differences with the Chief.

Mookeem Buddree Das Bahadour of our city is going to the spot to see to the affair. In connection with this subject we may mention as an illustration of the extent to which advertising has gone even among the hitherto unsophisticated classes of our countrymen that the Mookeem's intention was communicated to the press before his people knew anything about it. The Jains of Calcutta—a small compact community—heard of it first from their acquaintances, mostly Bengalis, who read the papers.

THE papers lately reported the death of the Dowager Maharani of Cooch Behar at Benares at the age of 100. And the general belief is, not only among Europeans but natives, and in Benares itself, that the Maharaja of Cooch Behar has lost his mother. We may therefore, as well assure the friends and wellwishers of the Maharaja that His Highness has suffered no such heavy bereavement.

Nor was the poor old lady who died the other day a hundred years old, as the papers would have us suppose. She was old enough no doubt, but had not attained her ninetieth year. Another instance of that habit of exaggeration and disregard of exactness for which we are so much taken to task.

This lady was a Kanyapatri of the late Raja Sivendra Narayan—the grand-father of the present Maharaja. Our readers may not know what a Kanyapatri is. Polygamy is an ancient institution in Cooch Behar, and some of the forms of marriage which are in vogue there, are so loose, so devoid of all sacramental character, that doubts naturally arise in the Hindu mind as to the validity of such union and the legitimacy of offsprings born of such wedlock. Kanyapatri system is one of these latter forms. A maiden bestowed by a relative, at the time of the marriage of a Raja, probably with a view to perpetuate his or her influence through such woman, and who helps the bride in some of the ceremonies as a bridesmaid, is a Kanyapatri. The bride who is married after the approved method, is the Patani, and these bridesmaids (the number is usually 5) are treated as wives by the inferior form of marriage. Such marriages are considered valid in Cooch Behar, and the issues of such marriages are not under a ban of illegitimacy. If there are no sons by marriage of a superior form, sons of *Kanyapatri*s come in for inheritance. In fact, the present is the son of a Kanyapatri, and there being no male child born of the approved union, the guddee came to him.

This poor lady, who was no more the Dowager Maharani of Cooch Behar than Lady Rosamond was the Queen to Henry II, was a Kanyapatri by marriage and was better known as Kanakesani Aye Gherani of Sivendra Narayan's household. She was treated with great respect by all the members of the household on account of her many womanly virtues and her general devoutness and piety. So much for the so called Dowager Maharani. The counterfeit one is dead, the real one is still hale and hearty in her blind retirement.

WE deeply regret to record the death of our eminent countryman Baboo Joykissen Mookerjee, which took place unexpectedly from a sudden attack of dysentery, at his residence in the Trans-Hoogly town of Uttarpara, on Thursday the 19th at half past ten in the morning. We offer our sincere condolence to Raja Peary Mohun Mookerjee and the Uttarpara family. The country has sustained an irreparable loss.

He was a man, take him for all in all,
We shall not look upon his like again.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, JULY 21, 1888.

THE PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE.

HUQ v. THE LATE SALAR JUNG.

IN his evidence before the Select Committee on the great mining fraud Abdul Huq repels the charge of having defrauded his master the Nizam out of the mining rights in his territories. He declares the late Sir Salar Jung to have approved the scheme, while he defends his own appropriation of £250,000 thereunder, by producing a note written to him by the deceased Minister in January 1882, in which as Minister of the Nizam he, Sir Salar Jung, stated that he would have no objection to Huq's receiving "any remuneration in the railway and mining schemes with which the promoters might reward his services." And this letter was honestly interpreted by him to mean—that the Minister would have no objection to his pocketing ~~24~~ to 30 lakhs of rupees (one quarter of the price for which the Concession was sold) as a mild return for his efforts to assist the parties who were willing to become owners of all the Mining rights of the State—for nothing!

He declares that he innocently understood this 'line of assurance,' as the Minister himself terms it, to mean that he had the Minister's authority to concede the whole of the mining rights of the Nizam's territories gratuitously to Mr. Watson, with permission to stipulate for a payment of 25 lacs to himself for any assistance as he might give Mr. Watson in selling those rights for £1,000,000 sterling in London. The clear meaning of the letter is that if a Company were formed in London to purchase these mining rights for the Nizam's Government, the Sir Salar Jung as Minister of that Government would have no objection to Huq's receiving remuneration from its promoters for any assistance he might unofficially give them.

The fact that Sir Salar Jung after thirty years' administration of the Nizam's Government not only left no money behind him, but left 30 lakhs of debt is sufficient evidence of his absolute purity in a service, in which speculation is common, in which, had he been an ordinary man, he would have amassed millions. But now he is gone, and unable to defend himself, we are to understand it seems, on the authority of this man Huq, that he was at the same time so reckless of his master's interests as well as his own that he intended by this 'line of assurance' to Huq, to allow that worthy to sell on his own account and profit all the mining rights of the Hyderabad territory, and that if Huq's own share in the plunder should amount to £250,000 the minister would think him fairly entitled to it as a reward for his services in putting £10,00,000 sterling into the pockets of his confederates and himself! And Mr. Watson says that both he and Mr. Winter also understood the Minister's letter to mean this too. It will be observed that this letter of the deceased minister bears date 5th January 1882, and that the mining fraud was conceived as far back as 1881. It had its origin in the month of September 1881 and the whole scheme was cut and dried by the 23rd December of that year, when Mr. Winter proposed it at length to certain parties in London, who were to co-operate therein. The scheme was not finally accomplished until four years later (January 1886) and this scrap of a note of Sir Salar Jung's bearing date January 1882 is now brought forward by Mr. Watson to clear himself and Huq from the suspicion that they were acting without warrant. What warrant does the letter give for anything but the receipt by Huq of a proper remuneration for any bonâ fide services that he might render a fide Company in London willing to develop the mining resources of the State? It is preposterous to suppose that the great Vizier sans tâche et sans reproche but himself to the Huq scheme of plunder.

THE ISHMAEL FAMILY OF KUMAON.

OUR native contemporary of Allahabad gives a family memoir, which we cannot, in duty, pass over. The writer knows how to state, but he has no need to waste words; his facts, if facts they are, speak for themselves. The narrative is of enchainning yet painful interest. There is a terrible realism in this tale of a household of settlers in the Hills. It is a ghastly story of rampant and ever-triumphant lawlessness, recalling the worst scenes of Border life in America. That such things should still be possible in India! such must be the involuntary exclamation of every right-minded man reading it. Life in the Hills, is associated in our imaginations with balls and picnics, lawn-tennis and flirtation and everything gay and happy. Who could imagine that in the very neighbourhood of the Versailles in the Hills, the indigenous inhabitants of the Hills were living in sorrow and suffering and constant terror from the violence of European emigrants and their descendants come to reside among them? But without more parley, let us introduce the Allahabad writer. He says:—

"Many years ago now, one Frederic Wilson, a Bombardier of artillery, purchased his discharge at Dinapore, and having purchased a gun, and some ammunition, shot his way up to Musoorie, then in its infancy. At first he obtained employment in one of the schools; but the instincts of Ishmael being strong upon him, he wandered forth into the heart of the Himalayas, and settled down at Hursil, near Gungotri. For some time he lived among the lower castes of the Paharees as one of themselves, and finally ended by marrying a hill woman of the Joomriya or musician caste, by whom he had three sons, Charles, Henry, and Nuthoo. After a time by the sale of birds, skins and musk, followed by lucrative timber contracts, Mr. Frederic Wilson became a rich man and one of the local magnates of Mussoorie and Dehra Dun. A few years ago, on his death, he left several lacs of rupees to be divided between his widow and his three sons. Taking every thing into consideration much good and but little evil could be spoken of Shikaree Wilson; he was liberal in his charities, especially to the Leper Asylum, and his death was sincerely regretted by his friends, relatives, and acquaintances. He was a born naturalist, and contributed many valuable articles to many papers under the cognomen of Mountaineer.

Of Mr. Wilson's three sons, the eldest alone turned out passably well; therefore we shall not again allude to him. It is the youngest son, Nuthoo Wilson, whose career of crime, we shall now proceed to unfold. He began by debauching a high caste woman named Doorjee; when tired of her, he cast her adrift, and debauched another high caste woman named Godamree. For these escapades, his father had to pay heavy sums of money to those in power. Next Nuthoo Wilson murdered a man named Jowaroo at Naganee with a revolver, and a little while after nearly succeeded in murdering another man named Dirjoo at Jhala with a kukri. For these crimes Mr. Frederic Wilson compounded with those in power for a heavy sum of money and Nuthoo Wilson escaped scot free, and in consequence he became a perfect curse and a veritable scourge to the Paharees of the Bhagiruthi valley. He kept a pair of stocks at Hursil into which he used to put the wretched hill-men and traders at his own sweet will and pleasure. He also used to constitute himself the Tehree Gurhwal Post Office, reading, pilloining, and destroying other people's letters. Besides other innumerable assaults, he nearly beat to death one Heerah, son of Nunda Buniyah. All these matters were duly reported to Sir Henry Ramsay and Sir Alfred Lyall in 1883-84; but no notice was taken, although they were warned that matters would come to a crisis, if Nuthoo Wilson was not forbidden the Tehree Gurhwal State.

And matters did come to a crisis last summer with a vengeance. Grown reckless with long impunity Nuthoo Wilson entered the house of a high caste Paharee, and ravished his sister by force. He then returned to the family mansion at Hursil, where he was protected against the hill people by his mother Mrs. Wilson and his brother Henry. Next day having armed himself, he entered the house of a high caste Bissahiri by name Mullaram, and murdered his wife, and an old man named Maniram. He then left the house, killing and wounding nearly a dozen more people, before he was apprehended and sent down to Tehree in irons."

The student of history has read of the Old Man of the Mountain, from whom the sect of Assassins took its rise, who sent out his fanatical disciples maddened with hemp on a mission of murder. Here is a Young Man of the Mountain, who goes out armed with gun and knife, to execute his own bloody views.

Our contemporary then quotes a full and unvarnished account from the pen of a European traveller, who came to the spot the day after the last outrage was committed. It is a wonder how he could, without emotion, record the horrible details, and, above all, how they could quietly accept, the hospitality of this miserable mongrel family, who are shame to both Asiatics and Europeans. Perhaps, as travellers in an uncivilised country, they had not much choice left. Perhaps, they were impelled by curiosity. Having seen the marks of Nathu Wilson's devastations including the human and other animal victims of his violence, and heard the villagers' story, they wish in justice to have the explanation of the hero himself.

Perhaps, they hoped to have something what might go in some measure, if not to exculpate a man bearing a Christian surname, at least to attenuate his guilt. They certainly found their host sufficiently communicative, and they made the most of their opportunities for observation for forming a judgment on the serious things which had come to, or been brought under, their notice. In any case, their testimony is above suspicion. And it thoroughly confirms our contemporary. This traveller is a German gentleman, and he mentions two other European eye-witnesses of the highest respectability, being themselves officials, Dr. Warth of the Dehra Dun Forest School, and Dr. Jameson, the Sanitary Commissioner of the Government of the North West Provinces.

But what did the Civil Power do to give security to the poor inhabitants and vindicate justice? The authorities were indifferent as usual, having probably more reasons than one not to be hard on their scapegrace of the Hills. The writer goes on:—

"After this appalling series of crimes matters were allowed to rest for more than six months by Mr. Hercules Ross, the Commissioner of Kumaon. Mr. Hercules Ross was a great friend of Mr. Frederic Wilson for many years while Superintendent of the Doon. Meanwhile the Wilson family were not idle, money was poured out like water at Tehri and elsewhere to secure the same impunity for Nathu Wilson that he had enjoyed on previous occasions. Mr. Hercules Ross, not wishing to see the son of his old friend come to the gallows, directed one of his native subordinates to try Nathu Wilson at Paurie. The trial, a hole and corner affair, accordingly took place last January, and Nathu Wilson in teeth of all the evidence was duly pronounced insane on the dictum of a third class Native Medical Subordinate, who knew on which side his bread was buttered. The evidence of Doctors Warth and Jameson was never called for although it was well known that both these gentlemen were ready to swear to the prisoner's perfect sanity. Nathu Wilson has for the present been consigned to the Bareilly Lunatic Asylum, but his friends are confident that in a short time he will be allowed to return to the bosom of his family a free man at liberty to recommence his career of crime when so disposed.

All these facts are well known to our European contemporaries of Northern India, why they have entered apparently into a conspiracy of silence is best known to themselves. After the trial, a sum of four hundred rupees was offered to Ghatuk for his father's murder, and two hundred rupees to Mullaram for his wife's murder, by the Kumaon authorities. But these poor Paharces have nobly refused to accept the price of blood and keep silent."

The poor hillmen—what can they do but keep silent. Dumb from ignorance and poverty, they are doubly dumb in terror. But will the public remain mute? Scandals are cropping up on all sides, but this Himmalyan episode beats them all.

It will be remarked that the Allahabad journal talks of money being freely poured out. Who got it? And who else? We hope some inquiry will be made. Names are freely mentioned too of officers who allowed matters to be hushed up. At any other time, such insinuations would have been sufficiently met by a shrug of contempt on a Pshaw! of incredulity. But European reputation does not at this moment stand high enough for European assurance of that summary kind. The question will still be asked, Who received it?

ELECTRO-BIOLOGY.

FROM the day that Benjamin Franklin—the modern Prometheus of fact—flew his kite to bring down the lightning from Heaven, what strides have been made in our knowledge of that force in Nature manifested with that thunder-bolt which the imagination of many races and ages has regarded as the special and worthy weapon of Divine Power,—the Great God, call him Zeus or Indra—Jehovah, Jove, or Lord! In fact, electricity is one of the branches of science in which we have made most progress. From Franklin to Faraday, is a great leap—from dawn to day. Once the ball was set rolling, it has been in ceaseless motion, and Faraday, if he could peep through his grave, would be astonished at the triumphs achieved since his death by the Edisons and others. The subject has been raised to the dignity of a most important speciality, cultivated by organised bodies and represented by organs in the press. And yet, truth to confess—so vast is science, so narrow human wit and so short the span of individual life—that we are still far from perfect sight. Where it is day it is still a foggy day. The striking figure of the child playing with pebbles on the great sea-shore, by which Newton expressed his own consciousness of feebleness before the mystery of the Universe, is true to this day. After all, the sum total of all our knowledge is just one remove from absolute ignorance. We are still groping in the dark, save for some streaks of light. Confining ourselves to Electricity, how much is our ignorance greater than our understanding of it! Can we really and efficiently control the artillery of the heavens? Not only do we not know the essential nature of the force, we do not know its connection with most things. Its relation to animal life is still obscure. This is a great pity, considering that from some indications, electricity seems not only to exercise a great influence on it, but also to have an occult connection with it. Why this should be, is a wonder, considering the great interest of the subject. It is hard to think of a more fascinating study than Electro-biology, but it has been left to the mercy of mountebanks. The passion for miracles is far from extinct, else we would not see so much vitality in the myseries of Theosophy. That passion is akin to the absorbing thirst for power to subdue the laws of Nature at will, which not unoften seizes ambitious men of science and which is represented in Faust. Now, electro-biology seems to promise that power. Professional conjurers who profess to be electrobiologists, like Bushell, who came to this country, show extraordinary powers—perform what might be regarded as miracles—such as leading their subjects at command, to the extent of making them forget their own identity. They are probably great mesmerists, but mesmerism itself may be intimately related to electricity. If the leading Theosophists and Spiritualists—those having the spirit of science in them—would turn their energies to this field of inquiry, they would have some worthy and fruitful occupation which might reduce to respectable Natural phenomena many of the marvels which now amuse so many and which recall to sterner observers and reasoners the line of the poet—

The sports of children satisfy the child.

We confess at one time after the Colomb revelations, we indulged the hope that if the Theosophical Society continued, it would on new lines, purged of its grosser entourage and its peurile pursuits. The accomplished Founder-President might certainly give the organization of his creation a new start and a rational programme understood of the Gentiles, and Philistines if you will. In that case, the Society, if not Theosophy (whatever it may mean) might count upon more general support. There would have been no lack of definite work, for want of which the Society seems to suffer. There are more things in Heaven and Earth than are dreamt of in our philosophy, and to discover these in a truly scientific spirit is no unworthy pursuit. That hope has not been realised. We must content ourselves with the labours of the savants in the West. The latest news from that quarter is the following:—

"A curious communication of particular interest to both sexes has just been made by M. Féré to the French Society of Biology. The doctor has discovered an electric woman! The name and address of this phenomenon are not given, probably to avoid her being got hold of by some enterprising Barnum. It appears that both her hair and body emit electric sparks. The electricity is more visible when the hair is combed. The hair then stands on an end. When she puts on her underclothing its contact with her skin first produces a crepitation, then the clothes adhere as it were to the body, and finally her movements are partly paralyzed. These phenomena are particularly observable during dry and frosty weather. The electric tension also increases under the influence of emotions—such, for example, as the effect of music, which augments the crepitation. This extraordinary creature, however, is not unique. Dr. Legué mentioned the case of a woman who during an aurora borealis was suddenly charged with electricity, which manifested itself when she passed her finger over the face of her brother; she remained electric for two months. Another instance of a similar kind is reported by Arago. In all these cases the patients are described as of sickly disposition, subject to nervous or hysterical attacks. In the Middle Ages they would have been burnt for being possessed with the devil, to-day they are tendered and petted as scientific wonders. Strange to say, the first account of an electric woman is to be found in a romance by the Brothers Goncourt."

Not in the least! Electric human beings were noticed in ancient times in Europe. They are not so rare as it is supposed. A few years back a woman was noticed in Japan with a powerful charge.

REVIEW.

ENGLISH GRAMMAR IN BENGALI.*

THE book, in our opinion, possesses great merits. We have always been advocates of Nature and reality in education, and denounced the senseless and, in the long run, useless forcing of the young mind, which prevails to such an extent. No tyranny is more cowardly and more deplorable in its consequences, than that of the school, and the worst feature of the reign of Pedagogy is the torture of grammar imposed on the lisping mind. Fancy the idea of putting that Dryasdust Bain's book in the hands of mere beginners! What a waste of energy is involved in the process on the part of these tyros of getting by heart what they can never understand. But the iron sway of schoolmasters requires lads who can at best but spell through English words, to commit to memory such big words as Orthography, Etymology, Orthoepy and so forth. How far more practical will be the method of explaining to them by easy illustrations the more important and general of the things taught by English grammar. The compiler has made this attempt to supersede the cram by real expeditious and impressive teaching. In this matter, men engaged in the practical work of education are more likely to know where the shoe pinches, and we have heard some teachers in whom we have confidence, express themselves highly of the performance. But an Indian author in this new line has little encouragement. There is the entire guild of English authors to resist his poaching on their preserves, while, amongst his own countrymen, the cramming system in vogue has too old established prescriptive claims to be easily set aside. We have gone through the book, and must say it is a genuine effort to remove the practical difficulties felt by teachers and learners in regard to English grammar, and as such, certainly deserving of more general appreciation than it has so far received. We would commend a useful work to Sir Alfred Croft's attention. It will be a good introduction to the Higher Grammar of Bain which is the text book in our Higher Schools.

JEHANGIR.

Prince Selim ascended the throne, on his father's death, under the high-sounding title of Jehangir, or conqueror of the world. Selim displayed no qualities, to call forth the spontaneous homage and admiration of his fellow-men; and but for his subsequent connection with that accomplished and remarkable woman, Nur Jehan, who, in a great measure, controlled his bestial intemperance and those terrible outbursts of ferocity he was so prone to manifest, his life would call for no especial notice. It is Nur Jehan, who has redeemed the period of his reign from being the greatest blot in the history of India. Personally, Jehangir was neither noted for accomplishments nor prowess; he only learnt the art of publicly acting the king, but was void of kingly magnanimity, or kingly attributes. His unnatural hatred of his eldest son, Khousrou, and the treatment he subjected him to, would be sufficient to show his unworthiness to occupy a place among the true kings of the earth. In religion, Jehangir was more superstitious than devout, in fact, he might be termed irreligious, so consistent were his lapses from all that orthodox Mussulmans rank as true devotion. In one particular, however, Jehangir deserves unqualified praise, namely, for the measures he adopted for ensuring that suitors and complainants should have easy access to his presence. For this purpose, he adopted the following ingenious method—a chain was hung against a conspicuous and easily accessible part of the citadel wall, and was available to all descriptions of people, and this chain communicated with a cluster of golden bells within the emperor's own apartment, and he was apprised by their tinkling of the approach of a petitioner, without the aid of intermediate officers, who might be disposed to keep back information, if not the complainer.

When Jehangir came to the throne, he found not only that he had a great heritage but that his dominions were in a high state of tranquility. There was, however, some trouble brewing in Bengal, and a dark portentous cloud hung over the Deccan. The Rana of Oudipore also still continued in opposition. Jehangir's first measures are commendable, as they are of a character more judicious and benevolent than might have been expected of him. Among these wise measures, was the decree which forbade the opening of bales of merchandize by his officers in authority, without the free consent of the owners, and likewise that which abolished the system, which permitted soldiers and servants of the state being quartered on private individuals. He also remitted some vexatious duties which had survived Akbar's reforms, and prohibited the barbarous practice of cutting off ears and noses by way of punishment. Notwithstanding his own notorious habits, the use of wine was strictly forbidden, while that of opium was restricted, all offenders being subject to severe punishment. But his wisest act was obeying his father's dying wishes, and confirming Akbar's old and most trusted officers, in their positions.

It is probably the best method to notice, after enumerating Jehangir's acts of wisdom, his treatment of his son, so that the lights and shadows of his character might be placed in juxtaposition. The strained relations existing between father and son at last became unbearable for the son, and the unfortunate Khousrou came to an open rupture with his father. One night, at a late hour, he fled from his father's presence and took the road to Delhi, having with him a few attendants. On the news of his son's flight being conveyed to Jehangir, he ordered a light detachment of troops to follow in pursuit, and next morning followed with all the troops he could collect.

Khousrou met a body of 300 horse, at a short distance from Agra, and, persuading them to join him, he proceeded to Delhi, and from thence to the Punjab, subsisting his troops by plundering all the way. By the time he reached the Punjab, his force amounted to above 10,000 men, who had flocked to his standard in consequence of the liberty his troopers enjoyed for the purpose of plundering. He obtained possession of Lahore through treachery, but the citadel remained in the hands of Jehangir's adherents, and he was attempting its reduction when he was informed of the near approach of the advanced guard of his father's army. To avoid being placed between two fires, he drew out of Lahore and gave battle to the royal troops, but was totally defeated, though it was only a detachment that was opposed to him. He fled towards Cabul, but was captured and brought to his father a prisoner in chains.

It happened that many of Khousrou's followers, with his principal advisers, were also taken prisoners. In his treatment of them, Jehangir displayed the natural ferocity of his temper. His orders were that seven hundred of these prisoners should be impaled, in a line leading from the gates of Lahore; and it is related that he took a pleasure in watching the long duration of their terrible agonies. It might be supposed that such a statement was an exaggeration, had we not his own relation of the circumstances, in his Memoirs, and of the critical way in which he watched such suffering. Khousrou loaded with chains was placed on an elephant, and carried down the line of the suffering wretches, while a mace-bearer called to him, with mock solemnity, to receive the salutations of his subjects. The scene is too horrible in its barbarity to permit the mind to dwell on it. Poor Khousrou died in chains.

XXV.

The affairs of the Deccan in the meanwhile had been in a state of fermentation, and were now in such a serious condition that they called for immediate and energetic action. Ahmednagar was wrested from the hands of the emperor's viceroy; and Malik Amber, who had been an Abyssinian slave, now ruled there with courage and ability, for a sovereign who was a minor. This Malik Amber felt himself so strong that he had already founded a new city, and seemed destined not only to maintain the sinking fortunes of the Nizam Shahi Government, but to raise them to splendour, for he was a most capable man, both as an administrator and military commander. He had already more than once routed the imperial troops, when he raised his reputation in the country to the highest point, by attacking, defeating, and in a subsequent pursuit nearly annihilating one division of the army Jehangir had sent against him under a most able General, Abdullah Khan. The other divisions of the army, though in the field, thought it was imprudent to face a foe flushed with success, and fearing a similar calamity to that which had overtaken their fellow soldiers, these divisions withdrew to Burhampore. Khurum, or as he is better known, Shah Jehan, the best of Jehangir's sons, was now sent to cope with Malik Amber. This young and able prince not only showed a firm front, but also had recourse to diplomacy, as a means of sowing dissensions among the chiefs of the strong confederacy Malik Amber had succeeded in building up. He was successful in withdrawing from the confederacy, the powerful Rajah of Bijapore; and a defeat which he inflicted at this time, on Malik Amber, produced still further dissensions among the allies, which eventually compelled the redoubtable Abyssinian to sue for terms, which were granted, on his giving up Ahmednagar, and restoring the whole of the territory he had reconquered. This war had previously occupied years. Shah Jehan rejoined his father covered with glory within a twelvemonth of his marching from Ajmir. Jehangir, as a mark of his approbation, added the viceroyalty of Guzerat to the Governments previously held by that prince.

It was in the sixth year of his reign that Jehangir contracted a marriage with the captivating Nur Jehan, an event that had a marked influence on the whole of his after life. This lady was by descent a Persian, her grand-father being a native of Teheran, where he held a good position under the Government. Her father, Mirza Ghizas, in the turns of the wheel of fortune, was placed at the bottom of it, when he found it difficult to maintain his family in their native land, he therefore quitted it with them, and turned his face towards India. By the time the caravan with which he was travelling reached Candahar, he found that his means were exhausted, and himself and household reduced to penury. It was at Candahar that the "light of the world" was born. Her parents being in such abject circumstances were constrained to place the infant on the road by which the caravan would shortly after pass, hoping that some benevolent person might be induced to take the child up, and nourish

it. The child attracted the attention of a rich merchant who was of the party, he took her up, being moved with compassion, and resolved to adopt her as his own. He sought among the travellers for a nurse for the babe, and, like Moses of old, she was placed in the charge of her own mother. The merchant thus brought to know the family, became cognizant of their distress, which he relieved immediately; and finding the father and his eldest son, to be men of ability, he employed them in his own business transactions, and on reaching India, introduced them to Akbar, who gave them subordinate appointments, but father and son soon rose by their abilities to honorable employment.

When Nur Jehan grew up, her beauty and accomplishments were the theme of admiration and discourse. She attracted the notice of Jehangir, then Prince Selim, in the harem of Akbar, where her mother was a welcome visitor and was often accompanied by her daughter. Selim's manner towards the girl became so pointed, that the mother became alarmed, and sought the protection of one of the Sultanas, who, in turn, laid the matter before the emperor. Akbar took his son to task, and directed Mirza Ghizas to have his daughter married and removed from the path of the prince. She was married to a countryman, Shir Afghan Khan, and Akbar, to mark his approbation of the conduct of her parents, granted the Jaghir of Burdwan in Bengal to the young bridegroom.

It would have appeared that Selim having thus lost the object of his passion, would have forgotten her, but it was not so, for he had barely been seated a year on the throne, when he issued an order to the Viceroy of Bengal, to procure for him, the person of Nur Jehan. Shir Afghan heard of Jehangir's purpose, and loving his wife with faithful affection, and being a high-souled man, with a keen sense of honour, he determined to resist the mandate which would separate his wife from him. The first step he took was to resign his command and to leave off wearing arms, which was a sign that he was no longer in the imperial service.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

tation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee parih, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standground purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his consideration and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Aurilla Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by
SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY
(Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE SENTIS.

LEFT were the busy quays, the street,
The alleys where the lindens meet,
The lilies on the convent pond,
The convent vanes that soared beyond.

High up the towering hill we stand,
Round us the hush of fairy land ;
Sheer down beneath our feet outlay
The town, the cape, the crescent bay ;

The sombre haze of Baden's wood,
The brimming lake's broad gleaming flood,
Bavaria's long low purple line,
The gentle inflow of the Rhine ;

And bosky Austrian headlands steep
That pushed into the rippling deep ;
While southward far swelled high o'er all
The Vorarlberg's grey battered wall.

Then on we panted, keen to gain
The goal that crowns the climber's pain ;
An opening in the pines, and lo !
The Sentis, with its cone of snow !

Across deep leagues of limpid air,
How close it looked ! how ghostly fair !
A silent vision to bring tears
Of rapture through the ebbing years.

The pink flush fades as back we go,
And cold winds from the glaciers blow.
We parted : I passed on in haste,
'Neath roaring fall and frozen waste,

Through valleys bleached with apple bloom,
By Thusis, and the gorge of gloom,
Swept sledge-borne o'er the Splugen wild
To lake-sides where the myrtle smiled ;

And breathed at last in gales of balm
Where by the blue wave dreams the palm,
And sighted, sixty miles away,
Peter's white peak in Corsica.

Yet ever with me, snow-besprent,
The phantom of the mountain went,
Lofty and sad, a giant lone,
Spell-bound upon his stony throne.

I see it (as I saw it then),
Here by the burn in Sannox glen ;
Scarce sharper showed it that clear morn,
'Mid the weird realm of alp and horn.

EXECRATION ODE.

[FROM THE Balfuriad, A THRENODY IN THREE THROES.]

"The Coercion Act has now been for nearly three months in force, but it is only of late that Lanky-doodle Balfour has gone in for carrying out the first instalment of blundering brutality. . . . Even the imprisonment of our heroic leader, William O'Brien, has not brought what Balfour would swim in if he had a chance—blood ; for blood is all he desires."—Dr. Tanner's Speech at Kilmurry, November 6th, 1887.]

O LEAN, lackadaisical lizard,
Foul filcher of hats and of hose,
Till the comb from thy crest I have scissored,
May I ne'er breathe the balm of repose !
May the bitterest blast of the blizzard,
Thou green gosling, ferocious and fell,
Hurl thee cleft, and bereft of thy gizzard,
To the hearthstone of Hell !

O pasty-faced, pallid apostle
Of deviltry, death and deceit,
Who with calumnies coarse and colossal
Conspirest our cause to defeat ;
Blood-boltered, fanatical fossil,
In gore thou wouldst gleefully float,
Couldst thou wring like the neck of the throistle
Every Parnellite throat.

Base booby beloved of Boodle's,
False shepherd of Salisbury's flock,
Crown Prince of contemptible poodles,
Demi-devil of Satan's own stock,
O Nincompoop ! nuldest of noodles,
Fierce fiend with the fatuous face,
To the limbo of limp "lanky-doodles"
Get thee gone in disgrace.

Long lamp-lighter, lorn of thy ladder,
Vile, voluptuous ventriloquist,
Thou art making us madder and madder,
'Neath the gripe of thy finical fist.
Art thou deaf, thou detestable adder ?
Hath thy hide no susceptible spot ?
Wilt thou prick the great Parnellite bladder,
Thou saturnine Scot ?

Peace, peace ; the forked tongue of our foemen
Commands not one adequate curse,
One sufficiently savage agnomen,
To hiss o'er thy horrible hearse.
Yet may owls of uncanniest omen
Croon coronachs over thy corse,
While I prance on thy prostrate abdomen,
And howl myself hoarse.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

THE Girl of the Period as painted by contemporary satirists, is no myth after all, if it is, as a London Correspondent reports, that the Sporting Times under the pet name of the "Pink 'Un" is more largely patronised by ladies than gentlemen.

THE late Raja Bishen Purgash Narain Singh, of Sursur, made over Rs. 10,000 to Government to endow his school at Ajudhia. He also built the Fyzabad dispensary. And now we are glad to observe his worthy son-in-law Babu Hari Harinder Sahai offers Rs. 5,000 towards a Female Ward for this Dispensary.

PRINCE KAMR KADR, of whom His Majesty Wajid Ali Shah was ashamed and would not permit him to come within the precincts of his Palace, has, consequent upon his recognition by Government as the eldest son of the late King of Oudh, been granted the privilege of private entrée to Government House. The irony of history could no further go.

THE Army and Navy Gazette draws attention to the following promotion recorded in the London Gazette :—

"7th Hussars.—Serjeant the Hon. Roger Archibald Percy North, from the 1st Dragoons, to be Second Lieutenant, in succession to Lieutenant G. T. Birch, transferred to the Royal Scots (Lothian Regiment)."

and adds—

"Second Lieutenant North is by no means the first scion of a noble house who has gone through the ranks to a commission in these competitive days, the Hon. R. H. Westera having obtained his commission in 1880 in the 9th Lancers from the rank of serjeant."

THE following questions were submitted to the Attorney-General :—

"May a Barrister advise and otherwise act for the outside client, and receive a fee direct, without the intervention of a Solicitor? To what extent, if at all, is this right limited after a writ has been issued? Is there any minimum limit to the fee which a counsel may charge in non-contentious business?"

The Attorney-General answered :—

"The matters to which you refer are not governed by any written rule, but by the practice and traditions of the profession which have been recognised from time immemorial. With reference to contentious business, in my opinion, neither before nor after litigation is commenced should a Barrister act or advise without the intervention of a Solicitor. . . . As regards non-contentious business the case is, in my opinion, somewhat different. Speaking generally, there is, in my opinion, no objection to a Barrister seeing and advising a lay client without the intervention of a Solicitor upon points relating to the lay client's own personal conduct, or guidance or the management or disposition of his own affairs or transactions. As regards the fees in cases in which counsel are willing to advise a lay client on the circumstances to which I have referred, I know of no rule beyond this, that no junior should accept a fee of less than £1-3-6, and no leader less than £2-4-6."

THERE has lately been a rather disgraceful squabble between the Chief Justice and Governor of Western Australia. The latter censured the Judge for keeping, for an unduly long time, sundry petitions from prisoners praying for remission of sentence. The former asserted his right to keep these documents as long as he deemed fit. Thus an angry and bitter controversy ensued between the two magnates. The Chief Justice had the Governor's letters to him on the subject, frivolous and harrassing as he regarded them, published in the local newspapers, and the Governor replied by suspending the Chief Justice. The matter now went up, in appeal from both parties, to the Privy Council. That body took prodigious time over this urgent matter. After more than eight months' consideration it censured both parties, but directed the reinstatement of the Chief Justice. The judgment reaffirms the principle that Crown Colony Judges are irremovable except for misconduct of a moral character or connected with their judicial duties.

THE Births, Deaths, and Marriages Registration Act, 1886, comes into operation on the first day of October, 1888.—The Gazette of India of the 21st publishes the rules under Sections 26, 28, and 36 of the Act.

IN supersession of previous orders regarding State messages, it has now been ruled that

"(1) When it is not necessary that a reply (by post or wire) should be despatched within office hours of the same day, the message should be sent 'deferred.'

(2) When it is considered essential that a reply should be sent the same day, the message should be sent 'ordinary.'

(3) 'Urgent' messages should be used only—

(a) in cases of real emergency;

(b) in cases where the despatching officer knows that the line is for any reason blocked, and considers his message sufficiently important to take precedence of ordinary traffic.

(4) Telegrams should, except when extreme precision is important, be expressed in as few words as are consistent with clearly conveying the intended meaning; and mere auxiliary or connective words, which can obviously be filled in by the receiver, should be omitted."

MR. MARSDEN, the Chief Town Magistrate, has recorded the following opinion in the child-wife torture case :—

"In this case, prosecutrix, Hem Coomaree Dasse, an intelligent child, states that she is eleven years of age, and that the accused Mukhan Lall Addy is her husband, Gour Mohun Addy is his brother, and Koosoom Coomaree Dasse is her mother-in-law. She says that on the 22nd June last, her mother-in-law complained of the manner in which she had cooked the food, and assaulted her several times during the day with a wooden bolt, and the child shows the Court marks of bruises, on her body. She goes on to say that at about 10 P. M., Hem Coomaree made her lie down, and her husband, Mukhan Lall Addy, tied her hands and feet, and Gour Mohun Addy gagged her; that Koosoom Coomaree Dasse brought some fire in an earthen pot, heated an iron ladle, and branded her with it on several parts of her body, and also on her face. When first burnt, the girl states that she screamed out, and that it was on this that she was gagged by Gour Mohun Addy. When the cloth was removed from her mouth, she again seems to have screamed, when the accused told her to be quiet, or they would brand her again. On the 26th June, four days after she was branded, Hem Coomaree made her escape to her brother's house, and complained of the treatment she had received, and showed the marks on her body; and on the 30th of June, she was examined by a medical man, who states that the marks are marks of burns beyond all doubt. The delay in instituting this case is explained by Hem Coomaree's brother, Gopeenath Dutt, who says that it was not intended to prosecute the accused, but Gour Mohun Addy came with a band of latials to take Hem Coomaree away by force, and consequently it was necessary to institute proceedings for the protection of the girl. The girl's statement as to what occurred on the night of the 22nd June is confirmed (as far as confirmation is possible in such cases) by the evidence of Bhoothnath Dey, who lives opposite to the accused's house, and Gopalchunder Dey, who went to visit him on the night in question. Both of these witnesses state that, on the night in question, they heard screams in a female voice, coming from the accused's house, and Bhoothnath states that he heard the voices of the accused, whom he has known all their lives, calling out to some one to keep quiet. I see no reason to doubt the evidence of these men. It has not been attempted to show that there was any ill-feeling between them and the accused: on the contrary, they seemed to have lived on good terms together. The most peculiar feature in this case is that, beyond the plea of 'not guilty,' recorded on behalf of each of the accused, there appears to be no defence whatever; on the contrary, the gentleman who appeared for the accused admitted that the girl, Hem Coomaree, had been ill-treated, but submitted, firstly, that the ill-treatment was not of such a serious nature as the Court seemed to consider it; and secondly, that it would be unsafe to convict on the evidence which the prosecution had adduced, and at one stage of the case, Baboo Kali Nath Mitter (the gentleman appearing for the accused) stated, in open Court, that if I was disposed to take a lenient view of the offence that had been committed, his clients were willing to plead guilty to the charge. Hem Coomaree was not cross-examined as to the occurrences on the night of the 22nd June, and the pleader for the prosecution stated that it was for this reason he did not consider it necessary to call the girl's brother as a witness, to speak to the injuries he saw on her body when she returned to his house. It was elicited in cross-examination that the girl had, on a former occasion, obtained a summons against her mother-in-law, but she had been induced to withdraw that case, on her mother-in-law promising to treat her well in future. Hem Coomaree appeared in Court with her hair cut short, which she stated had been done by her mother-in-law. The poor girl appears to have undergone systematic ill-treatment at the hands of the accused, which culminated on the 22nd June in branding her with a red-hot iron in the manner she has described. It appears to me that it would be difficult to find a more brutal and inhuman case. Here is a girl of only eleven years of age, who appears to have been not only the house drudge, and performed all the work of the house, but to have been subjected to systematic ill-treatment by the three adult members of the household, one of whom is her husband; and finally, taking advantage of her tender age and helplessness, they seize her, tie her hands and feet, and brand her with a hot iron, on the pretext apparently that she had not cooked the food entirely to their liking. I should not be doing my duty did I not inflict a severe penalty on the accused, and I consider them all equally guilty. The sentence of the Court is that each of the accused do undergo two years' rigorous imprisonment."

Served right! Long as this judgment is for our columns, its practical importance—its bearing on that subject of anxious difficulty, in India, the domestic life of Indians—impels us to reproduce it in extenso. For the same reason, we cannot dismiss it cavalierly. As it would be shocking to the very senses to prolong this item by piling comments on the news, we refer the reader to the leading columns.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THERE was a grand review at Krasno-Selo on the 21st before the two Emperors—of Germany and Russia. Forty thousand troops had assembled.—The Emperor William has gone over to Stockholm.

THERE is disturbance in Natal. A Capetown telegram of the 26th says:—

"Commander Grobelaar at the head of a Boer force has invaded Khama's territory and fought the natives. Mr. Sheppard, the Deputy Commissioner of the protected territories, has been ordered to proceed to the spot in order to inquire into the affair, and President Kruger has been invited also to send a delegate. The Government has directed Sir Hercules Robinson to intimate to the Transvaal Government that the Matabele, Mashuda, and Makaleka countries, as well as the northern portion of Khama's territory up to the river Zambesi, are under British influence."

MR. JAMES O'KELLY, M. P. for Roscommon, was arrested in London, on the 25th, and conducted to Dublin—for making a speech inciting to a breach of the law. He has since been released on bail.

DURING the week, the British House of Commons asserted its right of punishing its members for outrage committed outside the House. At the instance of Lord Randolph Churchill, supported by Mr. Gladstone, the House has suspended Mr. Conybeare, M. P. for Camborne, for one month—for some correspondence published in the Star grossly libelling the Speaker in connection with his ruling permitting the closure during a debate on the Irish Drainage Bill.

THE Bill appointing a Commission of Judges to enquire into the charges made by the Times against Mr. Parnell, has passed the second reading without a division. The Commission will consist of Sir James Hannen (President), Sir John Day, and Sir Montague E. Smith. Mr. Parnell denounced the Bill, stigmatising it as cowardly and un-English.

He feared that it gave the Judges authority to enquire into the whole agitation of the League instead of only into his own conduct and that of other M. P.'s. He wished the charges to be specified, and concluded by accusing Government of collusion with the Times. Mr. Chamberlain believed Mr. Parnell was innocent, and suggested payment by the state of the costs of the successful party.

So the Home Ruler-in-Chief has been caught in his own trap. Perhaps, the language is unsympathetic towards a patriot who, wisely or unwisely, purely or impurely, is struggling for his country's independence, or even unjust, in the present matter, but that is certainly what his opponents will say. In a weak moment, Mr. Parnell, chafing under his exposure in the Times case, called for a Select Committee of the House of Commons to set himself right. That was creditable to his honor; it was not the bearing of conscious guilt. But it was weak nevertheless, and strange on the part of a cool-headed politician who has all along resisted the demands on him to go to court for his vindication. It was singularly imprudent for the party chief of a minority to make what amounted to an appeal for sympathy of his enemies. Mr. Parnell of all men should have known the risk of giving them a possible opportunity of turning their majority to his prejudice. And so it has turned out. At first, the leader of the House, with ingenuousness equal to his own, referred Mr. Parnell to the courts, but later, at the instance of more astute colleagues, he offered him a Commission of Judges. Till the Government disclosed their hand, Mr. Parnell was not prepared to accept the machinery. This was virtually declining the offer with thanks. It was too late. Parliament was not to be trifled with, and he must be in for it, for better for worse. The Government saw their advantage and pursued, protests notwithstanding. Mr. Parnell's evident anxiety to get out of it only supplied an additional incentive. What was the use of that uncertain thing a large Parliamentary majority, if the utmost was not to be made out of it so long as it lasted? Hence the Bill which has been read a second time without a division. There may be a struggle yet in Committee, but the Bill is safe.

Mr. Chamberlain, as an independent ally of the Government, acted a generous part which might go somewhat to the credit of his new friends in the way of removing the impression of animus. He could well afford to avow his belief in Mr. Parnell's innocence, so far as the particular letters are concerned. His suggestion that the state should reimburse the costs of the successful party was simply just. He might have gone farther. The state should bear the whole costs. There ought to be express provision in the Bill. The novelty of the procedure in fairness requires it. It is bad enough for members of Parliament to be dragged against their will into unpleasant enquires touching their character and prospects, if not affecting more serious interests. Surely, they ought not to be mulcted in addition. There may be reasons of state for the one, but none for the other. If Parliament thinks it necessary to enter on such an investigation, the country ought to pay for it and for all parties who may be put to any necessary expense on that account.

Mr. Parnell, in the course of his vehement denunciation, called the measure cowardly and un-English. It is not un-English, being very Home Ruler-like. The supporters of the Government might well retort that it was only by methods drawn from their practices that the Irish party of boycotting and intimidation and coercion could be met with any chance. That word un-English has a distinct meaning honorable to the English people. But it is too often loosely used in the silliest national vanity. No body of politicians would be frightened out of a deliberate step they thought necessary, by being told it was "cowardly" or "un-English." At most, these words mean base and unfair. But in political controversy, even in the British Parliament itself, specially since the Irish ascendancy of late years, language of grave import is exchanged. It was more to the purpose to insist that the charges should be specified, but that is a clever way of making the step infructuous. How could any distinct charges be formulated before the inquiry was made? Mr. Parnell might perhaps have reason to fear that the Bill gave the Judges power to inquire into the agitation of the League, but surely the state would be a gainer by a judicial inquiry into a subject of the highest importance. Probably, the Ministry have deliberately determined to utilise the opportunity offered by Mr. Parnell's own demand to have the mystery of the League unearthed. What is the harm? What have honest loyal citizens to fear? To our mind, there ought to have been a resort to such an organ long since, but Englishmen can usually act only upon set precedent and in the usual course of business. If it were not for that, probably the Ministry would have boldly avowed that width of scope of the present inquiry of which Mr. Parnell complains. We are now only afraid that the same shrinking from the logic of the situation and indisposition to pursue legitimate objects, in a legitimate way, independent of meaningless forms and obstructive technicalities, may yet defeat the important end in view.

DR. MACKICHAN, Principal of the Free General Assembly's Institution, succeeds Sir Raymond West as Vice-Chancellor of the Bombay University. The appointment has taken the public by surprise, the Scotch educationist having entered the Syndicate only a few months back and by a very narrow majority. It is admitted, however, that the Vice-Chancellor designate is a great scholar and good business man. Before Lord Reay lays down office, we expect him to give us the satisfaction of a native appointment. It would be a just recognition of the claims of the large and growing class of educated Natives. There are many on that side who would fill the honorary office with honor. The Western sky is illumined by a whole galaxy of brilliant orbs—the Mandliks, Mehtas, and Malabaris, the Telangs and Tyebjis, and at least half a dozen more. Madras too is rich enough, and more than once a native gentleman of attainments and position has there discharged with distinction the office of academic Chief. Bengal is barren to a degree. Notwithstanding our glib tongue and fatal facility of pen, we have, with almost one exception, scarcely a man who with an adequate position has given pledges of capacity to justify his selection for the two-year dignity. But poor Dr. Rajendralala Mitra has been strangely neglected for years, until now it is too late. He would have been better made Vice-Chancellor of the University for a term than created a life-long Raja. But the ways of Government are—their own.

THE Morning Post writes—

"The Madrassis are promised a sensation. Mr. White, the President of the Eurasian and Anglo-Indian Association, has a bete noir in the person of Mr. J. R. Upshon, who is not single in his opinion that Mr. White is a humbug. The President has been mercilessly exposed, and finding he cannot retaliate effectively with the pen, has resolved to resort to the sword. Like General Boulanger, he hopes to rehabilitate himself in the eyes of his admirers. Like the general, he may find that it is for him to propose and for Mr. Upshon to dispose."

Except for the concluding touch of blasphemy, that is well-expressed, though it discovers the inspiration of the old Allahabad foe of President White. The feuds of the Eurasians' friends and patrons neither make White Black nor Black White. Whatever offence the venerable and devoted head of the Eurasian and Anglo-Indian Association may have given to individual ambitions or susceptibilities, it will be news to most that the pure and noble White is a humbug. Could the force of perversity farther go? Amid endless difficulties, making allowance for all disappointments, Mr. White has done more good to the cause of the Eurasian, East Indian and poor Whites, without making war upon the poor natives, than any other man in his generation.

It is amusing to see the extreme tenderness of our contemporary for Mr. Allen, the principal proprietor of the Pioneer. In reproducing an extract from the Evening News of this city, it was careful to strike out an offensive reference to that gentleman. Not content with that service, our contemporary next morning reminds him of it, as though the object of the courtesy might by any chance overlook the matter, and then appeals to the rest of the press to do likewise. Says the new Allahabad journal:—

"We know Mr. Allen only as a generous, kindly-dispositioned gentleman."

We have not the honor of knowing the Prince of the Press in India, and have no idea how he will receive all these attentions. He may possibly blush to find his amiableness fame. Be that as it may, not many fellahs will understand how it all comes about. Considering that the Morning Post was started to the injury of the Pioneer, it no doubt must strike them as queer, this sort of officious soft sawdery of the "boss" and master of the rival concern. The mystery would be a good deal cleared up, if it be the fact, as we have reason to believe, that Mr. Allen is also a large shareholder in the new concern. Mr. Allen knows his business.

THE Honorable Syud Ameer Hossein has been lucky in obtaining extension of his office as Additional Member of the Imperial Legislative Council for another term.

There is so little room in the Viceregal Chamber that we hold re-appointment a mistake, except in the case of a representative man of weight like Maharaja Jotindro Mohan Tagore or one of rare capacity for debate like the late Kristodas Pal. There are as good fish in the water as any fished up by the rather exclusive caste of Indian official fishermen, and in the public interest these ought to have the chance of being tackled and hauled up on board the Legislative Ark. After that caveat on principle, we are free to concede that it is creditable to the Government of India to show their favour to a native subordinate official—belonging to the despised Uncovenanted—who, in his capacity of Senator, has shown such independence. Syud Ameer Hossein voted against all the most important official measures of Government that were brought before the Council during the last Calcutta Session. Those measures were the outcome of the deliberate Financial Policy of the Viceroy in Council, on which the members of the Supreme Executive Council might be expected to be sore, and on which indeed the Viceroy himself spoke in the Legislative Chamber with so much earnestness. It was no joke for poor Meer Ameer Hossein to say Nay to the Viceroy in the Viceroy's face. What is he—he might well argue—a mere Deputy Magistrate, glad enough to be a fixture in the capital, over the heads of so many of his brethren, to give himself such airs? As a servant of Government, he is expected, more than any outsider, to appreciate the exigencies of the State and sympathise with Government in its difficulties. As for the rest, what does he, his life passed in the administration of criminal law, understand the mysteries of Indian Finance that he should put his opinion against that of experts and pretend to judge between Government and opposition. Indeed, of opposition there was vastly little, beyond his own. There was a strange and almost ominous unanimity on the most debatable subjects which have been even the bone of fruitful contention. The representative of commerce himself supported the Income Tax. Not so the Mussulman Deputy Magistrate member. He not only voted against the Income Tax, but also against the Salt Tax. When member after member gave his sanction to the Bill which might have the effect of depriving the mute masses and dumb cattle of their modicum of the essential condiment, when not only Raja Peary Mohun Mookerjee of Bengal warmly approved but also Sir Dinshaw Pettit of Bombay asserted, it required some assurance in Mr. Ameer Hossein to depart from such eminent example. When the precarious tenure of his service is considered, his rashness may be rightly estimated. In another part of our paper, it will be seen how an irate Governor of a self-governing British Colony dismissed the Chief Justice on a petty difference of opinion. What is a Deputy Magistrate in India in comparison to the highest judicial dignitary in a Crown Colony? He is at the mercy of dozens of European superiors between the Viceroy and himself. He has no Privy Council to appeal to.

Of course, his independence is due to the encouragement of the Viceroy. He ventured on it in pure reliance on the justice by Government, particularly from his confidence in the liberality of Lord Dufferin. His reappointment gives the seal to that confidence. It is the most convincing proof of the Viceroy's political liberality and personal openness.

NOTHING like luck, and a lucky lady indeed is Langtry. She was to begin with, born with that supreme possession of woman—beauty. But well-favoured as she was, in person, she was still better favoured by the world. The observed of all observers, she was the admired of the rank and fashion of the day. Their leader the Prince of Wales confessed her fascination. With Mrs. Cornwallis West, she long shared the position of the Beauty of the Period. It is an enviable position. It gave her command over the highest and best, certainly introduced her and enshrined her in the very sanctum sanctorum of fashion, to which neither her own birth nor her husband's position could obtain her admission. Yet that position is not without its drawbacks. It is essentially unfavourable to health, moral and physical. To be a court lady—one of the leading beauties in the Prince of Wales'—is a difficult part to play consistently with honour. Not the least of its disadvantages is the drain on one's resources and substance. The wealthiest and most amply aced find the strain too much. Mrs. Langtry simply ruined her husband. But even in her loss of fortune her guardian deity stuck to her. She did not lose heart. But what is more to the point, her success at court had not lost her mind beyond redemption. She struggled for sometime to keep herself afloat, but it was in vain. Then, facing the inevitable, she set in genuine earnest to devise a method of deliverance. It seemed to lie before her.

As a fashionable lady, she was an actress. She had probably played at private theatricals before her entrance at court. There she was accustomed to a leading part on the stage within the stage of royal society. The Prince of Wales spoke highly of her acting and everybody saw in it perfection. Here, then, was a profession chalked out for her, and she had the courage to betake to it. Her success was extraordinary for an amateur, but her friends loyally contributed to it. And then, while the sensation of a leading court beauty's going to the stage was still fresh, she crossed over to America, the continent of silver mountains and the land of republican reverence for royalty and aristocracy. There her reception was characteristic—almost fabulous. Her stay was a continued triumph. Dollars poured upon her like tropical rain. In the space of a few months, she had recovered her lost ground, in the goods of the world.

That was as good as might be hoped for. But she did better. One day she took train to the West. Luck dogged her in the person of a broker who offered her in the train the purchase of a moiety of a mountain supposed to be rich in minerals. She declined the proffer, naturally enough, as not understanding the matter. Her Luck—the fellow-passenger—would take no refusal. He argued and represented and painted in glowing colours the prospects of mining the estate and its other advantages, the salubrity of the hills and their various industrial capabilities. Above all, it was going cheap. The feminine heart was touched by the last appeal, in particular. At length she showed signs of wavering. The attack was maintained. Another hundred miles and she surrendered at discretion. Before the end of her journey, Mrs. Langtry, without advice of lawyer or business-man, had become owner by purchase of a mountain. To another it might have proved the veritable mountain in labor. For Mrs. Langtry it turned out an Argentine hoard. A silver mine was discovered. For a few thousand dollars Mrs. Langtry found herself among the Mackays.

THE case of MOHENDRA NATH CHATTERJEE of this city, well known for his musical accomplishments, who has been convicted at the last Sessions on a charge of forgery of Government Notes, has already been alluded to. Its general importance and especial interest in Calcutta calls for a more extended notice. For months, there had been rumours in the neighbourhood that forgery was going on in his house, but the Police seemed to be in blissful ignorance. At length, some notes presented in the market by some Cabulees were traced to him. So, armed with the necessary powers, the Police rushed into the house, and Mohendro, obese Sybarite though he was, rushed out of it, escaping by the back, by jumping into a neighbour's house. Materials of a suspicious character were found on the premises, including a quantity of forged notes. He did not however evade the warrant issued for his arrest. Under advice, he arrived in a closed conveyance at the Police Court gate for surrendering himself to the court, but being observed he was arrested on the warrant and let out on bail. The Police had also proceeded against the other male members of the family, but the Hon'ble Magistrate of the Northern Division found no case against them and properly discharged them. The High Court was then moved by the Advocate-General against the discharge, and the Crown obtained a rule why the others who had been let off should not be committed likewise. At the hearing of the rule, the Advocate-General appeared for the Crown and Mr. Lal Mohun Ghose for the four discharged. The Baboo argued against the rule being made absolute. He pointed out that there was no evidence against his clients of a criminating nature, and was even prepared to shew that there was no case to go to the Jury, the mass of evidence tendered only proving that Mohendra Nath Chatterjee had passed certain Notes alleged to be forged. Mr. Ghose, with his knowledge as a Hindoo, laid much stress on the joint family system, saying that—“it would be extremely dangerous in this country if one member of a joint family happened to be a scapegrace, to presume that the other members of the family were criminals as well from the fact that certain suspicious articles were found on a police search in the house. This was a dangerous doctrine in a case which would go before a jury. There was absolutely nothing as evidence to connect these men with the offence except the fact that they were living in the house.

The Chief Justice.—There was a machine in use in the house, and one of the accused was an engraver. Living together as they did, they would, under the circumstances, know all that was going on in the house, and that was a strong presumption against them.

The Advocate-General.—Some of the blocks found were lying all about the rooms, and the engravings on them any one might have read.

The Chief Justice, after some further arguments on the part of Mr. Ghose, said that this was a case in which, at that stage of the proceedings, all that it was necessary to say was that they thought there was sufficient evidence before the Magistrate to render it his duty to place those four persons on the trial at the Sessions, on charges under sections 472 and 475 (Criminal Procedure Code, having in possession implements for the purposes of forgery.) The Magistrate would therefore be directed to commit them for trial on the above charges.

An application for bail was refused.”

The desire of the Crown lawyers to string the whole lot together was but natural and legitimate. The Advocate-General's bearing was dignified. No one knows the peculiarities of our domestic life better than Sir Gregory Paul, and we are bound to acknowledge that, in opposing them, he did not scout the objection taken in behalf of the brothers and sons.

Mr. Ameer Hossein accordingly committed the two sons and the two brothers to take their trial along with Mohendro. At the sessions, Mr. Allen defended Mohendra and Mr. Lalmohun Ghose the sons and brothers. The trial commenced on Monday the 16th and lasted four days. The jury found Mohendra alone guilty, and the Judge Mr. Justice Wilson sentenced him to six years' hard labour. In his charge to the jury, speaking of the brothers and sons, the Judge remarked “that he did not think it likely that the jury could come to the conclusion that these prisoners were guilty of the offence of forging these notes, but it might be that they might think that there was a case against them to establish the charge of abetting the forgery, and of abetting the first prisoner in making improper use of forging implements. Practically it seemed to his Lordship that the charges against these four prisoners, if any could be sustained against them, came round to the charge of abetting in the forgery, or abetting in the use of forged notes, or else of the charge of possessing or being in the possession of forged notes and implements for forgery. The main question was how far they could be said to have been in the possession of these things, the possession of which indicated guilt. His Lordship pointed out the difference in the position of the two brothers of the accused and his two sons so far as possession of a joint family was concerned, went, and with reference to the fourth and fifth prisoners his Lordship thought it could not be said that they were in any way in possession of the house or the property in it. The case against them in his Lordship's judgment, was so slight, that though he did not feel justified in directing a withdrawal of the charges against them, still the jury would be taking a safe course in not bringing in these two men guilty.

At the conclusion of his Lordship's address the foreman of the jury intimated that the jury were anxious to have his Lordship's opinion in reference to the non-production of the three witnesses whom the prosecution had not called.

His Lordship observed that the jury must draw their own conclusions from that fact. On the one hand the prosecution were not bound to call witnesses who, they might have reason to believe, might prove hostile, and on the other hand this was a matter for fair comment on the opposite side.

The foreman said that the jury were anxious to have his Lordship's view on one point—Did the mere knowledge on the part of prisoners two to five that forgery was going on in the house, constitute the charge of abetting in the offence in addition to their taking no active part in the crime?

His Lordship remarked that on the abstract question, if prisoners two and three were in joint possession of the house with number one, and if they were conscious that forgery was going on in that house, the jury were justified in finding that they committed the crime of forgery. His Lordship was not prepared to answer this question in the same way with reference to the other two prisoners.”

The end is satisfactory. All the more so after the late miscarriages. What the result would have been had Mohendro purchased the cunning and Zid—the methodical madness—of another advocate, is an open question.

AFTER all, we are obliged to withhold our article on the case of domestic torture just decided by the Police, in order to make room for the information touching the provision for the poor expectant Oudh Begams, which reached us this evening, when two-thirds of the paper had been printed.

WE regret to record the death of Dr. Bhagaban Chandra Rudra, the leading practitioner of orthodox European medicine in the metropolis. He had a brilliant academical career. He not only passed with distinction through the Medical College, but, what was most extraordinary, maintained parallel courses of study, in arts and in medicine, and graduated in the former during his medical term. Leaving College, he established himself, in town, and soon rose to the highest practice. But he overworked himself, without giving himself any change of scene or climate. The death of his wife completed his ruin. He alienated his family, estranged his friends and abandoned or lost much of his practice, and finally fell into diabetes. That ended in carbuncle, which ended with life. He expired at 4 O'clock this afternoon, at the early age of 38. Though brought up in the old practice, he was none of the medical bigots of old, but open to light from all quarters. He observed the newer methods, and cultivated the society of Homœopaths and professors of Sanskrit medicine.

He was associated with Kaviraj Abinash Chundra in the conduct of the latter's Bengali medical periodical giving a view of the different indigenous and foreign systems.

IN our issue of the 7th July, we commented on the new rules regarding Benches of Magistrates. The Honorary Magistrates themselves have now taken up the question. They met at the Town Hall on Wednesday the 25th, under the presidency of old Mr. Manickjee Rustomjee, the business of the evening being introduced by Mr. S. E. J. Clarke of the Chamber of Commerce. They passed some resolutions and fixed upon a Committee to give shape to their objections to the rules in a representation to the local Government. The Honorary Magistrates sometimes exhibit a weakness on the Bench which is lamentable, and the open association of a strong man—not a Magistrate—will only heighten the contempt of the public for the Magistrate. Mr. Marsden has been guided no doubt by the best of motives, but we are afraid he has taken the wrong way to remedy the evil. The true course would be to weed the great Unpaid.

AFTER the interval of some years, Raja Doorga Charan Law has again been invited to the Viceroy's Legislative Council. He steps into the place of Raja Peary Mohan Mookerjee, who goes out by lapse. Raja Doorga Charan is a quiet gentleman, who has made a princely fortune in prudent mercantile pursuits and lucky speculation, and is besides being a great fund-holder and owner of metropolitan house property, a large Zemindar. He might certainly give Government valuable information on subjects of his life-long familiarity. How badly Government needs cultivating such members of the community, was disclosed in the last Calcutta season, in connection with the Bills in Finance in Council.

We may take this opportunity of correcting a double mistake committed by a correspondent, touching the Raja's last connection with the legislature. He was promptly taken to task by another valued friend. We intended to have added our own testimony in support, but forgot to do so. It did not matter, though. Now we are speaking of the Raja, we are glad to say a word. The first correspondent, in attacking the Raja on the ground of his having supported the Ilbert Bill, evidently meant that he opposed the Criminal Jurisdiction Bill which essayed to confer on native Magistrates power of trying accused Europeans. The Raja did no such thing. At the early stage of the Bill, before the European community responded to Lord Ripon's virtual invitation to opposition, he, in brief terms, gave his support to the Government measure. That was all. That, at any rate, does not furnish matter for reproach against him by our young patriots.

HAVING taken so much interest in the cause of Jain Law for the Jains, we have much pleasure in laying before our readers, in another part of this paper, authoritative dicta in that Law drawn from original sources—old MSS. of Jain legists and commentators—and translated by the most competent Jain scholar in Bengal. So many cases are cropping up in these days in the Courts between members of the commercial and thrifty community of the Jain Sect, that the publication cannot but be welcome to our numerous readers in the profession of the law and among judicial officers. Hence we do not grudge the large space taken up.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, JULY 28, 1888.

REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMISSION.

THE Report of the Finance Committee, with its continuation by the Finance Commissioner, has been for some time before us. We have looked into it, and we must say that it will not be the Committee's fault if adequate success does not reward its labors. The manner in which the work has been done by the Committee cannot but be regarded with satisfaction by the Government of India. The instructions of the Government to the Committee left no room for mistake as to the urgent need for effective retrenchment of expenditure, and the earnest desire felt by the Government that the work should be done in a thorough-going manner. On the part of the Committee there appears to have been the fullest sympathy with their instructions. The work is no doubt essentially of an ungracious character, but "the circumstances, in which the Government now finds itself placed, compel it to examine with renewed and anxious attention the possibilities of such an effective decrease in its expenditure as shall, in a sensible degree, contribute to relieve it of the financial embarrassments with which it is threatened." Such is the earnest tenor of the Government Resolution appointing the Committee, and the Committee's report makes it also clear that they have given a hearty response to their orders.

Notwithstanding, however, the best efforts of the Committee to discharge their duty in a spirit of full sympathy and co-operation with the Government of India, it is doubtful whether the net result of those efforts, is at all commensurate with the exigencies of the case. The work, as we have said, is essentially of an ungracious character. The most powerful vested interests are naturally arrayed against it. It is scarcely any wonder, therefore, that, at the very threshold of their work, the Committee met with a check. The Resolution of the Government appointing the Committee directed them "to examine thoroughly the subject of the home charges" with especial regard "to the division of the military charges between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of India," and to "advise the Government of India whether the present distribution of these charges seems to call for revision, and, if so, what are their practical recommendations on the subject." The Government of India had already, however, excluded the cost of the India Council and India Office from the Committee's purview, but this limitation was apparently not enough for the Secretary of State. That supreme authority imposed further limitations, and the home charges were likewise excluded from the scope of the Committee's enquiries. To this restriction, let us add the original restrictions imposed under orders of the Government of India itself, and the field of the Committee's enquiries will appear small enough. They were debarred from taking notice of expenditure sanctioned by the Secretary of State, which, explained more specifically afterwards, meant that they were "not empowered to propose any change in the organic structure of the Administration;" and that "an enquiry into the status of the Governors of Madras and Bombay, the general question of the salaries of the Civil Service, and questions relating to the system of issuing Government loans and to concessions or guarantees given to Railway Companies, were beyond the field of their enquiries."

As the Committee in their report observe, these orders placed considerable restrictions on their functions. But this was not the whole drawback. In the procedure adopted by them, they seem to have been often thwarted by several of the Departments which were consulted in course of their operations, or at any rate, they do not seem to have received the co-operation and help without which such operations must more or less be ineffective. From the very nature of the work of a Committee for the reduction of established expenditure, it is inevitable that they can only proceed upon information regarding that expenditure as well as the routine and distribution of work in practice supplied by the Departments. This is the only possible procedure, and this was adopted. Circulars were addressed to the various Governments and the subordinate Departments of Government, calling for the necessary information, but they do not appear to have in all cases elicited a prompt response. The Military authorities in some cases appear to have treated the requisitions of the Committee with indifference, and the Committee had not received replies from some of the Departments up to the time of their report. This may be taken as an indication of the kind of scant support which the Committee must generally have met with in the prosecution of their enquiry, and it is but fair to infer that this circumstance has necessarily had its effect upon the character of their work.

To determine the net value of the work of the Committee, we should further remember that the recommendations for retrenchment of expenditure, which the Committee, working within a circumscribed sphere, and under all their restrictions and disadvantages, have at last been able to submit for the consideration of the Government, make no claim to finality. They are but the Committee's recommendations, which the Government of India can only carry out after another series of more or less protracted consultations with the Subordinate Governments, Administrations, Departments and other authorities. These are the authorities affected by the Committee's recommendations, and we may well expect they will offer a stout resistance to their being accepted. These consultations have already begun, and we have already had some specimens of the fighting which the retrenchment scheme of the Finance Committee must encounter all along the line. The remnant of economies which may survive the inevitable havoc of such a protracted and stubborn struggle will, for aught we know, be disappointment itself, and another illustration of the inherent futility of the economist's task in a prodigal household.

The most tangible results of the Committee's enquiries, however, are to be found in their revision of the Provincial Contracts. The total of the savings suggested by them under this head amounts to about seventy lacs of rupees, which, with the unavoidable frittering away of the amount which may take place under a process of mutual resistance between the Imperial and the Local Governments, may still stand at half a crore. The other economies recommended in various branches of the Provincial expenditure, and in the Imperial and Miscellaneous Departments bring up the whole of the savings suggested by the Committee to Rs. 1,28,47,000. There is no knowing, however, how much of this will be an actual relief to the Imperial Treasury. The Finance Commissioner's report with other subsidiary matters will be noticed hereafter.

THE LATE TORTURE CASE IN THE CALCUTTA POLICE.

OUR remarks have, we see, not gone for nothing. We are now glad to congratulate the readers of the Morning Post on the improvement that is visible in it of late. It was rather a canny concern. But it was from the start an interesting journal, varied in information. At most, however,

It rivalled all but Allen's print below.

There was not only obvious disparity between resources—the cash and connections—of the two concerns, but there was in the new venture a deficiency of literary talent rendered all the more glaring by weakness in the typographic supervision. Having in good part noticed the defect, we are bound to acknowledge the rectification. A change has come over our contemporary. There is a visible accession of literary power. The paper is no longer disfigured by solecisms, and it is actually smart. We have always observed our Anglo-Indian contemporaries pay more attention to our neighbour of the Indian Mirror's miseries and wrath than we natives care, or can afford, to do. The Post is no exception. And for an obvious reason. No other paper offers such a handle for ridicule of the natives and the native press in particular. Our native contemporary, among his many things, has a lamentable sense of proportion, which is easily utilisable for fun. So we find that the Allahabad writer has been counting the number and measuring the quantity of our neighbour's bucrubrations on a purely local subject. We had no idea that the late Torture case has been such a torture to our neighbour, as is disclosed in the following notice in the Morning Post :—

"The Indian Mirror having dissected the torture case in about a dozen instalments of three columns apiece comes to the conclusion that Mr. Lambert should be transferred, Dr. Mackenzie retired, Inspector Boyd (who has resigned) dismissed, and that everybody belonging to the thana in which the cruelty is alleged to have taken place should be punished severely. It is not suggested that the jury who acquitted the accused should be hanged, drawn and quartered, but that may come."

That is not bad of its kind. We are bound, however, to warn the reader against the sinister suggestion conveyed in the paragraph on the subject which has driven our susceptible neighbour to fits. The Mirror may have made too much of the matter. That is at most a mistake in the method of treatment—a mere question of taste. Surely, no one will seriously question the importance of the subject-matter. And dare the Post still talk of the torture in the Park Street Police station as a "cruelty alleged to have taken place." Even the stupid jury whom the Post would take under its protection, had no doubt of the occurrence. They found the fact of torture and only in their inscrutable sapience thought it may have been committed at the station by some "interlopers"—possibly Mr. Hyde, the master of the boy, to spite the poor inoffensive lambs of Lambert. And is the press so very unreasonable in pressing for adequate departmental punishment on the Police for such a scandalous abuse of office? What would our Allahabad contemporary have? Mr. Lambert made Inspector-General of Police and his myrmidous equally well provided, according to degree, as the result of the late revelations? It can scarcely be believed that the head of the metropolitan Force did not know of the practice obtaining in the Police. If that be seriously contended, it argues neglect and inefficiency in the head.

To our unofficial mind, the Mirror is singularly—not to say, strangely—moderate in its demands. It calls for the dismissal of only Boyd, the chief actor in the base business. If Boyd has resigned, so much the better for the Mirror and the public into the bargain. The Mirror is only justified by the resignation of the man responsible for what took place at his station, presumably at his dictation. Is it pretended that Boyd has "chucked up" his snug appointment in a huff? Boyd himself complains of being turned out—forced to resign. If he has not been formally dismissed, that was out of that tenderness for Europeans which is such a discreditable feature of this administration of India by Europeans alone. Personally, we have no disposition to make a grievance of this quiet shunting of the man. According to all precedents, it was Boyd's due. When high and mighty culprits are so tenderly dealt with, it were aggravation of the turpitude of partiality to make an example of a poor thing like Boyd and ease the disturbed conscience of administration by affecting undue scorn and indignation and heap coals on the luckless Police subaltern. The true object of moral passion is not the vulgar herd of subordinate limbs of the state machinery, but the opulent and well-educated magnates who cannot resist temptation and descend to falsehood and fraud, peculation and injustice, tyranny and torture. Not the Boyds but the Beauforts, Bucklands and Beameses, the Kirkwoods, Corderys and Crawfords, the Metcalfes and Meades, the thieves and adulterers and shady gentlemen of sorts in the higher Services whose name is legion. Let the Boyds depart in peace: we do not care. There is no danger in mercy to the poor uneducated. But if Government have any capacity for strict and passionate justice, let it be reserved for those who know better and do wrong, who can afford to be honest and yet fail in common decency. These are the legitimate subjects for passionate justice. Here, in this very case, as a subject of departmental inquiry, a greater responsibility attaches, in our mind, to the Chief of the Police than to the local station subordinate. And the Indian Mirror fails in correctly apportioning the dues between the two. Our contemporary is unconsciously guilty of the same tenderness towards the Brahmans of officocracy which we have been deprecating. It weakly lends itself to the very "dodge" of Bureaucracy of covering with protection from public rage an officer who has compromised himself by sending him to a safe distance for a time—to be received back with open arms after a time, when the short memory of the public has been exhausted on the subject and newer matters have absorbed the attention of the country. What is a transfer? Is it a punishment necessarily? Are not officials continually crying for transfers to their dear friends and loving patrons in the Secretariat?

PROVISION FOR THE EX-KING OF OUDH'S SERAGLIO.

We are at length enabled to lay before our reader authentic and precise information on the subject of the provision for the Seraglio of the late ex-King of Oudh. So many souls are interested in the subject, so many poor helpless beings are looking forward, in trembling hope and anxiety, to the justice of the British Government, that it really gives us satisfaction to be able to tell them that their cases have been considered and their stipends fixed. The subject is difficult, and the necessity of considering the claims of the entire body of Purda inmates of the vast Palace at Garden Reach caused delay. The women-folk of the late King are over two hundred strong, and they have been classed under 8 heads, according to their rank, and allowances. Between the 209 ladies, (including a discarded Begum,) under the several heads, an aggregate monthly disbursement of Rs. 11,049 has been sanctioned, as follows:—

PRIVILEGE OF LAWYERS.

Exclusion of Mooktears.

I know you are always ready to wield your powerful pen on behalf of the really aggrieved. I send you the following therefore and hope that you will draw the attention of the Government for its remedy. Lord Dufferin will, before he leaves India, surely do an act of justice to an important section of the society.

We muktears as a class suffer very much from an anomaly in the law which ought at once to be removed. The law on the subject of privileged communication is very imperfect. Section 126 of the Evidence Act (1 of 1871) provides: "No barrister, attorney, pleader, or vakeel, shall at any time be permitted unless with his client's express consent, to disclose any communication made to him in the course and for the purpose of his employment as such barrister, pleader, attorney or vakeel by or on behalf of his client, or to state the contents or condition of any document with which he has become acquainted in the course and for the purpose of his professional employment or to disclose any advice given by him to his client in the course and for the purpose of such employment." There is a proviso attached that this protection may not be taken advantage of for the furtherance of any illegal purpose or for concealing a crime or fraud. And by an explanation the obligation of the legal practitioners is made to continue after their employment has ceased. That such a provision is wholesome, regard being had to the interest of clients, particularly those who are accused of any offence, goes without saying. But the legislature for reasons best known to itself has deprived the muktears of its benefit, though nine-tenths of the people who resort to Courts of law, employ them. In all criminal Courts in the Mofussil, the Muktear, as a rule, is employed either to prosecute or defend a case, and even where the services of a barrister, pleader, attorney or vakeel are in requisition, it is to the muktear that the client first goes for advice. Now, under the present state of the law, the position of a muktear in the witness box—of course when he is retained by one party and is cited as a witness by the adverse one—is very critical. There may be facts communicated to him which when disclosed would go very much against his client. But there is no protection for him as the big folks have. He must either perjure himself or ruin the man who has paid him to advocate his cause and protect his interests. There had been, some time ago, a case here, in which a man was incarcerated for 3 months by the evidence of his muktear—the only evidence against him.

There is no earthly reason why this anomaly should exist. A ventilation of the subject in the Reis and Rayyet is sure to open the eyes of the legislators.

Tumlook.

WOMESH CHUNDER CHATTERJEA.

Baboo Womesh Chunder draws attention to a provision of the Evidence Act affecting the most numerous class of legal practitioners, and hits a real flaw in the law. We hope the subject will be taken up by the press.—ED. R. & R.

THE JAIN VYAVASTHA.

Questions answered by Sri Bala Chandra Gani Mandalacharya of Benares, Pandit Chaman Lal of Agra, Pandit Sibjilal Dharmadhiksha of Jeypur, and Pandit Raya Chandra Dharmadhikari of Azimgunge.

Q. I. Is the Svetambara Sect of Jains governed by Hindu law? If not, what are the differences between Hindu and Jain laws as regards inheritance and succession to property?

A. I. Neither the Svetambara nor Digambara sect of Jains is subject to the Institutes of Manu or Mitaxara, and there is much difference in their laws regarding succession and inheritance of sons and others. For while Manu and Mitaxara acknowledge the felicity of an unmarried virgin-born offspring, and those begotten upon twice married women, and their admissibility to a share of the inheritance, they are viewed as kundas and golakas or bastards and nullius filii by the Jains, and are entitled to no share, except getting their maintenance and clothing. As to the right of inheritance, the wife becomes the mistress of her husband's property, and in her absence the son, in whose absence the brother and then the brother's wife, and afterwards their sons. In default of these the sapinda (or one offering the funeral cake to the same ancestors), or a cousin to the seventh generation. In default of such the daughter and then her son, and in privation of them a bandbu or a cousin to the fourteenth degree of lineage. In want of these a gotragen and lastly one of the same tribe. In privation of all these the king employs (the wealth) in religious acts, as repairing of decayed temples and dedication of others. Thus it is ordained in the Jin-sambitā (Sanskrit) folium 30, stanzas 50 and 51.

1. "The wife, son, brother's sons, the sapinda, and then the daughter and her son, and then the bandbu, a gotragen, and one of the same race, are verily the owners of the property one after the other." (50) 2. "In want of these the ruler of the people employs (the wealth) in religious acts; and this is the order (of succession) both for one having or not having a son in all races (of men)." (51) So says the Indra-nandi-Sambitā (Prakrit) folium 13, stanzas 36 and 37. 3. "Whatever heirs there may be, the wife is the first, and then verily the son; next (to them) the brothers, and afterwards the daughter is acknowledged (as such). Stanza 36. 4. "After her a sapinda, and after him his accomplished daughter, and then the daughter's son; and next some bandbu, gotragen, or homogen of the tribe (becomes) owner of the property." Ibid 37. So also in the Arban-niti (Sanskrit) folia 27 and 28, stanzas 73 and 74. 5. "The wife and the son, brother's son and a sapinda, and (then) the daughter's sons, (next) the son of a bandbu or of the same gotra, becomes the alternate owner of the sua wealth." Stanza 73. 6. "In want of these the tribesmen, and in default of them the lord of the land, should make use of that wealth, by its employment in the paths of virtue." 74. So likewise says the Trivarnāchāra (Sanskrit) fol. 9 stanzas 53 and 54. 7. "The wife, the son, brother, or his daughter; a sapinda or his daughter and her son; a good relation, gotragen and a kinsman, are successive owners of the dead man's property." (53) 8. "In default of these, some one of the same tribe, should by order of the ruler, invest the dead man's property to religious purposes, or the ruler himself (do the same)." (54). From all these passages it is evident that the wife is the first heir (of the dead) contrary to the provisions of the Mitaxara.

Q. II. Does the widow of a deceased person represent her deceased husband in succession to collaterals?

A. II. After demise of the husband and his eldest son, the wife is empowered to take possession of the moveable and immovable properties in succession to her devars (leviri) husband's brothers and collaterals. Such is the saying of Gotama (Godama) himself cited in the Jin-sambitā fol. 54. 1. "An excellent wife inherits her husband's property, and has all the authority like the husband, whether there be a son in esse or non esse. So says the Arban-niti. (Sanskrit) fol. 27, stanzas 52 and 53. 2. "The husband being depraved, missing, or insane or mad, or an erratic ascetic, or dead, it is his excellent wife that becomes mistress of his entire property (in toto)." (52). 3. "The eldest wife who is well born and behaves well, and is able to support the family, becomes owner of the property in the manner of her husband, whether she has a son or not." (53). So also says the Indra-nandi Sambitā (Prakrit) fol. 12, stanza 16. 4. "The wife verily becomes the prime premier of her husband's divided and undivided estates, upon his being missing or dead or laid up by rheumatism or other disease, or becoming mad or insane." (16). The Trivarnāchāra says to the same effect. (Sanskrit) fol 16, st. 20 and 21. 5. "The wife becomes mistress of the property whether divided or otherwise, upon her husband's being missing or dead, or growing an idiot by bile and flatulence." (20). 6. "The eldest widow takes possession of the fields, dwelling house and corn, and of the biped and quadruped animals (of her husband), and supports her family and relatives therewith." (21).

Q. III. Does the widow succeed to the entire estate of her husband, whether ancestral or self-acquired, which he would have taken if alive although the same may not have actually vested in him during his life time; and notwithstanding that the deceased may have left sons and other male issues him surviving; and is she entitled so to succeed in preference to such sons and other male issue; if not fully, to what extent?

A. III. If the deceased has left a son or other male issue (behind him), still the widow is entitled to take possession of all properties which the husband has a rightful title to during his life time. So it is said in the Vribad-Arban-niti. (Prakrit), folium 31, page 2. 1. "On the husband's demise, the wife verily becomes mistress of his property; and whether there be a son or not, it is the widow (that becomes so)." There are many other texts and passages to the same effect.

Q. IV. According to the customs of the Svetambara Sect of Jains, do the sons or other male issue (if any) of the deceased, succeed after death of the widow to the estate, or his wife and others?

A. IV. The son of one's body must be master of the whole property after demise of his mother, and in the case of an adopted son he must be so likewise, should he have been adopted according to the law of the Jains, and the preliminary sacred rites inculcated therein. If not, he shall have nothing. So it is said in the Jin-sambitā on the subject of Adoption. (Sanskrit) folium 52, st 64. "A man becomes a father when he is regarded by five other men as such, and no man after demise of his own son can become a father by the mere verbal promise of another (to give him a son for adoption)."

Q. V. What persons can be adopted, and what sorts of adoption are to be deemed legal and valid?

A. V. First of all a brother's son, and next to him a relation, i. e., a boy to the seventh degree of lineage; after that a daughter's son, and then the son of a bandbu relative. In want of these a boy of the same gotra, in default of which a devar (levir) or husband's brother under the age of seven years. An adoption made in this way becomes valid. So says the Arban-niti. (Sanskrit) folium 27. Stanzas 54 to 64. 1. "First a brother's son, in want of whom the son of a relative (is to be adopted) whether he has received his purifications or not; and in want of these a daughter's son is taken (in adoption)." (54). 2. "In want of these to take the son of a bandbu relative, in lieu thereof a boy born of the same gotra or family may be taken, in default whereof to take the son of a brother of the husband, who may be a minor, and under seven years of age." (55). 3. "A widow having no son of her body, after taking (a boy as above) according to the rites of adoption, may place him in the concerns of her husband with the testimony of witnessess." (56.) The following are the rules of adoption. 4. "When a childless man or woman, takes an adopted son, he or she is then to take a writing from the parents &c., of the boy with testimony of witnessess." (58.) 5. "He is then to get it sealed by the ruling officer of the State, and signed by his relatives and kinsmen, whom he should courteously invite for the purpose." (59.) The ceremonies connected with the custom of adoption are described below: 6. "Then visit the Jaina temple with music and benedictory anthems of avidua or unwidowed women, and then make the sign svastica—cross emblematical of prosperity in the presence of Jina." (60.) 7. "Let him as he may, give gifts to the gurus or spiritual guides, and after paying his obeisance and presents, let him return to his abode." (61.) 8. "Having returned (home), let him perform the ceremony of child-birth by his household priest, whereby the people may say that he has begot a son." (62.) 9. "Then should betel-leaves and wood apples be distributed to the assembled men, and the wife pay her respects to her father and mother in law and all others, and present them with cloths and ornaments." (63.) 10. "By this he (the adopted son) gets his title to the shop, lands, dwelling house, and public offices like himself (or the adoptive father)." (64.) One adopted in this manner becomes an heir like the son of the body; mere words cannot make him so, as it is already shewn from the Jin-Sambhita on the subject of adoption.

Q. VI. Does the observance or non-observance of any particular ceremonies such as tonsure, &c., entitle an adopted son to succeed to the estates of both his natural and adoptive fathers?

A. VI. The Jain religion enjoins the ceremony of tonsure, but its observance is of no great efficacy, nor its neglect of any prejudice in cases of adoption. It is essential however on the part of the adoptive father to observe the ceremonies of child-birth and naming the boy anew, as shewn in our answer to the fifth question above.

Q. VII. Is an adopted son entitled in any case by the Jain law to succeed to both the estates left by his natural as well as adoptive Holloway's Pills and Ointment are remedies which should invariably be taken by travellers in search of health, pleasure or business. Many deleterious influences are constantly at work in foreign climes, tending to deteriorate the health; these and the altered conditions of life will entail on those who travel the necessity of carefully attending to early symptoms of disease, and they will find the use of these remedies to be highly necessary, the action of the Pills being purifying and strengthening and of great service in cases of fever, ague, and all inflammatory diseases, whilst the Ointment is a sovereign cure in cases of piles, bad legs, bad breasts, wounds and ulcers. Holloway's remedies do not deteriorate by change of climate.

fathers, and to do so during the existence of other collateral heirs of both these fathers in the manner of Dnyamushayana of Hindu law?

A. VII. The adopted son according to Jain law, is entitled to succeed to the estates left by both his fathers, during the existence of other collateral heirs who are not entitled to their succession. So it is said in the Niti samuchchaya. (Sanskrit) fol. 1, stanza 28. 1. "An adopted son of gentle manners, is entitled to succeed also his former (or natural) father leaving no other heir behind him." So also in the Darma-rabaya (Sanskrit.) 2. "The adopted son is entitled to get the wealth of his former (natural) parents and others should he be obedient to them."

Q. VIII. What right has the daughter-in-law after demise of her husband and father-in-law, and during the life time of the mother-in-law to the self-acquired property of her husband, as also to his ancestral estates?

A. VIII. A widowed daughter-in-law has no right whatever to the self-acquired or ancestral property of her husband, as long as her mother-in-law is alive except to her Stri-dhan only. So it is said on the subject of self-acquired property. In the Bhadra-babu-sambita. (Sanskrit) folium 38, stanzas 122 and 123. 1. "When the husband's property is reposed in her hands by her father and mother-in-law, she cannot get the same unless that is given her by her husband." (122.) Again says the same with regard to her want of power for adoption. 2. "The widow can get a son, if she take (adopt) him by order of her (mother-in-law) and one born from the same family younger than herself, and possess of all good signs." (123.)

Q. IX. Is the widowed daughter-in-law authorised to take an adopted son during the lifetime of her mother-in-law? And if she has taken one can he take possession of his (deceased) father's property as also of his ancestral hereditaments?

A. IX. The widow (daughter-in-law) is not authorised to adopt a son without the permission of her mother-in-law; because her husband himself having had no power of adoption or expending any thing during the lifetime of his mother, how can the wife of her son be enabled to do the like? So it is written in the Arban-niti (Sanskrit) folium 30, stanzas 107 and 108. 1. "When the father-in-law leaves a property, the mother-in-law or the son's wife being alive, she cannot get possession thereof except (receiving) her maintenance and raiments (therefrom)." (108). 2. "Adoption and other acts are all to be made conformably to the will of the mother-in-law, because she is always to be regarded as a mother by the son's wife." (108). So also in the Bhadra-babu-sambita (Sanskrit) folium 36, stanza 115. 3. "Let the wife of the childless son take possession of his property; but she being dead, his (the son's) mother is to take the same (in her hands)." (115). So in the Arban-niti (Sanskrit) folium 31, stanza 110. 4. "Upon the death of a childless son, his (the son's) wife takes that property, and she being dead, her mother-in-law becomes mistress of her property." (110). Again in the Indra-nandi-sambita (Prakrit) folium 24, stanza 5. "The grandson may take his paternal property as his own earning, but the taking of his ancestral property is made at the will of the mother."

Q. X. Of two brothers one became an adopted son (to one), and lost both his adoptive parents after some time. He then called his brother for the management of his estate, who for a long time served under him. Hereupon he made a gift of his (adoptive) father's estate to the said brother, who after receipt thereof died childless. His wife adopted a son and died, followed by the death of her mother-in-law also.

Can this adopted son have that property during the existence of the other brother, or his wife or their sons?

A. X. Neither one's begotten or adopted son has any power to give away any part of the property without consent of his wife, son and brothers. Should he make a donation and it come to be known, then the wife and sons shall get it back (from the donee). And should the widow of her own accord have taken an adopted son without a written order from her husband or mother-in-law, it must be invalid, as she cannot have the power of adoption during the lifetime of the (deceased's) brother, his wife, and their sons. So says the Arban-niti (Sanskrit) folium 30, stanza 95. 1. "No one has the power of making an endowment of any ancestral property, without asking his own wife, sons and brothers' (permission) to it." (95). So in the Jin-sambita (Sanskrit) folium 50, Stanzas 90-96. 2. "When a childless man intends to give anything out of his property to his sister, daughter or to her sons, or to the relatives of his own mother;" (90.) 3. "Whether it be from his divided or undivided property, his brothers should oppose it with all their fury." (91.) 4. "A man having his brothers and their sons alive, is not enabled to give a farthing from his estate, except in acts of virtue." (92.) 5. "One having none of the said relatives, is still to be prevented by his wife from his wilful gift of anything either in the paths of virtue or vice." (93.) 6. "A man having a brother residing in a distant country, and giving in charity any land or livelihood to any of the said persons, with a written and well attested deed for such gift," (94.) 7. "The brother after returning there, and learning from others of such gift, shall get it back from the donee." (95.) 8. "Whatever gift is made by one without consent of his brother and his sons, it must be invalid, although it was given with a written and attested deed (to anybody)." (96.)

Q. XI. A man after demise of his own begotten son, leaves a written order with his wife to take an adopted son, and also gives authority to his deceased son's widow to adopt, and dies leaving the widow and his widowed daughter-in-law him surviving.

The widow (mother-in-law) took no adopted son, but the daughter-in-law adopts a son during the life time of the said deceased's widow, and then dies.

Is such adoption (by the daughter-in-law) valid and would it be made effectual, if the widow concurred in the adoption and recognized it?

To whom would the property go on the demise of the widow?

A. XI. The widow acted contrary to the written order and intention of the donee by not adopting a son to herself. So likewise did the widow of the deceased son, by her adopting one in disregard of the rules of Jain law. This therefore is invalid, because the widow of the deceased son had no authority whatever during the life time of her mother-in-law, which has been shewn from passages of the sastras in our answer to the ninth question. Should the mother-in-law also have concurred in this, yet it cannot be valid without a written document of hers to the same effect, and should there exist any writing of her, still it is invalid for its being contrary to the written order of the donor. From all these reasons such adoption is invalid. Now upon the demise of the mother-in-law, the property of the deceased should come to the possession of the deceased's brother, or that brother's wife and sons. This will be found to be conformable to the law of succession in the Jain sastras as has been fully shewn in the first question.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

tation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee parih, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standground purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY (Author of Kabitahar, Bhurat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

NOT GLAD, NOR SAD.

YOU sang a little song to-day,
It was not sad, it was not gay,
The very theme was nigh out-worn :
Two lovers met, as lovers may,
They had not met—since yesterday—
They must not meet again—till morn !

And did they meet again, my dear ?—
Did morning come and find them here,
To see each other's eyes again ?
Alas, on that you are not clear,
For hearts will shift as winds will veer,
And Love can veer like any vane !

Ah no, I think some sudden craze,
Some bitter spite befell their days,—
What was that plaintive minor for ?
No more together lie their ways,
Remote, perhaps, the lover strays,
Perhaps the lady comes no more !

So strange the numbers sob and swell ;
No, there's no guessing what befell ;
It is the sweetest song you sing !
Not sad, and yet—I cannot tell,—
Not glad, and yet—'tis very well—
Like Love, like Life, like anything !

FEBRUARY FILLDYKE.

O February Fillydye ! darkly pour
Rivers of rain from out your cloudy sky,
And heed not slanderous men. Right glad am I
To see thee soften earth so hard and froze.
Thine aconites do make a golden floor ;
And snowdrops, winter's kindest legacy,
Droop dainty heads, and are, like maidens, shy,
Knowing that boisterous March is at the door.
Thy scented breath, thy blackbird's broken stave,
Do charm delight ; and thrice more welcome thou,
With hazel catkins twined about thy brow,
Than that last gleam that old October gave.

The Indian summer let my rivals sing,
But I will praise the Spring before the Spring.

THE POPLARS.

Shivering and wretchedly three poplars tall
Sway in the twilight of a city high,
Mire at their feet, above them cloudy sky,
Girt by the limits of a meagre wall

O'er which the thin gloom of their shadows fall.
And yet beyond them, hid from mortal eye,
The East's mysterious magic gardens lie,
Where the rapt nightingales for ever call
From bowering rose and myrtle. At a gate,
Unseen by men, an Ethiop doth stand,
Finger on lip, to lead me through the land
To the dim vastness of cool courts, where late Watches unearthly Beauty. Ah ! there be Spells subtle woven by those wizards three !

CHARLES LAMB.

DEAR heart ! from dim Elizabethan days
Surely thy feet strayed to our garish noon ;
Thou should'st have walked beneath a yellowing moon,
In some old garden's green, enchanted ways,
With Herrick and Ben Jonson ; while in praise
Of his lady thrilled the nightingale's full tune,—
And he grown still, these sang, 'neath skies of June,
That bent to hear, catches and roundelays.
In fair converse, thou might'st have wanderèd
With Burton's self, the master whose rare thought
Makes Melancholy glad the heart like wine ;
In thy earth-day, these fair compeers were dead ;
How pleasant was their laughter, had they caught
The sallies of thy humour, quaint and fine !

SONG OF THE DIRT.

A parody on Hood's "Song of the Shirt."

DIG—dig—dig—
To pierce for the golden ore ;
Dig—dig—dig—
Till you sweat at every pore.
Dig—dig—dig—
To root in the deep black sand ;
And this is to be a citizen
Of a free and Christian land !
And it 's oh ! to be a slave
To the Heathen and the Turk,
To rid the hands of a Christian man
From such dirty and toilsome work !
Wash—wash—wash—
Till the back is almost broke ;
Wash—wash—wash—
With your legs and your thighs in soak.
Wash—wash—wash—
Revolving an old tin pan,
And wabbling about with a shake and a splash
Till you doubt you're a Christian man !
Soul and body and mind,
Mind and body and soul,
O ! can it be right when they're all confined
To the basin and the bowl ?

 When it's only a little heap—
 Pile—pile—pile—
 Till it "graderly" grows more deep—
 Pile—pile—pile—
 And stow it away in a bag,
 Till you gaze with eyes of wild surprise
 On the contents of that rag !
 Oh ! can it be here I stand ?
 And can it be gold I see ?
 Ho ! ho ! I am off for a Christian land
 To spend it so merrily !

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

HOW are the mighty fallen ! The great Edison has descended to make a plaything—a veritable wax toy. He has invented a talking doll. It contains a miniature motor and the smallest phonograph ever made. The phonograph and the jaws of the doll being worked simultaneously, the fictitious infant talks for just one minute by Mr. Edison's golden chronometer. Before stopping, her dollship utters the dying words of John Quincy Adams—"Now I lay me down to sleep."

THE idea may be put to more practical purpose. Mr. Edison may construct an adult doll, so to say, of a man in canonicals going through the whole weekly service and delivering a neat little sermon. It would be a great convenience to gouty paterfamilias, as to all earnest Christians who wish to avoid the low uses to which the Sabbath is put in the flirtations and assignations at Church, &c.

HERE is a bright idea which we make a present of to the Government of India ! Now they are engaged in a war with the Land of the Lamas, why don't they order of Edison a thousand praying machines ? Such a consignment would be of better service than rifled artillery. The good Thibetians would submit instanter to a people armed with such an unfailing weapon to force the gates of the Lord Buddha's Paradise. If they offered a patent prayer multiplier actually voicing Om ! mani pani padma, Om !—which Edison could construct—the enemy would in piety come to terms.

If the Government possessed imagination—that imagination which is the grand secret of statesmanship—they would not be content to laugh at our bisauare fancy and have done with it. Government by toys is not all a joke—as our Indian rulers themselves know, in their management of Her Majesty's Asiatic children.

THIS is the fate of cheap and nasty :—

"The present position of the paper industry throughout Austria is by no means satisfactory" (says Industries). One of the largest mills was forced a short time ago to go into liquidation, and another large mill, which used in former years to pay good dividends, is now unable to pay its shareholders any dividends at all. Generally speaking, the paper mills manage with difficulty to pay even the interest on their capital expenditure, to say nothing of profits, and this state of things is ascribed partly to over-production, and partly to excessive competition and cutting of prices, which are, to a certain extent, encouraged even by the Government and public administrations. It has of late become the rule to give the orders to those firms who have sent in the lowest tenders, quite irrespective of the reputation and standing of those firms, and result is that the quality of the paper supplied under these contracts becomes worse from year to year. I have recently heard of a case where a Government office had to spend a large sum on mending official documents written on paper which was supplied only three years ago, and thus the saving effected in the acceptance of the lowest tender becomes to a great extent illusory. Some of the more respectable paper mills are now trying to mend matters by forming a syndicate of paper makers, which would regulate quality, prices, and quantity produced ; and a circular has been issued to the paper mills in Austria-Hungary with this object. Of the 267 mills applied to, only twenty-two have, however, agreed to the proposal, and thus the project must be considered as having failed. It is now proposed to form six local syndicates in various parts of the country, each to select a representative, who will join the general syndicate, and this proposal seems to be more favourably received."

In India, the newspapers are published either on this German stuff, of latterly, on Bally or Titaghur mill rag. Reis and Rayyet has, from the first, been printed on costly but durable English. We do not go in for cheap patriotism, of any kind.

HERE is a remarkable invention :—

"A pianoforte manufacturer of Leipzig has invented a most ingenious apparatus for printing music, which, when put in electrical communication with a piano or any other instrument possessing a keyboard, registers a piece of music automatically while it is being played. The construction of the apparatus is somewhat on the principle of the watch. While in motion a strip of paper is passed through, the lines being printed on it during its passage ; it then slides under a series of diminutive rollers, corresponding to the keys on piano, which register a mark on the paper as the notes are touched. The signs which represent rests are not those usually employed. On touching a key the corresponding roller registers a mark varying in length with the duration of the note. These signs are easily comprehended by anyone possessing the key. The electric communication with the keyboard is attained by means of small metallic points attached to each note, which when touched, is plunged into a small receiver containing mercury."

ENGLAND had the honor of introducing the railway at the seat of war, as early as 1855 in the Crimea. Many have been the improvements in war administration since. And now they have established a small printing office at Massowah under the management of the Military Commandant for the use of the Italian army of occupation.

MORE to the purpose of war is the following effort of Italian intelligence :—

"A private trial of the pneumatic dynamite gun, which has been built for Spezzia, Italy, under the charge of Captain Zalinsake, took place last week at New York. The gun is 40 feet long, 15 inches in diameter, and is charged with a shell 6 feet long. By the aid of hydraulic fittings it is easily handled. The trial demonstrated the capacity of the gun to deliver accurately within a range of two miles shells weighing nine hundred pounds. The charge consists of six hundred pounds of gelatine, equal to one thousand pounds of gun-cotton."

FOR popular education and literary activity, there is no country like the Alpine State. There is no place of equal extent even in the most thickly populated parts of America where the place is so busy. There are no less than 776 journals and periodical reviews in Switzerland, not counting the 36 official publications of the Federal Administration. The Canton of Zurich alone boasts of 123. Of the 776, 491 are published in German, 229 in French, 17 in Italian and only 10 in English, Polish and Russian. 26 publications are sometimes in two, three or even four languages. The Germans form the largest element, for they form 75 per cent of the total population. The French come next, being 21 per cent, while the Italians count 4 per cent.

AT Lyons, out of 13 printing establishments, 8 employ women—for they are found cheaper than men.

LAST month, 38,164 persons—Natives 29,918 males and 7,833 females ; Europeans 333 males and 80 females—visited the Indian Museum, during the 23 days it was open to the public, the average attendance being 1,659.

DURING the Exhibition of 1889, the Paris Chamber of Commerce will hold an International Commercial Congress, for the discussion of such matters as—the question of transport both of travellers and goods, more specially the matter ; comparison of freights by express and luggage trains ; means of accelerating delivery of small parcels ; fiscal matters ; advantages and disadvantages of treaties of commerce ; internal commercial legislation ; the position of workmen and clerks, &c.

A SUB-POSTMASTER on Rs. 20 a month, has at Akola been convicted of misappropriating three thousand rupees, and has been sentenced to fourteen years' rigorous imprisonment.

THE Royal Commission appointed to inquire into alleged irregularities in the Metropolitan Board of Works, is doing good work. Remarkable disclosures of corruption have been made. Builders, theatrical lessees and advertising contractors are accustomed to pay people connected with the Board large commissions for early information or for favourable reports.

THE Eiffel Tower, which is now in course of construction to commemorate the centenary of the Great French Revolution of 1789, will be the loftiest Tower in the world. It has already attained a height of 115 metres, and when completed, it will be more than 300 metres or a mile high. At a recent déjeuner d'inauguration, at which about 150 guests, mostly representatives of the Press, were invited and entertained by M. Eiffel and his coadjutors M. M. Adrien Hebrard and Berger, several speeches were made at the end of the breakfast, and M. Eiffel, with a cordiality the most communicative, thanked the representatives of the Press, who, he said, enabled him to triumph over all the forms of an obstructionist and defamatory campaign. The Eiffel Tower is a triumph of the French industry par excellence, a victory of iron, a glorification of the most lively forces of the nation and at the same time it is a conception of a character eminently literary and a work of transcendental imagination uniting grace with the progress of the sciences. The eminent engineer concluded: "I ask you to defer for a little while your definite judgment on the work. You have ascended 347 steps to take part in this initial ceremony and you will soon mount more than a mile to assist at the final banquet d'inauguration."

This colossal tower will be completed by the time the Exhibition is opened, and will really be one of the wonders of the world.

TWO French Correspondents have been expelled from Berlin, one for publishing reflections on the German army in the Matin, Paris journal, and the other for libelling the Emperor and Empress in the Gaulois. From the report of the London Morning Post's special, they go back with a light heart, and are not in the least ashamed of having abused the hospitality of Germany. They are evidently glad of such cheap martyrdom. Doubtless they make sure of a grand reception at Paris.

Another French journalist had been marked out, but he, like the French army in 1870, retreated before the German attentions.

ON the 12th July a Lucknow nobleman, known as Nawab Manga Sahib, died from a cobra bite in the hand, while out shooting.

ACCORDING to a notification of the Government of India, in the Department of Finance and Commerce, No. 4138, dated Simla, the 27th July, 1888, the Notes (or Stock certificates issued in lieu thereof) of the Four-and-a-half per cent. Loan of 1870, will be discharged at the Public Debt Office, Bank of Bengal, Calcutta, on the 27th October 1888, on which date the interest on such Notes (or Stock certificates) will cease. Proprietors are, however, allowed the option of transferring the amount of their Promissory Notes (or Stock certificates) into the Four per cent. Loan of 1st May 1865, bearing interest from 1st November 1888. The time for such transfer is limited to 1st September 1888. Up to noon of that day, 4½ per cents, duly received, will be received at the Banks of Bengal, Madras, or Bombay and their Branches or at any Government Treasury in India, without charge, for the new Four per cents. The interest overdue on such surrendered Notes and Stock certificates and Re. 1-5-3, further interest in advance from 15th July 1888 upto and including the 31st October 1888, at 4½, will be paid at the surrender for transfer.

LAST Saturday, the Calcutta Bar entertained themselves, the High Court Judges and the Advocate-General, for the honor done to themselves by the elevation of their head Sir Gregory Charles Paul to the dignity of K. C. I. E. Mr. L. P. D. Broughton, the Administrator-General, the senior barrister present, presided. The place chosen was the Dalhousie Institute, M. Bonsard supplied the dinner, and Messrs. Lobo the music.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Colds, Coughs, Shortness of Breath.—These maladies require early and unremitting attention, for if neglected they often end in asthma, bronchitis, or consumption. The Ointment well rubbed upon the chest and back, penetrating the skin, is absorbed and carried directly to the lungs, whence it expels all impurities. All the blood in the body is perpetually passing through the lungs, and there all noxious particles tending to disease can be quickly, thoroughly, and permanently neutralized, rendered harmless, or ejected from the system. Holloway's Ointment and Pills perfectly accomplish this purification; and through the blood thus cleansed, the influence of these wonderful medicaments reaches the remotest part of the human body, and thus cures all diseased action, whether internal or external.

THE Shinwaris are apparently giving trouble. The Amir has massed a large body of troops at Deh-Sarak, under the command of General Gholam Hyder, Commander-in-Chief for operations in the Shinwari country west of the Khyber. The expedition into the Kuner Valley and Bajour is, of course, postponed.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

MR. CRAWFORD, Commissioner of the Central Division, Bombay, was placed on his trial at Poona, on the 1st inst. before Mr. Vidal, the District Magistrate. Mr. Little, the Government Solicitor, appeared to prosecute and Mr. Anderson instructed by Mr. Lynch, to defend. Mr. Little opened the case by applying for a postponement. There was strenuous objection. It was strange, remarked the opposing counsel that a high official has been suspended and for three weeks he has been kept ignorant of the charges against him and even then Government was not prepared to proceed with the case. He claimed for the accused the right to be tried immediately, specially as it was not alleged that a single rupee went into Mr. Crawford's pocket. Mr. Anderson grew eloquent on the unfairness of the proceedings against his client, characterising them as opposed to the fundamental principles of English law. It is also reported that the counsel "had expressed himself in moderate terms, but it was with some difficulty that he controlled the indignation which every fair-minded man must share." Mr. Vidal, while regretting the application for adjournment, and in view that "further evidence might be obtained by the prosecution if an adjournment were granted," postponed the case to the 16th, when no further time would be allowed.

The case against Hunmantrao also stands adjourned before the same Magistrate to the 15th instant.

MR. JOHN CORLETT, the proprietor and editor of the Sporting Times, has added a new and, as most fellahs would think, not unenviable feather to his cap. He is not only smart as a journalist and cute in management, but also redoubtable as a witness in court. He has fared so dangerous an assailant as the great Sir Charles Russell himself, with all his advantage of attacking from the vantage ground of the bar the position of a witness in the box—which is in such ominous proximity to the dock. Called as a witness in the sensational case of libel instituted by the famous Jockey Wood versus Cox, Corlett coolly described himself as the owner of race-horses and a newspaper staff. Thereupon, Sir Charles Russell came thus upon him,—"you come here reluctantly?" Not in the least put out, Mr. Corlett retorted—"Oh dear no, Sir Charles; I come for £1 is."—(laughter.) Then Sir Charles asked: "What is the general reputation of Wood?" The witness coolly answered with perfect nonchalance: "The very atmosphere seems redolent against him"—(laughter). This was enough for the Knight of the bar, and he prudently retired from a useless contest with such a redoubtable antagonist. Here the counsel for the prosecution, Mr. Lockwood, took him up, with the sarcastic interrogation, "Is that a quotation from the Sporting Times?" (laughter). The witness, unabashed, replied, "Possibly next week." Mr. Lockwood: "Are you a jockey or an owner?"—The witness: "I am not a jockey. I weigh sixteen stone.—(laughter). I was annoyed to see Success apparently winning when I had not a shilling on"—(laughter).

The end of it was that the journalist was asked to descend from the enclosure in which he was placed and released from attendance. The witness's fencing was too much for the practised skill of counsel. It was clear that without any compensation the proceedings in court were degenerating into a farce, in which the joke went all against the long robe. The sporting and sportive journalist was too well up to impudent evasion for any chance of extracting anything out of him—to say nothing of the legal fiction of "the whole truth"—and too case-hardened in cynicism to be ashamed.

SINCE the death of the Rev. Dr. Henry Ward Beecher, they had been casting about for a successor. Many were the applicants for the place, for the Plymouth Church is a cathedral except in name and the pastor receives the pay of a bishop and has the disposal of the revenues of an archepiscopate. The competition was open to the whole English-speaking world. Confident and ambitious clergymen from Europe crossed over for the trial, but did not give satisfaction. The congregation itself called in likely men, but to no better purpose. Not that faithful shepherds pure in life and proficient in every Christian duty were not to be found. The difficulty was about the preacher. There was in the Church itself a gentleman, the Rev. Samuel Halliday, who had for eighteen years been Dr. Ward Beecher's right hand man, administering the entire affairs of the church, with its numerous charities and schools, to perfection, a good modest holy man who kept everything spruce and bright for his chief and saved him all trouble. But Plymouth did not care for sanctity or administrative efficiency in the successor. They wanted what is vulgarly called the "gift of the gab." The fact was that Dr. Beecher himself had spoiled the Plymouth people. For more than a generation, they had been accustomed to a peculiar style. It was not the eloquence of the pulpit, pure and simple. It was a brilliant flash, with pyrotechnic effects. In fervid eloquence and all the higher qualities perhaps, the reputation of no American occupant of pulpit whose names have travelled to us, is higher than that of the late William Ellery Channing. But, even if Channing were a Trinitarian, he would scarcely have succeeded in the competition, any more than Robert Hall, of this side the water. Sydney Smith's fun would not perhaps have been broad enough for the Yankees, and he lacked earnestness and elevation. Binny would have been too terribly in earnest, we suspect. Spurgeon would have more chance. But Beecher was a far more gifted orator. Altogether, we are not surprised at the difficulty in finding a preacher of adequate calibre to supply his place. After two years' vain search and numerous trials of many candidates, the congregation invited Beecher's own valued friend Lyman Abott, and, after probation, has just confirmed him in the succession. As a consequence, Mr. Halliday has resigned.

ON the death of the ex-King of Oudh, many applications reached Government purporting to come from his creditors for the recovery of their dues. We hear that, with three exceptions, Government has rejected all the applications. These favoured creditors are one Mansiramud-Dowla, the King's factotum, and another contractor for building, for four lacs between them, or 2 lacs each. The third of these creditors is Rutledge, the man of beasts, who supplied the royal menagerie. He became bankrupt in the King's lifetime, and, in his schedule filed in court, he named the King a debtor to an enormous sum. The Assignee of the court accordingly has preferred a demand on the King's estate for three lacs. They expect to be paid out of the proceeds of sale of the late King's property, on which already several lacs has been realised, though there is still a considerable quantity to be sold. Probably, a long time will elapse before these claims are adjusted. They should be scrutinised.

WE have received an earnest complaint from Khardah against the proposal of the local municipality to maintain only one site on the bank of the river, for burning the Hindu dead. This is a subject on which our countrymen are sore, and on which Europeans and our own inexperienced enlightened youth are apt to give them offence. Some years ago what a storm was raised in Calcutta, when the metropolis was proposed to be purged of the nuisance of burning altogether, by sending the dead bodies for cremation to the Sunderbuns! The measure was ripe and almost a fait accompli. It was the pet of the strong Government of Sir Cecil Beadon, supported by the Radical Reformers among us, at that time containing many men of mark or eminence. Yet the Government had to bow to the storm. The opposition was headed by Sir Cecil's personal friend, the late Ram Gopal Ghose, himself a leader of the beef and brandy party, who had once advocated the abolition of that rite of Antarjali for the maintenance of which he made a most pathetic appeal. Such is the Hindu feeling on the subject, and we do not wonder at the tempest in the tea pot of the little township of Khardah on their doubling burning question. The cremation business, as performed by Hindus, is obviously a nuisance, and at first sight one site seems sufficient for a village like Khardah. But though the local population is small, many dying and dead Hindus are carried there for the last rites and final disposed from the interior to a doubly holy place, sanctified by the Bhagirati and the god Shyam Sundar. Indeed, his godship plays a part in this question, as in all Khardah politics. At the burning ground, on the river near the principal landing, called par excellence Sri Ghat, where the Gosains—called by Heber Hindu bishops—the owners and custodians of the idol, and their relations and connections are brought for dying and cremation, the god is brought to offer consolation and hope of eternal felicity. But vulgar herd of Hindus are carried to another place, the Natu Pal Ghat. Hence the necessity of maintaining both places, at any rate two places, one of which must be the Sri Ghat. For Shyam Sundarji claims his own time-honored Ghat, hallowed by the associations of centuries. He refuses to go elsewhere; he will certainly not go to Natu Pal's, guarded as it is from the approach of punctilious orthodox divinity by the abodes of unclean grave-diggers or rather cremation-ground labourers—murdafarashes. We hope the Municipal Commissioners will be able to arrive at a satisfactory solution and give Khardah peace.

But what of the crying nuisances within? Have the domestic wells for the storing of ordure from generation to generation been abolished?

WE welcome Baboo Parvati Nath Dutt, who went to Europe for scientific education, on his return home with success, and we rejoice at his honourable entry into the service of our country in the scientific line, as an Assistant in the Geological Survey. That line has hardly been touched among us. Baboo Dutt starts with a certain measure of distinction. He is a notable man and his arrival is an interesting occurrence. Bengal is proud of its pioneer geologist, and we are not surprised to see that Dacca, from which part of the country he comes, has given him a good reception. The value of the compliment is, of course, lessened by our Eastern brethren, among whom the local feeling is very strong, never missing an opportunity of "ovating"—to use one of the Americanisms of the local exponent of Queen's English—every "brither" that can be caught—not sparing even the fortunate son-in-law, who is such an incubus in the Education department.

It is curious to remark the difference between the feeling exhibited towards Mr. P. N. Dutt by his countrymen, and the bearing adopted by the Anglo-Indians whom he has joined in the noble profession of science. The attitude of the Department is one of sullen silence, if not suspicion. They evidently regard him a poacher into their preserve. Unable to help the trespass, they tacitly agreed to ignore him. He will not be suppressed by such strategy! Their masterly muteness and indifference only reveal the misery in their souls. The number of scientific Assistants in the Department is limited enough for the newcomer to cause a gentle flutter among them and excite curiosity, followed by the interchange of social amenities. Nothing of the kind, so far as we have been able to detect, though, on the present occasion, the nationality of the newcomer might be supposed to have been an additional ground for interest in, and for courtesy to, him. Not a syllable was breathed about him, or to him, beyond what the regulations of the state or the urgency of business compelled.

DR. KING having been able to send the truants at Head-Quarters, to the Land's End and John O'Groats of the Empire, would, one would suppose, be in the best spirits, in peace at home and abroad.

WE hope the native Press in the South will watch with zeal the case against Rao Bahadoor Kunjen Menon, first class Sub-Judge, late of Tellicherry. The administration must be purged, but not at the expense of judicial freedom. At this time when so many Europeans in high places are being detected in all parts of the empire, there may be special need for protecting native officers. Is it true that Mr. Menon is the victim of persecution? On the 13th July he applied to the Madras High Court to transfer the case of bribery against him from the District Court of Tellicherry to any other District. He questioned the competency of the Tellicherry Judge to sit in judgment on the case, having, under the authority of Government, at various times, held enquiries in the matter of various allegations of bribery made against the accused, and having besides issued a proclamation under the authority of Government offering a free pardon to all those who had given bribes to come forward and give evidence. The whole matter has been mismanaged throughout, giving the accused substantial cause of complaint. The Judge, it would seem, had been taking extra judicial statements on oath or affirmation, after which regular charges were preferred before the Joint-Magistrate against the accused and three others for receiving and giving bribes. It was urged by counsel for the accused that the issuing of the proclamation under the authority of the Government was improper and the action of the District Judge illegal. The Court held that the case had not been tried yet, and that a prima facie case must first be made out before committal to the Sessions Court, when an application might be properly made out for the transfer of the case. The High Court properly refused to interfere until committal to the Sessions. The case is still in the court of the Joint-Magistrate. If that court commits, it will be time for making application to the High Court. We do not understand this haste of the accused Sub-Judge. He doubtless has reason to think that his committal is a foregone conclusion. Yet, it is strange that any lawyer should have advised him and undertaken his application in this behalf. It was taking time by the forelock with a vengeance! A vakeel would have been severely snubbed for such a useless proceeding.

Since then the inquiry has matured, and the Sub-Judge is now on trial at the Sessions Court of Tellichery. Lord Connemara was prompt to take the hint of the proceedings in the High Court, and appointed Mr. Irvine, Judge of Coimbatore, to hold the sessions at Tellichery.

So when, pursuant to previous suggestion, application was again made for transfer from Tellichery, where the feeling is very strong in the matter, specially as the Judge might be called as a witness, it was met by the announcement that Government had already appointed a Judge from another District. Counsel pressing still, the Court said it had no jurisdiction.

In the face of the clear provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code, it was a waste to have repeatedly resorted to the High Court in a matter in which the Government is supreme. When the Government is so reasonable as now throughout this Empire, there is the less reason for such beating about the bush. It is a pity that even a man in the position of a Sub-Judge, should be so wholly under the influence of lawyers with their tortuous ways, as not to see his own obvious path. They would have nothing to say to Government. Accordingly, he appeared before Mr. Irvine at Tellichery. Here his counsel made another useless and irrelevant application to the Judge to transfer the case to another District. He was quite true in saying that there was great prejudice against his client there, but cui bono? He might just as well have addressed the passing wind. All the elaborate argument on the terms of the Code in such cases was a solemn farce. Mr. Irvine was not the Government that he was so regularly instructed in the powers of Government under the Act. He was no more competent than are we to transfer the case to Calicut. On his expressing that simple and necessary truth, counsel fell back on telegraphing to Government. We should not be surprised if Government gave a curt refusal.

Clearly, Menon has need to be saved from friends as well as foes. There is no claim on Government for courtesy. After having despised so long, the accused's counsel fires off a telegram to it, expecting to overturn all its arrangements and change the venue to another District, after the case has been called by the Judge appointed to try it. There is a time for everything, and much as we recognise the value of the telegraph as a means of administration, Mr. Willie Grant's telegram at this stage seems to us an abuse of the agency.

It would be all the same a pity, if, from indiscretion of his advisers, Mr. Menon should not obtain the transfer of his case. He badly wants it. He could not expect fair play in Tellichery. The genius loci is dead against him. All the District administration, from Judge and Magistrate and Collector to Police, is committed to find him guilty. Mr. Irvine coming to Tellichery, living in familiar intercourse with the authorities and breathing the atmosphere of the place, can scarcely keep himself from succumbing to the prevailing influence.

OUR surmise of last week has been verified to the letter. The extent of the enquiry into Home Rule has been the subject of prolonged and acrimonious debate. In the course of it, Mr. Henry Mathews has with brutal candour confessed the real object of the ministry in the Bill. He said that it was intended more to verify the Times' charges than to clear the members of the House charged against. Both Mr. Gladstone and Sir William Harcourt denounced enlarging the scope of the Bill. An amendment by Mr. Reid to limit it was rejected by a majority of 47 votes. The Parnellites strongly opposed the nomination of Sir John Day as one of the Commission to investigate the charges, but the original motion was carried by a majority of 89.

ENGLAND has been visited by terrific storms accompanied by rain, seriously damaging the crops. The eastern part of London felt it severely. The weather has been splendid since.

WHO is the "Bengali Journalist" who, week after week, airs his stray thoughts from Bengal, in the columns of the Indian Spectator of Bombay? His thoughts discover his camp and his connections, though. He is, to begin with, an out and out Congress-wallah. In the spirit of the Bengali Chaitanyite who rolled on the ground exclaiming—This is the holy clay of which the Lord's favorite drum

(the earthen Mridanga or Khole) is made! he notices the very wrapper of the Report of the Congress. That wrapper, colour and all, may be an accident, or imposed upon the managers by the market—in India we practically have so little choice in our typography and get up—but our anonymous brother smells a—perfume, we mean, in the light green coating of the Report as in every belonging of the Congress. "There is," says he, "there is a meaning in that colour. I believe it is the Irish Nationalist colour." Nothing could be more delightful, of course, or, we may add, more significant. No wonder that the writer is in raptures at the electioneering placard which the agents and patrons of the Congress are circulating in vast numbers in Great Britain and Ireland. In his judgment,

"The contents of the placard on the National Congress which has been stuck up in the streets of London are edifying. Within the short compass of a few lines, they state the miserable story of India's woes with telling effect. The writer of them must be a master mind. I suppose it is Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji or Mr. Hume to whom the credit of the composition is due. Whoever it may be, he deserves the best thanks of the Indian community."

Such is our Journalist's exordium, and he doubtless takes care to put his best foot foremost. It is at least consolatory that master-minds are not such rare birds in the East as in the black and barren West, and that we have left in our mind in Bengal almost a master mind—a jeweller who can recognise true genius at a glance. We have an uncomfortable suspicion, however, that the prime test of master minds is a voyage to Europe, whether they go themselves or send their wares there. Possibly masterliness, like some liquors, matures by a long voyage.

After such a beginning, the rest is plain sailing. The writer is naturally "very sanguine about the result of the Congress Agitation that has at last been set up in England." Others, who are neither master minds nor anything near it, may think differently. Our Agitators are continually making the mistake of reckoning without their host, and the hosts of the enemy. Under any circumstances, it would be a bad day for England and India, when placards indited by "master minds" "stating the miserable story of India's woes with telling effect," placarded in the streets of London or, for that matter, in every street, lane and bylane throughout the United Kingdom, to any appreciable extent superseded the legitimate channels of governing this vast Empire or influencing its destinies.

The writer is mighty glad that the Maharaja of Cooch Behar has accepted the office of Patron of a Ladies' Institution, and formally congratulates His Highness. We suspect this means not the usual paper patronage. Anyhow it was a matter of course when the writer informs us that the late Keshub Chunder Sen founded the Institution or a school of the kind.

Our Journalist is nothing if not interrogative. He fires a whole catechism, at the rate of a question per every paragraph and a half during the greater part of his article. Thus, to take them at random, we have—

"Why do not Mr. Naoroji or Mr. Bonerjee in combination with such of our English friends as Mr. S. Smith, Mr. J. Slagg, Professor Hunter and others, do something to enlighten Lord Lansdowne on the ways of governing India justly and liberally?"

He evidently is not very well pleased with Mr. Bonnerjee, however, who is ill and unable to work. The Ghoses are the true stuff—above the ills that flesh is heir to we suppose, and the rest of it—and L. D. Mohan is the Ghose par excellence—the Ghosiest of Ghoses. He has a neat scheme for endowing the hero:—

"Why should not Mr. Lal Mohan Ghose be induced to go? It is a great pity that he is now obliged to pass away his days in Calcutta, practising as a barrister. The wealthy men of Bengal should combine and arrange for his permanent residence in London as our Resident Representative."

We do not know how Mr. Ghose will be pleased at the suggestion involved in this proposition. Another question—

"Why should not natives of the country who possess all the qualities of European gentlemen be called so by Europeans as what I can hardly make out. Do Anglo-Indians still think that white skin to be one of the possessions entitling a man to be called a gentleman?"

Of course, this Journalist "possesses all the qualities of European gentlemen." It is satisfactory to the country to be assured of the possession of at least the notable unit. What a pity that Europeans should not appreciate it!

POETRY—or verse—has always been a speciality of Reis and Rayyet. Our first page has usually been devoted to it. We have thus presented many pieces of merit, by natives and Europeans. For years—before his wayward Muse in a pet shelved her harp on the top branch of the tallest tree of the mango-grove in classic Paikpara—our friend Ram Sharma, the gifted poet of that remarkable poem in stout blank verse, "The Last Day," delighted our readers. We have made it a point to lay before them the most notable occasional verse of the period. Accordingly, we have given Tennyson's and Swinburne's Jubilee Odes, Edwin Arnold's and other tributes to Mathew Arnold and all the best poetry written in English on the death of the late Emperors of Germany, with a splendid translation of a most stirring French appeal to the dying Frederick III. In the absence of original verse, we draw from different sources, including little known pieces or unpublished verse repeated from mouth to mouth.

The present number is not without its attractions. "Not glad nor sad" is a touching theme, tenderly treated. The lovers of the sonnet have always been well served by us, and this time there are three good ones. The last is a lady's tribute to Charles Lamb which must delight the hearts of all dear Elia's admirers. It will yet take rank among the best efforts in the language. The "Song of the Dirt" has not equal claims, but in view of the diggin's in our own midst, we think it will be interesting. It was composed and published in California among the diggers during the height of the Gold Fever. It does not apply to India, however, the conditions of our gold industry being entirely different from those of mining in California or Australia.

SOOROJ COOMAREE BEEBEE has again been unfortunate. The High Court dismissed her appeal without even troubling the respondent for his say. Lucky indeed are they that engage counsellor Woodroffe. It is enough to engage him and brandish him in court. Poor Jain Law has no hope in Calcutta, under the present régime.

In Moorshedabad, the Jains' stronghold, the great Juggut Sett case has been decided in favor of the lady—widow of Sett Gobin Chand—who is now the patriarchess of the family. The Court delivered judgment on the 31st July, in accordance with Jain Law.

WE gather that

"A new law has recently been passed in Japan dealing with the Press, and will be in force for a period of six months. Before being able to publish a journal, it is now necessary for the editor, manager, and printers to furnish their names and ages; they must have attained the age of 20 years, be Japanese subjects, and in full possession of their rights of citizenship. The editor and printer must not be one and the same person. Unless the journal treats exclusively of science, art, statistics, or market quotations, a deposit of 1,750 to 5,000 francs has to be paid. Should any correspondent desire to rectify an article previously published in the journal, the editor must print it in extenso in the same type and the identical column in which the original article appeared. Should the correction be twice as long as the original, the surplus is considered as advertisement, and must be paid for as such. Any article criticising a law is absolutely prohibited, no matter how bad the legislation may be. No document may be reproduced, nor even an allusion made to it without consent of the Government. The Minister of the Interior may suspend or confiscate a journal should he consider it menacing to the public peace, or if any criticisms be made on the customs of the country, even should these customs be prejudicial to the public weal. Although the penalties now in force against journalistic offences are very numerous, still they are not by any means so numerous as formerly."

That beats the refinements of the most jealous European tyranny. And this is the great Reform State of the day!

We really do not understand these Ultra Orientals of the Pacific. Inconstant like the French, they have apparently less ballast. In the enthusiasm of an hour, they demolished their old edifice down to the foundations, and are building anew, without having a settled plan. They not only abolished the Church but denounced religion. In a few years, they discovered that even a faith without God as was theirs was not the useless lumber they regarded it. Their present attitude may be pithily put in the following notice:—

"Wanted—

A State Religion.

Apply to the Ministry of the Interior, Japan." Bentham in England and specially the Abbé Sièyes in France used to deal in the article. They must surely have left successors in that Continent. Here is an opportunity too for our own countryman Baboo Protab Chunder Mozoomdar, who has been repeatedly foiled in his efforts to effect entrance into the seat of power of the temple of the Brahma Samaj of India. Japan just now is just the place for a Pope in search of the crown of privilege—or of martyrdom.

J. LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

ITS DIFFICULTIES.

WE have already pointed out the weak point of Local Self-Government in the administration of the local resources. An unloosening of authority has marked the first stage of the experiment, and this is chiefly due to the absence of official prestige in the position of the newly created local authorities. The elective system has also developed a tendency on the part of these authorities to partiality of conduct and over-lenience of assessment, with an eye to their continued popularity with the electorate. Votes at the elections are generally regarded as an obligation conferred on the returned candidates with a money value, to be repaid by reduction of assessment. Both these tendencies might be left to work out their remedy as there is progress of enlightenment in the communities. But personal official help may help to reduce the difficulty. Their effects, in the meantime, upon the administration of local funds cannot but be highly embarrassing. If an efficient financial administration is the basis of successful administration all round, wherever that efficiency is lost, through causes well within the control of the Government officers, the Government officers incur a responsibility by not removing them.

The financial resources of these local institutions are far from adequate, and it is clearly in the power of the Government to place them on a more satisfactory footing. The house tax, with the cumbersome and costly machinery for its collection and its unavoidable unrealizable balances, does not suffice for their manifold wants. Such as it is, its administration is capable of considerable improvement. It is for the Government, which is responsible for devising the tax as well as the unsatisfactory machinery by which it is administered, to find the remedy. It might work comparatively well in Calcutta or elsewhere with official authority at its back, though even here, to judge by the published proceedings of the last sitting of the Calcutta Commissioners, and Babu Doorgagati Banerjee's scathing criticism of the collection, it is far from working satisfactorily in Calcutta. That it does not work smoothly and effectively in the country at large, is a fact about which there is no question. It is certain that the administration of the municipal taxes can lay no claim to that regularity which marks the administration of the Provincial or Imperial imposts. Why there should be this difference, is a question which should have long ago suggested itself to the real overruling authorities. It may be all very well for Sir Stuart Bayley to give a wider elective constitution to Local Self-Government, but here are difficulties of detail which also require his attention. We think some of these difficulties are removeable by the position of local authorities being improved in dignity and power. The Government is perhaps wise in jealously guarding against the chance of these subordinate authorities developing themselves into oppressors of their fellow-subjects. Tendencies to high-handedness and undue abuse of power, no doubt, exist and require to be checked. But having once constituted them local administrators, there is no halting half-way—no shrinking from its legitimate conclusion. The problem is no doubt one of delicacy—a dilemma is involved in the task of rendering Local Self-Government something more than nominal. Our municipal authorities are supposed, for instance, to be the sanitary guardians over their jurisdictions. They are expected to prevent the commission of nuisances, and are even invested with the powers of ex-officio Honorary Magistrates, for trial of offenders against the sanitary provisions of the law. By an inexplicable perversity of official routine, however, they are deprived of all control over the police, and how Benches of Honorary Magistrates, to which the local police owes no obedience, work at all in practice, may be better conceived than described. Little work, if any, is got from these Municipal Benches in the country, and the evil has gone so far as to have at last drawn the attention of the Government. We hear that several municipalities have been called for explanation on account of the small work done by them. We do not know what explanation will be offered, but the admitted failure of the system is chiefly due to the absurd relations which now subsist between the police and the local authorities. Here is room for amendment. The Police may be an Imperial institution, maintained in all its pomp and state to terrorize a law-abiding populace. But if Local Self-Government is to be a real limb of the administration, its relations to the police must be, in some respects, of authority. As it is, the police is being gradually relieved of the quasi-municipal duties hitherto performed by it. It no longer helps in the execution of warrants for collection of taxes, or the registration of vital statistics, or the administration of the pounds. A process of complete separation between the police and the municipality, has been long at work, and is by this almost finished. This has been one effect of the discontinuance, under Lord Ripon's just orders, of the municipal subsidies for paying the police, and the effect is seen everywhere, except when the official is both the police and the municipal administration. To counteract the disadvantage of this, the Government of the Upper Provinces have hit upon a kind of municipal police for municipal purposes, with a livery of its own, and a special jurisdiction. The question, at all events, demands final settlement, and should not be left in its present position of uncertainty and anomaly.

The position of the authorities constituted under the scheme of Local Self-Government, requires to be made one of more real dignity and power. It was a statesmanlike suggestion made, at the discussion of the measure in the Imperial Council, that these authorities might be given, under well-guarded limitations, small civil and criminal jurisdictions. To command the willing respect and confidence of those over whom they are placed, they must exercise some more real power than the overseership of roads and drains, and be invested, in popular estimation, with more of dignity than they possess. We do not mean the dignity which comes from titles. That is a Brummagem dignity wherever it is unsupported by sterling worth and merit. We seek a more, really dignified position for our local administrators, which the Government may give, by showing them practical sympathy and support in their actual work—by giving them proofs of more confidence. There may be more of touch between the local and the official authorities. We have already seen that, in cases of criminal resistance to the local authorities, in the exercise of their legal functions, they must appeal to the Magistrates for help just as ordinary suitors, and place themselves in an awkward predicament which must be ruinous to their prestige. A little personal sympathy on the part of the official head of the district, would be an effective remedy, once for all, for such critical situations, but personality is an element of administration which seldom comes into play in what has been facetiously called the caste-iron British routine, and a scene is presented of Local Self-Government in court, from which it only emerges with its dignity torn to shreds and tatters.

In regard to the financial straits in which all municipalities are, more or less, involved, it is much in the power of district officials, and of the Government especially, to lend them a helping hand. This may be done in two ways. The Government, if it really believed and sympathized in the financial embarrassment of these bodies, might well make over to them additional resources to which they have a right, but from the benefit of which they continue to be excluded. There is no good reason, for instance, why they should not enjoy the entire proceeds of ferries which exist within their limits. The old ferry-funds have, in most cases, been wholly or partially seized upon by the provincial exchequer, the municipalities being told to recoup the loss as best they might. Nor do we see why the excise revenue realized in a municipal town, should not, at any rate to some fractional extent, benefit the town administration. A portion of this revenue is, we believe, enjoyed by municipalities in Western India, and it is at all events anomalous why a different arrangement should exist in other provinces. The excise revenue is derived from the trade and prosperity of the town, and the town administration may well claim a fair share of it. The same remarks apply with equal force to the Imperial imposts on trade and other income. But it is vain, in the chronic financial exigencies of the Imperial Government, to assert a claim of abstract right which has no chance of being accepted. The scheme of financial decentralization must, it seems, work down, so as to leave no local administration unaffected. The Government may, however, do a considerable help to municipal administration, by giving loans for permanent municipal works at moderate interest. As it is, the municipal resources are, year after year, frittered away upon minor works of a current nature, while schemes of permanent sanitary or other improvement, requiring a large outlay for their execution, have to be continually put off, from inability to make up the necessary funds from the ordinary revenue. Our contemporary of the Statesman has been, with his characteristic persistence, advocating a change of Government policy in this respect, and has, it appears, so far succeeded as to have brought the Government of India to consider the subject. There can be no doubt that, if municipalities are to undertake works of permanent usefulness, like systematic drainage and water-supply, they must be helped by Government with the capital on easy terms, and that so long as this is not done freely and on a well-recognized system, the municipal resources, such as they are, must go on wasting themselves upon comparatively useless or unimportant objects.

The Government may strengthen the financial position of municipalities in another way. It may relieve them of pecuniary burdens, which do not legitimately belong to them. They have been very liberally relieved of the police expenditure, which, from the commencement of municipal institutions, had been made the first charge upon the Municipal Fund. That relief bids fair, however, to be only nominal, when the Government appears determined to fasten upon municipalities new responsibilities of the same or greater value, by way of a compensation as it were for the loss of the police subsidy. The Municipal Fund lies now at the mercy of a number of Government Departments, and there is a regular scramble for the money. Altogether, there is need of more helpful official sympathy with the interests of Self-Government than, we are constrained to say, is now evinced.

THE WEATHER AND AGRICULTURAL PROSPECTS.

WE are in the midst of the rains, at last. After the long tyranny of the sun in all his unqualified effulgence, the change is not simply a relief but was a necessity of existence itself. Not as it might be in the stormy wintered North, it was a great comfort to see the monochrome—light, thin, soft dark—of the water-charged clouds spread like a layer on the whole Heavens, for days together. Monday was a particularly rainy day, particularly at night—to use a sort of bull necessitated by the imperfection of language—when there was an almost continual downpour. For the last five years or so, Bengal generally has been lucky in the weather, and there has been abundance of the fruits of the earth. It was almost time enough for a reverse of fortune. The extraordinary heat this year and the postponement of the monsoons seemed ominous. Indeed, the niggardliness of the heavens had alarmed the country as it saw its tiny plants perish and the peasantry were unable to sow. With the rains hope has again revived. From generals, let us proceed to particulars, and end this notice with a typical example of a well-cultivated tract in the neighbourhood of the metropolis. The cis-Damudah parts west of Howrah, which all these years benefited by the propitiousness of the seasons, are this year feeling the effects of inclemency. An industrious peasantry makes the most of a good soil, not over moist, raising jute, sone, &c., besides rice.

It is this tract which is the source of the supply of the esculent roots and tubers, ole, kachu, potato, and culinary vegetables like bringal, dheros, &c. The potato time is not yet, the root being planted after the Poojas. But, in consequence of the late drought, the other vegetables, including the jute and some plants have all perished. The reliance of the people is now on the paddy. This requires abundance of water, and, had the rains been withheld nor poured in copiously, the situation would have been serious indeed. That fear has, for the present, gone. There has been rain and plenty of it. It commenced in the afternoon of Monday week. The next two days there was an unceasing shower, and it has been raining from time to time since. The effect on the usually quiet population was instantaneous. There is joy in the land again. Out of work the Bengal peasants are not given to any demonstrative dissipation. In a season of drought, when they are not called to their daily active operations in the field, they are more than ever dispirited eying the heavens in mute importunity. The re-call to their accustomed round of severe toil, rouses them up to unaccustomed animation. There is life and movement and even bustle. A smile lights up the swarthy cheeks, and even song breaks out from lips erewhile sealed in anxiety. Labour is again in demand. Fancy the condition of the mere labourer in the rural country, when his better employing peasant is not in need of his service!

With the copious showers, the price of labour has risen throughout the country. In the cis-Damuda tract, owing to the strenuous desire of the cultivators to utilise the opportunity, and probably also to the dispersion of local labour during the late drought, the price has nearly doubled. Since Saturday, at Belia' Adampore and the neighbouring villages, it is eight annas per diem for each man, where it was five annas. The hire of ploughs has actually doubled. In former seasons, it was eight annas a day per plough. Since Saturday last it is a Rupee.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION IN INDIA.

I have carefully gone through the article on the above question in a recent issue of your paper, and fully concur with the view expressed therein. In connection therewith, I would like to make a few observations, which I hope will not be out of place, or inopportune. Technical education, especially in an enlightened age like the present, is essentially needed in every respect. Seeing the condition of the respective professions, such as the medical, educational, engineering, legal, &c., a right thinking man, of course who has a grain of sense in him, cannot but agree in the advisability of expanding the scheme into some such substantial shape, which might cope with the demand of the general public. The more it is spread over the country at large, the more will be its beneficial results.

I.—I would advocate the establishment of technical schools in the metropolis and in the heart of the country and in every important town in the mofussil where easy access can be had to railway or other workshops.

II.—Graduates or under-graduates of the University should be required to learn the trade. Either separate institutions might be established by Government or the well-to-do public or an arrangement made by which the Railway Companies would allow their workshops to be visited by students going in for the mechanical profession.

III.—Four schools to be established in close proximity to railway stations and results watched and reported on after a certain time, viz., at Kanchraparah in Bengal, Jamalpur in Monghyr, District Behar, Allahabad in N. W. P., Roorkee in N. W. P., and in places where institutions might be first started.

I would lay particular stress on the opening of such a school at Jamalpur in connection with the Railway workshops, which are the largest in India. The several shops there are divided under the following heads, viz., 1. Erecting. 2. Painting. 3. Carpenter. 4. Fitting. 5. Boiler-making. 6. Tender repairing and constructing. 7. Blacksmiths, Spring-making, Steam Hammering. 8. Rolling Mills. Establishment for rolling bar iron of sizes, 9. Turning. 10. Foundry for making general castings. 11. Lamp-making and Coppersmith's shops. Besides there is a large Mechanical Drawing Office. I think it can be said without the smallest shadow of doubt that if schools were established for imparting technical education in addition to theoretical or general education, the result would be a great success.

Mr. Editor, as in this very important matter you have set the ball rolling, I hope other able and influential men like yourself will speed it in its flight and not impede its course, until it has arrived at its goal and brings about the consummation of our desire. It will, I am certain, be the means of removing a deal of poverty and distress which is now prevalent in the land, and create an opening for the utilization of talent and genius which is now lying dormant for want of a suitable field for its operation. Let Government be up and doing, and let the Reises, Rajahs and Craseses of the country open their purse-strings for such a laudable undertaking, and in return they will reap the good of the country and the raising of its people from a state of poverty and degradation to one of ease and respectability.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

tation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paralied. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kiisto Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

JAMES ROUTLEDGE.

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY (Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression. It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

ODE ON A NEAR PROSPECT OF ETON COLLEGE.

THE SHADE OF DR. HAWTREY SPEAKS.

WAKED from my sleep on thy dear breast,
Etona, by some strange unrest
Thy hallowed stones I tread ;
Beholding startled, sad, dismayed,
The spot wherein my boyhood played,
My manhood ruled as Head.

A narrower, less pellucid air
Pervades thy courts and cloisters, where,
Scholars and gentlemen,
Of ampler thought, serener brow,
di' a'ftheros lamprotátou
ábrov 'ebafnomen.*

From these generations gone

Our hisping tongues to raise
The hoos of those deathless lays,
Of the golden days
Of Athens and of Rome.

Vanished is now that heavenly Choir ;
The thoughts that burn, the poet's fire
A colder age disdains ;
The mighty roll of Homer's verse
Gives way to German, French, or worse,
And Prose triumphant reigns.

Strange studies whose outlandish name
My shuddering lips refuse to frame
The place of Classics fill ;
Long Chamber is improved away,
King's Scholars gownless now may stray ;
The Brewery is still.

To "Absence" oft, to chapels more,
To schools far longer than of yore
Thy sad Alumni flock ;
More frequent "Pœnas" to be done,
More stern commands to "Come at one,"
And—shade of Keate, forgive them !—none
To worship at the block !

These changes, to an Eton mind
So rude, so needless and unkind,
I might perchance condone,
If but the Vandal's ruthless hand
Would let thine ancient buildings stand,
Would leave thy walls alone.

* These are two lines of Greek which for want of appropriate type we give in the Roman character. The spirits are still an insurmountable difficulty.—Printer.

But not the whirlwind of reform
E'en Upper School must wreathe in storm,
And desolation spread
O'er those old panels that enshrine,
Column on column, line on line,
The memories of thy dead.

What stories could those panels tell
Of sons of thine, who, through the spell
And magic of thy name,
In England's victories have bled,
Her fortunes ruled, her senates led,
O'er Letters, Art, Religion, shed
The lustre of thy fame !

The Library whose precincts yield
Some quiet hours from stream and field,
Whose wealth of lettered lore
Was mine to cherish and adorn,
Must know its place !

That home which Savile, Keate, and I,
Found good enough in days gone by,
Is this too doomed to fall,
And in one common ruin blend
Each old familiar gabled friend
Whose roofs in dear disorder trend
Down to the Sacred Wall !

If gentle Henry's holy shade
But dreamed the havoc to be made,
Not e'en the crack of doom
Would in more consternation call
His statue from its pedestal,
His spirit from its tomb !

Sons of our Gracious Mother, wake !
Ere yet the billows o'er her break,
Roll back the rising tide ;
That unborn ages may behold
On her high banner's blazoned fold
"Esto perpetua," still enrolled
The motto of her pride !

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

ON the 23rd July, Corporal McTaggart, of the King's Dragoon Guards, in endeavouring to quiet a disturbance in the regimental bazaar, struck one of the rioters. The man followed the Corporal and struck him with violence from behind, with a heavy blow from a club. McTaggart fell prostrate, but this did not satisfy the fellow's vengeance, who went on belabouring the poor corporal till two policemen rescued him and removed him to hospital. The assaulter was arrested.

WE read—

"Mr. Le Fanu, the new Collector of North Arcot, has reduced two sub-magistrates to posts on Rs. 20 per month for a gross miscarriage of justice, a tahsildar has been reduced to be a sub-magistrate, and a taluq sheristadar to be a revenue inspector."

These beggars must be ultra-sub-Magistrates. The pretence of payment may as well be dispensed with. The much despised "unpaid" are a better agency for justice than the paid magistracy.

THE Morning Post thus notices some recent mistakes in Indian names committed in the English press:—

A few days ago we noticed the ludicrous mutilation of Sir Theodore Hope's name by the English papers. We have another instance in the case of Sir T. Madhava Rao, who is referred to by several home journals (in connection with the report of the National Congress, which has been so widely discussed) as Sir T. "Mandesar" Row, Sir T. "Mandora" Row, and Sir T. "Madrasa" Row. More curious still is the manner in which the English press has wrestled with the name of the individual who is charged with abducting two Italian girls. He figures variously as the Prince de Chandernagore, which is right, "Chundermugger," Chandernagga, Chandermajor, and Chanderbanger, which are not quite correct.

THE City of Peace is famous for its discordant elements, and is hardly without an agitation of a kind. The present sensation is over an incident characteristic of the life of peace led by the citizens. The matter has gone to court before the local Magistrate, in the shape of a prosecution by a valuable person on his own precious person table to the phy. so many years.

THE widowed Empress Victoria of Germany will henceforth be known as the Empress-Queen Frederick. We cannot approve of the choice for our bereaved Imperial sister. Having so recently lost her lord and the crown, she hardly cares for the bagatelle of an empty title. But the Empire of the learned Germans ought certainly to exhibit a better example of philological propriety. A male name united to a noun feminine is Gothic absurdity.

ALL Ministers of religion, licensed to solemnize marriages under the Indian Christian Marriage Act XV of 1872, are to be Registrars of Births and Deaths, under Act VI of 1886, (which comes into force on the 1st October 1888) for their respective congregations, and in respect of all persons for whom they may perform the offices of baptism or burial. And all Sub-Registrars under Act III of 1877 are to be ex-officio Registrars of Births and Deaths under Act VI within their respective jurisdictions, both in regard to all persons affected by the Act other than those professing the Christian religion, and to all Christians who may apply to them for registration. The Registrar of Assurances, Calcutta, is also appointed a Registrar of Births and Deaths, within the Town of Calcutta, and authorised to exercise concurrent jurisdiction with Christian Ministers of religion.

IT is announced, on the authority of the Madras correspondent of a Bombay journal, that about 3,500 ounces of gold—the results of the crushing operations of June—have been despatched from Kolar last week via Bombay to London. The total yield from all the Kolar fields, from the commencement to date, is 54,000 ounces, worth £2,10,000. The Peninsular and Oriental steamers having for the present discontinued calling at Madras, the gold is now sent insured by the post office, by train, to Bombay, instead of to Madras, as before.

AN attorney of the High Court, Jogender Chunder Mookerjee, and associated in business with the Hon'ble Kallynath Mitter, has committed suicide. He chose a vacant house belonging to a relative, and taking charge of it in the absence of the Durwan who went to his master on business, bolted the door from inside and "lifted his guilty arm against his own sacred person." An empty phial smelling hydrocyanic acid was found by his side and a piece of paper with the word "Suicided" in his own hand.

"the Government is indemnified for its past actions. The naturalisation of Chinese will in future not be allowed, and all Chinese leaving the colony, except those naturalised therein will, on returning, be subject to the provisions of the Act. The number of Chinese to be brought to the colony by any single vessel is not to exceed the proportion of one Chinaman to every three hundred tons of burden. The poll tax is fixed at 100/., and the penalty for evasion at 50/. No Chinese arriving after the passing of the Act will be allowed to engage in mining without the authority of the Minister of Mines. Chinese who may have been born British subjects are not affected by the Bill."

MAJOR SCOTT, of the Gunpowder Factory, Ichapur, having obtained Government leave for one year, applied to the North Barrackpore Municipality, of which he is the head, for a similar privilege. The Commissioners, though willing, did not see their way to oblige the Chairman. They could, they said, under an interpretation of the law, overlook the absence of the Major for the said period or rather permit him to absent himself from the meetings of the Commissioners, and thus enable him to retain his Commissionership, but they found no authority to grant the leave asked for. Major Scott consequently resigned. The Commissioners then proceeded to elect his successor and they have fixed upon Mr. Keddie of the Shamnugger Mills. There was a proposition to elect Babu Surendranath Banerjee but the votes in his favor fell short of those for Mr. Keddie. Mr. Banerjee, to cover his discomfiture in his native town and recover countenance, next proposed the Vice-Chairman, who, however, with thanks to the Babu for the compliment, declined to stand.

JOHN VATHACUDDY, a widower, employed in the Wesleyan Mission in Kalutara, Ceylon, charged a boy, V. Thambyah, aged nineteen, with making him believe that he Thambyah had arranged a marriage for the widower with the boy's brother Nagalingam's daughter, whereas he meant his own sister, and further with criminal breach of trust by misapplication of Rs. 243 and some other moveable property entrusted to him. The Magistrate of Kaits found the charges true and committed the boy. The District Judge of Jaffna, agreeing with the committing Magistrate, sentenced Thambyah to one year's labor on both the charges. The Supreme Court, however, was of a different opinion, and, on appeal, set aside the conviction. The acting Puisne Justice, Mr. A. C. Lawrie, found the second charge not proved and considered Vathacuddy a fool to have believed the boy to have authority to arrange the marriage when the father of the bride was living. We quote the Judge's own words :

"The complainant says he made no inquiries about the girl, he did not know whether she was a Christian or a Sivite, nor whether she was to have a dowry or was penniless, and in this state of ignorance as to everything about his future bride, he went to Kaits.

The District Judge has found it proved that the accused led the complainant to believe (and induced him to go to Jaffna on the understanding) that he would be given the daughter of Nagalingam in marriage—that may be true, but the complainant knew well that the accused, a mere boy, had no power to bind his brother or his brother's daughter, nor does he say that anything more than a hope or expectation that the marriage would be arranged was held out. When the complainant arrived at the proposed bride's village, his appearance or manners do not seem to have pleased the relations and they would not consent. This was not the accused's fault. The accused indeed tried to do his best—tried to do too much for the complainant; for finding that the marriage with his niece could not be arranged, he wished to secure for him his own sister as a bride—there is nothing in the evidence to show that this lady was less eligible, less educated, less attractive than Nagalingam's daughter. I do not understand why the complainant who was willing to marry one lady whom he had never seen and knew nothing of, should have hesitated to marry another lady of the same family about whom he was equally ignorant."

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE House of Commons has passed the Special Commission Bill to enquire into Parnellism by a majority of 116 votes. The Irish members would not vote one way or the other. Many amendments were proposed by them but they were not accepted. Amendments proposed by the Home Secretary empowering the Commission to arrest persons failing to obey a summons and punish them for contempt were, however, rejected. The Commission constituted as near a court as necessary.

THE Select Committee on the Deccan Mining Company have presented their report. It is disappointing enough. Reuter reports:—

"August 4.—The report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the Deccan Mining Company's Concession was presented to the House of Commons last night. The report shows that the Company has now about 700 shareholders, and that 85,000 fully paid up shares were issued, of which 55,000 were sold to the public. The Commission does not express any opinion regarding the prospects of the Company, but mentions that 150 tons of coal are being raised weekly, and fine diamonds found. The Commission absolves Lord Lawrence, as it is of opinion that he acted in perfect good faith. It admits the competency of the Company to transfer shares to the Concessionaires, but doubts whether the same was the result contemplated by the Nizam's advisers. It suggests that the British Government might have given to the Nizam more effective advice and assistance. The Commission does not doubt the expediency of working the coal fields, &c.

"August 9.—The official report of the Select Committee on the Deccan Mining Company confirms the forecast telegraphed on the 4th instant. It also considers that there was no deficiency in the remuneration which had been given them (the Concessionaires) for their previous services that entitled them to the mining concession. The Concessionaires used the concession for the realisation of great gains which were not intended for them, and this was done to the injury of the Nizam's State, with the assistance of Abdul Huk. In conclusion, the report deprecates direct communication between Native States and speculators."

Sir Roper Lethbridge talked of an enquiry to enable officials implicated to clear themselves.

SIR JOHN GORST produced the Indian Budget on the 9th. Mr. Bradlaugh suggested a Committee, including natives, to enquire into the administration of India. Mr. Maclean deprecated the idea as that would raise prolonged and incessant political agitation. He, however, gave out his own recipe for India's good. He would reduce the India Council, limiting the appointment of members to five years.

Sir W. C. Plowden moved, as a measure of economy, an amendment with a view to admit Natives to the highest posts and to favour the suppression of the military commands of Madras and Bombay. It had very scant support and was rejected by 105 against 36 votes.

Burma still continues a drain on the Indian exchequer, and Sir John Gorst explained that the Government expected to be able to impose a land tax at its full rate within 5 years of the annexation, and that the revenue of Burma was already increasing by £3,00,000.

THE Calcutta Municipal Bill is inadmissible in its present form. It will be remanded. The Viceroy objects to the wording of about half a dozen sections. Whatever the result, Calcutta feels that Lord Dufferin has not treated the people's complaint cavalierly.

LORD DUFFERIN leaves Simla in the middle of November, arrives in Calcutta on the 1st December, makes over charge to Lord Lansdowne on the 8th, and takes his last farewell on the 10th.

THE Government of Bombay has overwhelmed the country with a greater surprise than the arrest of Mr. Arthur Crawford, Commissioner of the Central Division, for his trial before the ordinary criminal courts, by its subsequent revocation of sanction for prosecution and withdrawal of charges. The case was to have come on on the 16th, but on the 9th, on application of the Government solicitor, Mr. Crawford was discharged under sec. 494 of the Criminal Procedure Code. This news is coupled with the further intelligence that Mr. Crawford goes on two years' furlough immediately, preparatory to his final retirement from the Service.

THEY are agitating in the Central Provinces against the proposed transfer of territory to Bombay, to recoup her for the loss of Sind in the event of its being united with the Punjab. A strong memorial, signed by thousands of the residents of the Nagpur division, has been presented to the Chief Commissioner. Others are pouring in from various parts of the Provinces. District Boards and Municipal Committees are passing resolutions to the same effect. A strong feeling exists throughout the Provinces against the proposed abolition of the local Government. There is no reason to doubt the genuineness of the sentiment. In view of the approaching revision of the settlement, the people may well regard with grave concern the possibility of their being brought under the rigorous and uncongenial revenue system of Bombay.

THE long and much-heralded "Ramasami"—an Autobiography of the life and adventures of the depredations of a notorious Manomedan adventurer" living in the French territory of Karikal, in the Tanjore District. He has taken to printing and publishing cheap editions of the books most in demand in the District and undersells the Copyright authors or proprietors—whether private individuals or Government. Gradually, he has largely extended his operations, emboldened by the listlessness of Government.

THE Jagat Seth of the Bombay Khojas is dead. A leading Khoja merchant, Dhurmsey Poonjabhoy was constituted "Chowdhuri" over the whole Khoja community of Western India, by His Highness the late Aga Khan, who invested him with the title of Seth. The first of the Khojas who was created a Justice of the Peace, he finished with being a member of the committee appointed by Government for drawing up a draft Code of Inheritance for the Khojas. He was an active man of business, respected throughout the mercantile world of Bombay, both native and European. His business was extensive even in Bombay, and on a scale without a parallel among our countrymen on this side. The Dhurmsey Poonjabhoy Spinning Mill at Coorla, which he established and long owned and managed, was, and still is, the largest in India. The management of this great business did not exhaust or engross him, and he got up, one after another, many other companies in the same line. At one time, he managed as many as six separate concerns, including the Dhurmsey Poonjabhoy—now the Swadeshi Mill. We commend the example to the men of Bengal, though we do not wish to see our wealthy youth ruin themselves by embarking in enterprises for which they have no aptitude and for which they have not acquired the necessary knowledge and training.

THE old delusion that the Indians are confined to India or at most Continental Asia, has received a knock-down blow. The Madras Government is advertising the post of a Tamil interpreter for the Supreme Court in Natal. We read in the Hindu that a Tamil

Brahman, a graduate, in the service of the Madras Government, has offered his services, not unconditionally though. His young wife has agreed to follow his lord and his fortunes in the distant land, but he is anxious to be sure of a place in the service of his own Government on his return from Natal. He has therefore asked to be admitted of the Statutory Civil Service on coming back, "as an inducement to his voluntary exile of not less than five years, and his example in breaking through caste and local prejudices."

WE take from the Indian Daily News :—

"Mr. R. Proctor Sims has been appointed member of the Council of the Thakore Sahib of Bhownugger, in Kattywar. This is the first instance of a European gentleman being placed on a Council of a Native State, and of the appointment at the same time carrying such popular feeling with it. Mr. Proctor Sims, like Mr. R. F. Chisholm and Mr. Stevens, was a Government engineer originally. Mr. Sims has been State Engineer at Bhownugger for many years, and in that capacity has done much useful work. He is now Minister for Public Works, head of the Municipality, Superintendent of Horse-breeding Operations, Superintending and Executive Engineer, Justice of the Peace, General English Secretary, and everything else of public utility to the State. The natives love him as a friend and adjudicator, while the Chief of Bhownugger respects him as a father. Men of this stamp in the British political service would work wonders for the advancement of British rule in India. They might be as successful as Griffins and Corderys."

Here is a veritable Crichton—admirable or not! M. Sims is the very Atlas of officials—a Prince of Pluralists. We fear the Thakore is spoiling him. Mr. Sims's danger lies in the direction of trespassing and overdoing.

It is not only necessary to know the maxim, Each to his own, Ne sutor &c., but also to remember that Hercules himself was restricted to twelve labours.

MR. J. B. PENNINGTON, Madras Civil Service, has given up his appointment in disgust for the strictures passed on his recommendation for remissions of revenue in Tanjore owing to the heavy floods of 1887. There's a dear, dear man, with feelings of a gentleman! Usual officials stick like leeches and show no disposition to drop off after having sucked their fill. Old Billy Pennington, the Madras Judge, reports that the year a tax was levied on the land, and the determination not to go out, in disregard of all, the Service by voluntary action.

THE official who has gone to Ceylon to recover countenance might have spared himself the trouble. It seems he might have found a refuge in the cheap defence of the nation—the unpaid, but not on that account the despised, soldiery of the Empire. We are told that a man who was turned out of the Customs for cheating Government has been made a Captain. What wonder? Our correspondent asks, Are the defenders of the country thieves? We hope not. The matter, at any rate, cannot be so bad. Upon general principles, indeed, one must expect the inalienable drawbacks of cheapness. We are not permitted to look a gift horse in the mouth.

HAJI MIRZA HOSSEIN KULI KHAN, well-known at Bombay, where he was, for many years, off and on, Consul-General of Persia, has gone to Washington as the Shah's Plenipotentiary in the United States. His place in India has been taken by a Prince of the Blood. Haji Mirza Mahomed Hoosein Khan, who succeeds as Consul-General at Bombay, is a grandson of the late King Fateh Ali Shah, and son of H. R. H. Mirza Mahomed Khan, Foreign Minister.

We well remember Mirza Hossein Kuli Khan who came to Calcutta many years since and took up his quarters at the Parsee Bagan in Circular Road. His appearance is not prepossessing. The Persian expression of suspiciousness was not diluted by the clear Persian complexion. On the contrary, a dark countenance was rendered more sinister by a broad circular scar in each face. How this was caused we did not hear; it looked like a clean cut, by a sharp sword, of a slice off the cheek, suggesting unpleasant visions of cruel Eastern punishments and of the pastimes of royalty. He was a man of ability and even information. He had even then been several times to Europe and spoke and wrote French, but not English. He must have since learnt English.

MR. MACLEAN, M. P. for the Bombay Gazette, supplies an anecdote which throws light on the amenities of Parliamentary intercourse. After a late speech that he had been delivering at a county meeting in which he had attacked Mr. Gladstone,

"Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett was accosted in the lobby by a well-known member of the Parnellite Party—not a 'leader,' by the way, as I think even Mr. Lucy would be inclined to admit—with the complimentary salutation 'Ashmead-Bartlett, you are an adjectived fool!' The Civil Lord of Admiralty, who is not a person to be trifled with, was, as may be supposed, extremely indignant, and he warmly replied, 'You are drunk, sir.' The Parnellite member rejoined, 'I tell you, Ashmead-Bartlett, that you are an adjectived fool!' Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, more enraged than ever, said 'Please not to address me, sir, you are drunk.' He spoke with so much vehemence that an ordinary man would have been cowed, but the Irish representative referred to is not an ordinary man; and he was determined to have the last word. 'Yes, I am drunk,' he said, 'and to-morrow morning I shall be sober, but you will still be an adjectived fool!'"

In the go-ahead colonies they would have slanged and damned each other in style, in France Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett would have challenged his tormenter, in America he would have scalped or shot him dead in the floor of the House.

MANY Europeans who might know better allow themselves a cheap satisfaction at the absurdities, real or made to order, of "those native boys, you know." We have much pleasure in presenting to them Master John Bull of famous London town. A very fair specimen of enlightened British boyhood is John Green. A lad of fourteen who had passed the fifth standard at St. Patrick's School, in Stamford-street, he behaved like a very Topsy at a coroner's inquest lately held at Blackfriars. The following edifying dialogue took place between the coroner and the witness—Green, to be sure:—"If you tell a lie, where will you go? Answer: To church.—Do you know where people go when they die? Answer: To church.—If you tell a lie, whom do you offend? Answer: My master (meaning his employer).—Can you repeat the Lord's Prayer? Answer: Only the first part of it.—Who is "our Father which art in heaven?" Answer: The devil."

That beats all the Niggers—genuine and constructive.

It is a natural curiosity to know how the late successive misfortunes of Germany in the death of her Emperors have been regarded in France. It is a curious attitude of the French to be worthy of the nation's chivalry. Here is a Frenchman's view of Frederick III, the late Emperor of Germany, which may be pretty fairly typical:—

The Emperor Frederick III—who recently died—ascended the throne of the kingdom of Prussia and the Empire of Germany on the 9th March 1888.

He lived 57 years, having been born on the 18th October 1831, but hardly reigned 3 months.

It is scarcely a year since the Emperor Frederick, then Prince Imperial of Germany, was apprised of the gravity of his state. He counted by his medical advisers the chances of recovery; but learning that they were almost nil, said 'Well, I shall await the summons from Heaven.' Since the day in which he pronounced that lofty and melancholy word, his resignation and firmness of mind never failed him. We wish to render to his memory this justice—we who have counted him among the most redoubtable warriors of Germany during the struggle of 1870-71, but who place truth above all things and who know how to appreciate the simple and calm courage wherever it is found. M. de Bismarck, with that intemperance of language and disdain of expediency, which are astonishing in a man of such worth, said one day that the French nation detests the entire country of Germany. He was mistaken. France has sometimes betrayed her temper from anger and contempt, for certain acts and proceedings which were revolting to her most cherished sentiments, but veritable hatred—a hatred cold, persistent, implacable, she rarely feels. Misfortune has dismantled, but heroism still charms her.

If it were otherwise, would she have shown during these last months, so much respect, nay, even sympathy for him who penetrated into our territory in 1870 at the head of our invaders, for him who twice the successful adversary of Marshal Macmahon, gave us the first blow at Reichshoffen and the finishing blow at Sedan? Say if any other people would have so easily laid aside the souvenirs so sore!

Fox, in the English Parliament, hearing the death of Pitt—his eternal adversary, forgot 20 years of rivalry, in order to give a free vent to the generosity of his heart and repeated the words of the poet:—

"Sunt lacrymæ rerum et nitem mortalia tangunt."

France has not waited for his death that she might do him justice. She has received few things from him during so short a reign. She has not made him responsible for that odious and grotesque affair of passports about which he must have been insufficiently enlightened. She has not expected from a man whose days were numbered, and whose powers declined every day—the energy both physical and intellectual which would have been necessary to triumph over certain resistance and to stamp on the policy of the German Empire a character veritably new."

THE Lieutenant-Governor is on tour through his territory. To-night, nevertheless, he will sleep in his state bed in his official Palace, having entered it by the backdoor as it were.

There has been no particular record in the papers of the late journey. His Honor was absent a full fortnight, performing the programme previously published. There was perhaps one slight departure only, in that he went to Uluberia. It was understood that the Lieutenant-Governor would not be in the neighbourhood till Friday the 27th. In point of fact, however, His Honor leaving Calcutta the previous day, anchored at its close in the river off AchEEPore. The Sub-Divisional officer was equal to the occasion. He immediately altered his arrangements, and, by dint of extraordinary exertions, succeeded in making a grand demonstration. That very afternoon, the town awaited the approach of the Governor's steam launch in holiday attire in the shape of evergreen and bunting. In the evening, all Uluberia was ablaze with light—with a profusion of lamps artfully disposed and combined—lamps in every house and shop, besides two banks of light throughout the length of the populous part of the town shoring the Grand Canal of this Venice la petite of Rural Bengal with its architecture of the mud and bamboo order. Next morning, the Lieutenant-Governor landed. There had been no sufficient intimation for getting up an address, but the omission was more than made up by the two interesting little daughters of the Deputy Magistrate, at the head of the leading men, receiving His Honor with a bouquet, in return for which Sir Steuart, with gracious chivalry, kissed the girls.

Proceeding up, His Honor was received by the Tumlook officials and notables at Dainan, on the frontier of the Midnapore District, where a triumphal arch was constructed of green leaves and bunting, and the party were received.

One incident of the visit to Midnapore may be mentioned as of an exceptional nature. It is said that a party of native women attempted to approach His Honor in his walk. They were prevented by the Police, but Sir Steuart told his men not to interfere. The poor women approached and handed a petition. His Honor received it, saying he would look into it. They are Hindu gwalins—milk women.

WE have to apologise to our readers for the many errors of the press, which, in the haste in which the last number was issued, crept into it. Those in the leaderette on page 305, make sad havoc with the sense. To begin with, "stray thoughts from Bengal" is printed without the inverted commas. In the paragraph of comment on the first long extract, read bleak for black (,) midst for mind (,) gems for genius (.)

A PROFESSOR of the Presidency College was early this week assaulted in his chair by a punkah coolie.

BYRON's grand apostrophe to the sea may be read for many years with delight, just as we read without childlike simplicity Greek fairy tales. But his idea of the sea as an impregnable stronghold, impervious to attack by puny man, is now a poetic myth almost of the category of Campbell's wooden walls. Man's power stops no more on the shore than on the bank. Nothing seems to stop it. More than ever the boast of Napoleon holds good that there is no impossibility. Human skill and resources have been demonstrated in a variety of interesting ways. The real wonders of our times have put to the shade the mythical Wonders, and they may be multiplied many times seven. The Atlantic is now practically a Mediterranean Lake between two continents. The stupendous Alps, which stopped the march of the invader to Italy, has been perforated by the railway. And now the steep Cataract of the West is to be—harnessed. The Niagara is to be reduced to work out dividends for a syndicate of money-makers. To put the best face upon the matter, the idea is to utilise a part of the immense power which there has been going to waste for ages. This is one of the boldest schemes yet attempted. "The idea is to construct a tunnel from the water level below the Falls, about 200 feet under the high bank of the river, extending through the rock of the Upper Niagara River, at a point one mile above the falls, where a head of 120 feet is obtained. The tunnel is then to extend, parallel with the shore of the river, one and a half miles, at an average depth of 100 feet, below the surface of the earth, and at a distance of about 400 feet from the navigable water of the river with which it is to be connected by means of conduits or lateral tunnels. The power is to be obtained from the conduits leading to the main tunnel, and not from the tunnel itself or from the falls. Along the line of the tunnel 238 mills, of 500 horse-power each, can be established. The estimated cost of construction of the tunnel is £6,00,000."

The spirit of lucre could no farther go. What a degradation is in store for all the movements of beauty and grandeur of Nature! But the age of Chivalry is gone, that of economists and calculators is come, and glory and grace and feeling are fled for ever!

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 11, 1888.

THE EDUCATION RESOLUTION NO DEPARTURE.

We hasten to reassure our countrymen and reason with the formators of opinion among them. So far as we know and can judge, there is no change of front in the Government. It is, therefore, no small pity the Resolution on education, recently put forward by the Government of India, in accordance with the orders of the Secretary of State, should have received so signal a misinterpretation from the native press. Some of our contemporaries have understood the Resolution as marking a new departure in the educational policy of the Government, and that henceforth the obligations, which had so long rested on the State with regard to the promotion of education, were peremptorily and suddenly to cease. This view of the Resolution, taken by the native press, has naturally created something like a panic in the mind, and we have seen some of the best educated and most distinguished officers employed in the educational service itself, talk of the Resolution as ominous of disastrous effects upon the future of, at any rate, the higher education in the country. We must confess we have carefully read the document, and failed to find anything in it to support such an interpretation. It is a clear, comprehensive and masterly exposition of the state and progress of education at the present time, and, in addition, an embodiment of those broad lines of educational policy which have, from the first, guided the State in its dealings with the subject. We find no departure—indeed nothing new—for which there is no warrant in the great Education Despatch of the Court of Directors or the Report of the Education Commission.

The paragraph in the Resolution, which has given rise to the alarming misapprehensions now agitating native society, only reaffirms the old policy, viz., that the efforts of the Government in the matter of education should have for their main object to call forth and develop a spirit of self-help among the people by giving them, through purely Government institutions, a taste for education, and knowledge of its value, so that the Government might gradually retire from the field, provided there was no danger of any disruption to the work from such gradual retirement. This is the fundamental principle of the Education Despatch of 1854, and this principle read in connection with the proviso, is placed by all subsequent State instruments on too secure a basis for any fears of its abandonment now or hereafter. That the Resolution before us contemplates no such abandonment will, we hope, now be obvious, from inter-

"The Government of India recognizes its responsibility to provide, so far as its finances permit, facilities for the education of the people. But in educational, as in all other matters, it is the policy of the Government of India to avoid entering into competition with private enterprise; it pioneers the way; but, having shown the way, it recognizes no responsibility to do for the people what the people can and ought to do for themselves. When, therefore, local effort or private enterprise shows itself able and willing to supply the educational wants of the people in any locality, it is the policy of Government to retire from the field of direct instruction and to help by reasonable subventions of money the operations of independent institutions. Under this policy, it is the aim of the Government also, wherever there is vitality of private effort, to restrict official action to the maintenance of a few schools, in which the system of instruction and discipline shall afford a standard for the emulation of private or aided institutions in the neighbourhood. In pursuance of this policy, the expenditure from Provincial revenues on Government educational institutions should not ordinarily increase in proportion to the total expenditure, but should, rather, be a constantly diminishing quantity, provided that there is the assurance that the ground abandoned by the Government is occupied by local effort."

The proviso which we have italicised ought to be re-assuring. The policy laid down in the above words is no new policy. If it were read in conjunction with a liberal interpretation of this saving clause, we are persuaded, there would not have been all the outcry which has been raised against the Government of India. The paragraph may also be understood in connection with what goes before, and in this connection its innocuousness will be still more apparent. The preceding paragraph only summarises the financial aspect of the subject, and is as follows:—

"Passing from the statistics of attendance at the various classes of Indian Schools and Colleges to the expenditure on education, we find that in 1881-82 the total expenditure on public instruction in India was, in round numbers, 186 lakhs of rupees. Four years later (in 1885-86) the total had risen to 240 lakhs; and last year it stood at a little over 252 lakhs. At the beginning of the five years, the Government bore 73 lakhs of this expenditure, the Municipal funds contributing 113 lakhs, and the Public 100 lakhs. In the year 1885-86, the Government share was 84½ lakhs, the Municipal funds 117½ lakhs, and the Public 100 lakhs. The share assigned to Local bodies, however, is not entirely of local taxation, but includes an item of 4½ lakhs contributed by the Government; so that in effect the share of Government at the end of the five years stood at about 84½ lakhs. Next year the shares are 84½ lakhs for Government, 49 lakhs for Local and Municipal Boards, and 117½ lakhs for the Public. But of the 49 lakhs expended by Local bodies, 6½ were contributed by Government; so that there has been a progressive increase in the Government expenditure. The Governor-General in Council considers that the growth of the share borne by Local bodies should for the future exhibit a more marked increase than it has done since 1885; and that there should be a tendency to decrease rather than to increase in the share which now is defrayed from the public treasury."

Surely, the whole tenor of the above is far from alarming. All that the Government claims is some slight relief to the exchequer of the State, now that private enterprise and Local Funds have already commenced to bear their fair share of the responsibility for education. The moderation and justice of the claim must be admitted, while it is put forward with no airs of insolence of race or peremptoriness of power—without, indeed, the slightest trace of harshness.

In justice, however, to the native press, we must say that the educational policy of the Government has always been a subject of anxious interest in this country. Our people are remarkably sore on the question, and not unnaturally, with their time-honored traditions of State and feudal endowments for educational purposes. It is scarcely any wonder, therefore, that, whenever there has been any new discussion in official circles of the education policy of the Government, there has been much alarm created amongst our countrymen. The present outcry is by no means the first of its kind.

Nor, perhaps, is the cause of education quite so safe, after all. The proviso is, indeed, very clean, and imposes effective limitations on the will of the Government, if at any time it were adverse to education. A secret desire to curtail the educational expenditure, in disregard of those limitations, may not sometimes be wanting in, at any rate, a particular section of our officials. We find, accordingly, that no less a man than the President of the Education Commission and a member himself of the Finance Committee protesting in strong and even bitter terms of the Finance Committee's proposals for the relinquishment of some of our colleges. The subject is so important that we give Dr. Hunter's protest so far as it bears on high education:—

"The Education Commission desired that Government should gradually make over higher education to private and aided effort. But it clearly realised and carefully set forth the limitations under which this could be effected: and specifically mentioned the Colleges in Bengal which the Government might thus relinquish. The 'well-considered proposals' of the Commission on this head were emphatically accepted by the Government of India.

The proposal of the Travelling Members is very different. They begin by saying that there are at present thirteen colleges in Bengal, and in the course of three short paragraphs they cut these down to three. 'The Director of Public Instruction,' they say, 'informs us that in his opinion only four colleges need be kept up—the Presidency, Dacca, Patna, and Cuttack. We think that the Government might even go further, and decide that a Government College is not needed at Dacca, where an unaided private institution already exists and flourishes.' This 'opinion' of the Director of Public Instruction is so entirely opposed to all that he has said and written during many years, that I thought it my duty to ascertain from Sir Alfred Croft whether it correctly states what he expressed. He says that it does not. That he was never asked whether reduction was advisable at all; but only as to the 'irreducible minimum.' The proposal to leave only three out of the thirteen Government Colleges in Bengal has no more the support of the Director of Public Instruction than it has the authority of the Education Commission. If enforced by the Government of India, it will raise an outcry of broken pledges, endowments diverted, and fundamental orders of the Secretary of State contravened, such as no Local Government should be called upon to face. The change, even if spread over ten years, would be a complete bouleversement of the system of Public Instruction founded on Lord Halifax's Despatch; and re-affirmed, after searching enquiry, and after more than a quarter of a century's practical experience, by the Education Commission, Government of India, and the Secretary of State.

In regard to the gradual replacement of an old growth by a new one, in both cases the method of the Travelling Members of the Committee is to pluck up the old growth by its roots. This is a method in both cases, in unacquaintance with the facts, and unduly apprehension as to the financial results."

This elicited an equally emphatic rejoinder from Sir Charles Eliot, President of the Finance Committee. Sir Charles resents Dr. Hunter's remarks and says:—

"With regard to Bengal the Committee's view was (1) that the staff of highly paid English Inspectors of Schools was unnecessarily strong, and that cheaper Native Inspectors should be substituted, and (2) that a considerable number of Government Colleges should be converted into Aided Colleges; and arrangements were suggested by which preparation should be made for carrying out such a conversion and substitution gradually during the next ten years. These proposals were in accordance with the recommendations of the Education Commission and the orders of the Government of India. The Lieutenant-Governor has already converted two and desires immediately to convert three more of the Government Colleges into Aided Colleges; the Committee proposed, within the next ten years, to add five more to this number. It is open to Sir W. Hunter to object that ten years is too short a time or that the reduction goes too far; but it is hardly reasonable to write of our proposal as an ignorant attempt to 'pluck up the old growth by the roots.'

With reference to Sir W. Hunter's assertion that this Committee misrepresented the views of the Director of Public Instruction, it is sufficient to say that his own version of that officer's view does not bear out the charge. The Committee did not write that the Director wished to keep up only four Government Colleges, but that 'in his opinion only four colleges need be kept up.' These words were taken down by the President in his notes of Mr. Croft's examination, and the draft of the section was afterwards shown to Mr. Croft and approved by him. If I understand the matter aright, all that Sir A. Croft now desires to add in explanation is, that this opinion was given in answer to the question, 'if reductions are to be made' (an assumption which underlies the whole work of the Finance Committee) 'where should they stop?' and that he held this to be the furthest limit to which it could be pushed.

With regard to Bombay, Sir W. Hunter's chief objection is that the reduction proposed by the Committee 'involves the forfeiture of distinct pledges recently given by the Local Government under the sanction of the Governor General in Council.' The description is incorrect in two ways: the pledges referred to were not given under the sanction of the Governor General in Council (as is expressly stated in paragraph 30 of Resolution No. 467, dated 28th January 1887), and our proposals did not involve the forfeiture of them.

* * * It may perhaps be permitted to me to add that whatever reductions we proposed were made neither lightly, nor in ignorance of any facts or opinions which we were able to collect, but under a strong sense of responsibility, and in the belief that they would not injuriously affect the efficiency of the Educational Departments in the various Provinces."

When there is misunderstanding on the question among officials themselves of such high rank, our countrymen may well be justified in their suspicions. The truth seems to be that there is no want of disposition on the part of some of our governing Bureaucracy and of even some official statesmen, to make Government wash its hands off all connection with Education. But their hands are fettered, and they are not masters of their will. There is, however, no cause for panic—no necessity for taking premature alarm. Under any circumstances, no departure in educational policy is contemplated by the Government.

HONORS IN GENERAL AND THE FELLOWS IN PARTICULAR.

A CRY FOR UNIVERSITY REFORM.

Oh! that estates, degrees, and offices
Were not deriv'd corruptly; and that clear honor
Were purchas'd by the merit of the wearer!
How many then should cover that stand bare,
How many be commanded that command!

Were honor done to him to whom honor is due and titles bestowed exclusively on high achievements and intrinsic worth, how immense would be the stimulus to progress and to what a prodigious discount would lickspittlism be reduced. Ours, however, is a Government which, though professing to walk by the light of public opinion, disposes of titles and honors according to a principle of which the people have not the least knowledge, and of which the less said the better. We see in the Who's Who and Who's Who's Directory. Some are no doubt distinguished, but regarding the rest, we wonder, as in the old play, how they got there! Honors have, in our knowledge, been bestowed most capriciously on men without character, sense of honor or truth—on liars, cheats and pettifoggers—on thieves, assassins and rebels. Honors have indeed been so much dishonored that sterling merit unhonored is honored the most. By creating a craze for titles—craze which has already grown to a disease—the Government may destroy the true moral nerve and fibre of the nation, but it is not in its power to ennoble the ignoble, to make inferior men pass for more than what they are worth.

What can ennoble fools, or sots, or cowards?
Alas! not all the blood of all the Howards.
Nor all the ribbon and sealing wax of Princes.
Pygmies are pigmies still, though perched on Alps;
And pyramids are pyramids in vales.
Each man makes his stature, builds himself.

One may succeed in his attempt at extracting sunbeams out of cucumbers, but the problem as to why certain persons are honored in preference to others, the lachets of whose shoes they are not worthy to unloose, defies solution.

It is much to be lamented that the Fellowships of the Calcutta University should have all along been looked upon as a titular dignity and been given away on the same official line as the C. S. I. and C. I. E., instead of on academical grounds. If you happen to be born of one of the few blessed families of the Empire, or be an adept in the art of insinuating yourself into the good graces of the powers that be, you are born a legislator, a magistrate, a corporator, a savant, a fellow, anything you like—you are like Hamlet's ghost hic et ubique.

Some of the conscript fathers of our academical Senate often remind us of the equine consul of Tiberius and make us exclaim—

A fellow, an honorable name!
How few deserve it, how many claim!

The world knows nothing of these Bœotian toad-eaters; but perhaps they are great on that account, for "the world," says

Sir Henry Taylor, "knows nothing of its greatest men." Their names shed no lustre on the roll of Fellows—or, if they shed any, it makes darkness visible. Useful, they are certainly not; neither are they even ornamental. Is it not a simple disgrace to the University that fools who have never done anything anywhere worthy of record or remembrance, should be allowed to rush in where angels fear to tread? It must be said to the credit of some of these fools, that, however overweening their ambition may be, they never aspired to be dons; but they are somebody's darlings who must have kicked them up to a position for which they have absolutely no qualifications. They rose one fine morning and found themselves metamorphosed into saravants.

But since once a fellow one must continue to be such to the end of the chapter, we must endure, with such grace as we can command, good, bad or indifferent, what cannot be cured. Not that the law stands in the way of the removal of the odd fellows, but that the admission of one's own mistake and rectification of the same require an amount of moral courage with which the Government is not credited. But one thing is needful. We ought to make a supreme effort that the few worthy men there are among the dons, may not be altogether swamped by the noodles. How can we effect our object better than by cutting the evil at the root—by curing the Government of the fatal disease of which it, along with many other Governments of the world, is peculiarly susceptible—we mean the dread of talents—and by "purging its visual ray of the thick film," so that it may not mistake roguery for ability. Agitation—no Surrender Notian agitation to be sure, which, like "a tale told by an idiot is full of sound and fury signifying nothing" and which, as such, passes by the Government as the "gentle breeze which it respects not"—is an omnipotent physician, and we must have recourse to it.

But dunces or scholars, how many of the dons take any interest in matters educational or take part in the proceedings of the Senate? How many even of the metropolitan Fellows regularly attend the meetings of the Faculties—not to speak of those that live far off, in the interior of Provinces. But what shall we say of a Government which appoints as Fellows the residents of the remotest parts of the Empire, knowing it for a fact, indeed they cannot, participate in the deliberations of the Senate, and take any more interest in the affairs of the University than the people of Timbuctoo. It may be news to not a few of the readers of Reis and Rayyet that our educational Parliament counts among its members about 30 residents of the N. W. Provinces and Oude, 9 of the Punjab, 3 of Rajputana, 2 of Assam, 1 of Hyderabad, 3 of the Central Provinces, 1 of Bombay, 3 of Burma and 1 of Central India; while so many as about 20 members, though residents of Bengal, living as they do in the country, can render the University no service whatever; of the rest there are not a few who have made a point of having nothing to do with the University, though they will not resign. After all this, who will have the hardihood to deny that the Government makes selection of Fellows not with an eye to service but to honor people with new titles. For now that the schoolmaster is abroad, is there any lack of learned men in Bengal that the Government should go so far as to the scientific frontier of Lord Lytton on one side and the jungly banks of the Irrawady on the other, in quest of men fit to wear the mantle of a don? But it is the day of the publican and sinner, of the lackey and flunkey, of the pander and noodle. There are men—and their name is legion—nearer home who might help in giving tone to the Senate, but they have exactly the talents and acquirements of which bureaucrats are jealous, and some of them may be formidable by genius itself! Or, men like Robert Knight, James Wilson, S. E. J. Clarke, Pratap Chunder Mozumdar, Lal Mohun Ghosh, T. Palit, Umes Chandra Dutt (late professor, Kishnaghur College) Iswar Chandra Mitra, Surendra Nath Banerjee, Prasanna Kumar Laheri, Ashu Tosh Mookerjee, (1st Prem Chand Roy Chand Student,) R. C. Chandra, K. D. Ghosh, K. P. Gupta, Jogendra Nath Bhattacharjee, Dino Nath Sen, Syama Charan Ganguli, Bani Madhab Dey and, last not least, the accomplished poet who will always be remembered as Ram Shurma, would not have been left out in the cold, to the injury of the education of the country.

Now that the representative principle has received recognition in many spheres of public life, and the Acts for the two recent Universities recognise the elective principle in the composition of those bodies, the Fellows being no longer appointed entirely by nomination but in part also by election, and a bill to the same effect is on the legislative anvil of the Bombay Presidency, why should the affairs of the Calcutta University alone continue to be governed by an Act passed 32 years ago? Has not the march of intellect reached Bengal? Why should the residents of the N. W. P. and Oude and the Punjab continue to be Fellows of the Calcutta University now that they have got separate Universities of their own, and those of the fellows who do not take any interest whatever in the affairs of the University be sent about their business? Why, again, should the ratio of European and Native Fellows in Bengal be 3:2 while that in Bombay is 8:7?

There is another thing in connection with the University which should engage the serious attention of every one interested in the cause of education. If the Calcutta University is an examining body, the Syndics must be taught that they have not been given conscience, "a capability and god-like reason to fust in them unus'd" or it had better cease to exist. What a scandalous farce of an examination we have had for the last few years! We say last few years advisedly, for who knows that the slaughter of the innocents that took place in '85 and '86 and the fact of an unprecedentedly large number of boys having passed in the Jubilee year were not due to the dishonest freaks played by some of the examiners. Some few years ago the Headmaster of the Uttarpara school dragged to light certain scandals, and no less a personage than Principal Sarbadhikari was caught tripping; who knows that there have not been other black sheep in the flocks who have passed off as immaculate because uncaught? But are not the recent revelations in connection with the perfunctory manner in which some of the examiners discharged their duties sufficiently startling to take one's breath away? So many as 8 of them, both European and native—all graduates and professors—assigned marks without reading the answer papers, or marked the answers in a faulty and culpably careless manner! But bad enough, sad enough and disgraceful enough as the statement is, there is another statement, even worse, more sad, more disgraceful, if possible, than these men—men did we say? God made the world, let them pass for men—though they had been the special committee appointed to enquire into the matter as reported by Messrs. Little and Nasir, the senior examiners—have been reappointed as examiners, on the recommendation of the gentlemen, whose report, like Achilles' spear, at the wound which it inflicts. The Syndicate has not a soul to be saved or a body to be kicked, but how shall we characterize the conduct of Mr. Nash who must be presumed to have both? He is too muscular a Christian to be made a coward of by conscience. He overflows with the milk of human kindness which does credit to him no doubt, but then he ought to know that nothing emboldens sin so much as mercy, and that mercy at the expense of the poor examinees is simply unjust, not to say, wicked and mischievous. Perhaps, the funniest part of the University scandal is the ground offered for tenderness. One gentleman was recommended to be reappointed as an examiner, and why? because, forsooth, he was "fairly careful" when he re-examined the papers!

O judgment, thou art fled to brutish beasts,
And men have lost their reason!

What wonder then that the boys of the period should have deteriorated in morals when not a few of their preceptors, to whose tender mercies they have been committed, are men of such easy virtue and accommodating conscience! Surely, it is time enough for a thorough overhauling, without personal regards. We hope the country will combine in a cry for prompt University Reform.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION IN INDIA.

Continuing my last re technical education, which appeared in your issue of the 4th current, I would further suggest the advisability of opening institutions of the kind named, in the following places, viz., Barakur, Jubbulpur, Rawal Pindi and Lahore.

The first named place has a large workshop, owned by Government, turning out a lot of iron work manufactured there, especially iron castings. It is not unlikely that by and by Barakur will be a junction station, when the Nagpore line is completed.

As we find that a growing tendency amongst men of respectable and literary class to master mechanism someway or other, it can be safely said, without fear of challenge, that more the scheme is expanded, the more will the aptitude for scientific pursuits be increased, and the country will most decidedly benefit in the end.

Expediency tells us to strongly advocate the cause for furthering the object, seeing the very great improvement made of late years by the lower grade native working classes of the soil, such as "Koiburto," "Manjee," "Sutgoup," "Chandal," and others by practical learning alone. Some of them turn out capital workmen and mechanics, so as to be able to disconnect an engine and put her together, and others handle important parts of machinery and finish them off, in a creditable manner, such as fitting slide valves motions, eccentric sheaves, axle boxes, brasses, &c., and other work too numerous to detail. It is a well known fact that Monghyr is famous for production of a superior class of work, purely made by Behar workmen, such as ebony chairs, abluce fancy boxes, sticks of sorts, fans, rifle guns and swords, &c. All these indicate, without the least shadow of a doubt, that had these men theoretical knowledge in addition to the limited practical experience they now possess, they would make much better mechanics.

Under the existing circumstances, notwithstanding that the people now do get liberal English education, there is a general demand for greater field of honorable livelihood. Hence the object of my ventilating the matter, through the medium of your journal, not that my aim is only to seek, for people at large, either the State or Railway service, but I do sincerely advocate for the sake of profession also. Although it is an admitted fact that in the metropolis, its suburbs and other Presidencies, such as Bombay and Madras, the educated and wealthy classes have to a certain extent taken the lead and appreciated the importance of the movement, by establishing mills and factories of their own, and are imparting a speculative taste among the labouring class, however devoid of intellect they may be, yet the country demands a larger field. In fine, I would, once for all, suggest that some means be devised by which the people may be taught liberally, and inducements held out to them. I would recommend

- I. State scholarship to be given according to merit.
 - II. Competitive system to be introduced.
 - III. Some graded appointments to be kept reserved.
 - V. The gulf to be bridged between Indians and Anglo-Indians, as regards education and promotion.
- My desire and wish for, is to see that the country may prosper, and to create a speculative and professional amongst the mass and respectable class of society, at an early date, the people will reap the benefit of their enterprise, which will remove a long felt desideratum.

August 1888.

THE KIRKWOOD RESOLUTION.

The Bengal Government has recorded the following Resolution on the Daniel of Patna :

RESOLUTION.—Judicial,—dated Calcutta, 25th July.

READ No. 87J.D., dated 18th June, 1888, from the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal to the Registrar of the High Court, Calcutta, with enclosure.

Read No. 1542, dated 7th July, 1888, from the Registrar of the High Court, Calcutta, to the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

In the correspondence in this case, the Lieutenant-Governor forwarded to the High Court the record of the case of Empress versus Guru Churn Dosadh, tried by Mr. Kirkwood, the Sessions Judge of Patna, together with an explanation furnished by Mr. Kirkwood of the reasons which led him to order that Budhia Gawalin, a witness for the prosecution, should be examined by the Assistant Surgeon with a view to testing her virginity, and His Honor remarked that, in his opinion, the facts disclosed were so calculated to bring discredit on the administration of justice that he deemed it necessary to lay the case before the Hon'ble Judges of the Court for their consideration, and to ask for their opinion.

2. Briefly, the facts of the case, as stated, are as follows :—The girl Budhia, an orphan, giving her age as 12 years, was living alone with her cousin Lachman, aged 20. Lachman's wife was not living with him, and Budhia, though married, had not yet gone to live with her husband. On her return one day to her house, she found the door off its hinges, and, looking in, observed that two brass vessels had been stolen from it. She then proceeded along the lane in which her house stood, into an adjoining thoroughfare, and there discovered the accused, whom she had not previously known, carrying off the vessels. Thereupon she gave him in charge to a constable who was at hand.

The defence of the accused, Guru Churn, was to the effect that he had just been released from jail, and that the policeman had seized him as an old offender, and, taking him to the girl's house, had then procured brass vessels, and fabricated the charge against him.

3. It appears that in the course of the trial, the girl's statement and demeanour caused Mr. Kirkwood to entertain doubts of her chastity. He argued to himself that if she was not really chaste, it might be concluded that she was not a credible witness; and that it was highly probable that in some way her want of virtue was mixed up with the origin of this complaint.' Adopting this line of reasoning, he caused her to be examined by the Assistant Surgeon to ascertain whether she was or was not a virgin. The girl did not resist or protest against the examination ordered by the Court, though she wept when the Assistant Surgeon gave evidence unfavourable to her chastity. Accepting this evidence, Mr. Kirkwood summed up unfavourably to the prosecution, and the jury acquitted the prisoner.

4. The opinion of the Hon'ble the Chief Justice and Judges of the High Court on the case is to the effect that Mr. Kirkwood's action in ordering the medical examination of the girl was illegal, and does not admit of justification. They point out what the law of the matter is, and that, even in a charge of concealment of birth (where an examination may be properly deemed to be of the highest relevance), it has been laid down that, 'unless the girl consented, the examination was an assault, illegal and unjustifiable,' and that in this respect 'neither Magistrate, nor policemen, nor medical men may infringe on the rights of any person.' The Court have no doubt that Mr. Kirkwood acted in good faith, believing that what he did was necessary for the ends of justice; but as a Judge, he ought, they say, to have known the law, and even if he had possessed the power which he thought he possessed, it would have been a grave indiscretion in him to exercise it. They consider his conduct reprehensible in a high degree, and as that conduct has, in their opinion, tended to bring the administration of justice into discredit in the district of Patna, they think that he ought not to be allowed to remain Judge of that district.

5. The Lieutenant-Governor fully concurs in this severe censure of Mr. Kirkwood's proceedings. His Honor regrets that Mr. Kirkwood should, after several years of praiseworthy judicial work, have, at the close of his career, displayed such grievous indiscretion and caused such a lamentable scandal. As, however, Mr. Kirkwood has applied for permission to retire from the Service, it is unnecessary for the Lieutenant-Governor to consider the question of the punishment to which he would otherwise have been liable.

By order of the Lieut.-Govr. of Bengal,
COLMAN MACAULAY,
Offg. Chief Secretary to the Govt. of Bengal."

THE JAIN CASE.

SURUJ KUMARI BIBI vs. LAB CHAND SETT.

Mr. Justice Norris delivered the following judgment of the Appeal Court consisting of himself, the Chief Justice Sir Comer Petheram and Mr. Justice Beverley, in this case :—

The facts out of which this appeal arises may be shortly stated as follows : One Culloomull Sett, who died in August 1885, made a will by which he appointed his brother Duddumchand and Foolchand Johurry his executors. The executors obtained probate, and the executrix, Muni Bibee, was appointed the survivor. Both the executors died, and Muni Bibee, on the 28th May 1887, applied for and obtained probate to the will. On the 20th May 1887, a year after she had obtained probate, she died, and on the 7th November 1887, Lab Chand applied for letters of administration with the will annexed. He alleged in his petition that the estate of Culloomull had not been fully administered and alleged that he was the only adopted son of one Nuthmull who was the only son of Culloomull deceased; that is to say, he alleged he was the grandson of the deceased. A caveat was entered by Suruj Kumari Bibi, I think, in May 1887, but shortly after letters of administration and probate were granted; and she opposed the grant of letters of administration to Lab Chand Sett, alleging that she was the only widow of Dhunsook Dass the brother of the testator and one of the executors, that Labchand had not been duly adopted as the son, and that in the event which has happened there was an intestacy as to the estate of Culloomull, and that the property at his death vested in her husband Dhunsook Dass and on his death in her as his widow.

On the caveat coming on for argument before Justice Trevelyan, that learned Judge framed the following issue :—

"Has the caveatrix Suruj Kumari Bibee any and what interest in the estate of the testator Kuloomul Sett deceased, and is she entitled to contest the right of Labchand Sett to obtain letters of administration de bonis non with the will annexed to the estate and effects of the testator?"

Then in answer to her caveat it was contended that Dhunsook Dass had adopted a son, Puddumchand, and that in consequence he was heir to Culloomull Sett if Culloomull had died intestate, and that therefore the lady has no interest or no sufficient interest to come in and contest the right of Labchand to the letters of administration. To these the lady replied to this effect : "Even supposing my husband had adopted a son according to the local customs of the Oswal caste of the Sitembari community of the Jains, I am heir to my husband's brother." The parties went to trial upon this issue; and upon it Trevelyan J. says as follows :—

a proceeding of this kind, and if I understand sec. 23 of the Probate and Administration Act which governs this case, I must grant administration to the next of kin of the deceased. Primarily the next of kin are entitled to letters of administration, and, as I understand this issue, it is not only an issue as to whether she has any interest, but I have also to decide whether she is entitled to contest the right of Labchand Sett to letters of administration. As far as I know, no person is entitled to contest a claim to letters of administration, unless he has a prior right, and if this lady is not next of kin, it follows she is not entitled to contest the application. The question whether she is next of kin, depends upon whether she or Puddumchand is entitled to succeed to the estate of the deceased. The question of Labchand's adoption has not been gone into here and has been postponed to the decision of the case. The lady admits nothing, and the adoption is disputed. It was contended in the course of the trial, that I could not go into any evidence as to Puddomchand's adoption, and it was said that, independent of that the lady has a right to the estate. It seems to me, if Puddomchand is the heir of the deceased, this lady can have no interest in the estate, and therefore would not be entitled to contest the right of Labchand."

Now it has been argued before us in the first instance, on behalf of the appellant, by Mr. Pugh, that the learned Judge was in error in setting this down as a contentious cause before deciding the issue which he framed. But I think it is practically admitted while the point is taken, that it would really amount to nothing more than a question of form and does not touch the merits of the case. The second objection taken is that the learned Judge was wrong in the view he took of the right of the lady to appear and contest the grant of letters of administration. This may be and probably is the case, that the learned Judge in the court below was wrong in the view he took of the rights of the parties to come in and contest the grant of letters of administration. What Mr. Pugh seeks to do now is that by the laws and local customs of a particular caste of a particular sect of Jains, to which this family belongs, she was the next of kin; that she had an interest in the estate and entitled to contest the grant of letters of administration. It is now sought to take a view, it may be arising out of the grounds which were taken in the court below, but an entirely different view on grounds which were not taken in the court below. He says, "Assuming for the sake of argument that I have no ground on which I can rely, yet I have a right to maintenance out of this estate which would come into the hands of my husband's adopted son; and if I have a right to maintenance out of the estate, I have a sufficient interest to see that the estate does not go into the hands of any other party, at case is not a case which arises upon the facts, and that the subsidiary case ought not to be made now for the first time in this court, and we say further that if Mr. Pugh's contention is right, on which we express no opinion, it will be open to him to raise the point in one of two ways: He may either sue the parties in whose hands the estate is and get that right of maintenance declared, or it is open to him, I presume, to apply for letters of revocation of the probate of the will.

Then the learned Judge proceeded to try two questions of fact: first of all whether Puddumchand was the legally adopted son of Dhunsook Dass, and secondly whether Suruj Kumari Bibi had proved the legal custom which she alleged; and he found first of all that the adoption of Puddumchand was proved and proved by the brother of the caveatrix, Situl Persad Johurri, and secondly he found that the alleged custom was not proved. The evidence which was adduced to prove the custom as far as Suruj Kumari was concerned, was the evidence of Situl Persad, who produced two copies of the written law of the Jains as contained in two old manuscript books of the Jains, and the learned Judge seems to have been of opinion that if these books were to be relied upon, he was prepared to rely upon them that they were authorities for the proposition that amongst the Jains the widow succeeds to her husband's estate before the son. I have looked at the evidence and considered it and what it seems to me to amount to is this: that these Pandits are of opinion, and their opinion was corroborated by references to these old books, that amongst the Jains, at the time these books were written, the Jain widow occupied a somewhat higher position than a Hindu widow occupies, and that her estate, whatever it was, appears to be somewhat larger than the estate of a Hindu widow, but that estate was limited and was enjoyed by her before the son took. Trevelyan J. went on to say that though there was the opinion of the Pandits who were called, and though that opinion was corroborated by the books, he found as a matter of fact that the practice amongst the Jains of the present day was entirely opposed to the precepts contained in those books. He found upon the evidence instances of the son sharing whilst the mother was living.

Upon a consideration of the whole of the evidence, the details of which it is not necessary to enter into, he was of opinion that the local usage as alleged by the caveatrix, was not proved. With the conclusion at which that learned Judge has arrived, we entirely concur. It might be distinctly understood that in dismissing this appeal with costs, we are expressing no opinion as to what the law or customs or usages, amongst this particular sect of the Jains, may be; all we say is that we agree with the learned Judge in the court below and we find that the caveatrix did not succeed in proving the local usages on which she relied. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

tation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoon" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

did not get away. Here is the passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kisto Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

(Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression. It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

DREAMS.

NAY! Let them dream their dream of perfect love ;
It is the sweetest feeling, the most fair,
This flower-like joy that blooms in the soft air
Of Youth's bright heart, with Hope's blue heaven above.

Breathe naught of disenchantment ; do not bring Misgiving to the bliss of blended souls,
The while Life's brimming river golden rolls
Through primrose-lighted uplands of the Spring.

The blossoms of Eternity lie furled
In the dim kindling buds of dreams that keep
A fluttering pulse within Time's broken sleep ;
Dreams are not idle ; dreams have saved the world.

And therefore
Our lowland eyes that yearn and dream we lift,
And to the isle-like mists that round them drift,
And to the moon and to the morning-star.

KEEPSAKES.

EACH lover has a keepsake
For the memory of his love ;
One has a note or a ribbon,
And one a curl or a glove.

But I am rich in keepsakes ;
Three notes I treasure apart ;
There are two, accepting my presents,
And one, declining my heart.

SONNETS.

TO APRIL.

[From a Sick-bed]

I.

O APRIL ! month of sweet expectancies,
The girlhood of the year, the pride of Spring,
Why com'st thou thus on Eurus' withering wing,
And 'neath such unrelenting skies as these ?
Black March has passed from all the lands and seas
He ravaged ; and I hoped that thou wouldst bring Such gifts benign as thou wert wont to fling,—
Bright gleams, and opening buds, and thoughts at ease.
Why art thou masquing thus in Winter's mien ?
Where is thy chaplet, and thy leafy spray ?
Thy flexile graces, and elastic tread ?
Ah, April ! nothing reck'st thou what I say ;
Ceaselessly cheerless wilt thou still be seen,
For all these moanings from a sick man's bed.

II.

Too harshly, April, chid I thee, believing
Thou wouldst remain unkindly to the last ;
But now, ere thy eighth of moons is past,
Thou smilest, and repentest thine aggrieving.
Thou art again the month of promise, weaving,
With that strange, textile potency thou hast,
Fresh foliage, and bright presages,—the waste
On plants and man of wintry hours retrieving.
And if for me come no reviving bloom,
Not less on high the lark shall hymn it clear ;
Not less the flowers shall perfect their perfume ;
Not less in order move month, season, year ;
Albeit, the Earth has one more noteless tomb.

J. S. D.

THE WANDERER'S RETUR.

"How cold upon my passion blows the wind,
Over the old sweet fields—so sweet, that I Could wander more, yet for all memory
Not sweet enough. Beloved, ah ! have I sinned,
That all but these dumb fields looks so unkind,
And I, without e'en one familiar face,
Must see the darkness in the sunny place,
And set my feet here, wandering still in mind ?"

Then glancing up, if heaven might look sweet
Upon his sorrow, one bright star he spied.
But, as he gazed, his hungry eyes grew dim,
And the star seemed so many worlds from him.
Heart-stick, he turned ; and in the pool beside Lo ! the same star was shining at his feet.

HOPE.

(Suggested by Mr. Watt's picture in the Grosvenor Gallery, 1888)

In lonely vigil till the day be born,
Whose one star glimmers pale the clouds among,
She hears the voices of the human throng,
The hopeless murmurs of a world out-worn,
The tumult of immitigable scorn,
The old ancestral cry of mortal wrong,
Sound like the weary burden of a song,
Love loveless left and faithless faith forsworn.
She hears, unheeding. Her self-blinded eyes
Keep still undimmed the glory of the view
Which once was hers, when all the world was new ;
Her ears, that catch one strain which never dies,
Hold firm, through chance and change of earth and skies,
Her dumb unswerving faith in Good and True.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

SIR STEUART BAYLEY left Calcutta on Wednesday the 15th for his second tour.

THE Secretary of State is not disposed to accept the recommendation of the Public Service Commission to raise the limit of age in the Civil Service Examination. He is willing, however, to grant a third Native Judge for our High Court. A despatch to that effect has been received in India.

BABOO Preonath Sen has successfully passed the last examination of the Cooper's Hill College. He stands twelfth in the list. The College was started to checkmate the Native Indian engineers. It is satisfactory therefore to see a Bengali come out with the mint mark of that College.

HEALTH to maturity! Good news to Old Fogeedom! The fifty-five years' rule has been worked to death, and the Great Mogul of London has nodded assent to its abolition—in part. As if to make up for the unceremonious treatment of the Public Service Commission, whose best recommendation, namely, that for raising the age of candidates for the Civil Service Examination, has, as Sir John Gorst lately announced in Parliament, been knocked on the head, the age limit of service has been rather unexpectedly extended to 60 years. When will special pension be the rule, instead of the exception in favour of favourites?

FOR refusing to hire out his conveyance to the Police, to carry a sick person to hospital, the Chief Magistrate has fined the driver of a hackney carriage Rs. 25. This may seem a heavy sum, but the Act empowers the Magistrate to fine to the extent of Rs. 50, in case of refusal to carry without sufficient cause. But had Jehu no cause for contumacy? We suspect he avoided Lambert's Own for fear of not getting his hire. Probably he had had bitter experience of carrying out their orders.

MUNSHI KANAHYA LAL, Pleader, Judicial Commissioner's Court, Lucknow, was stabbed in the face by a Kahar named Nannhu, in the city Magistrate's Court. The pleader was removed to the Bulrampore Hospital where he died within 5 hours, in great agony. The assassin is in custody awaiting trial. He bore Kanahya Lal an old grudge. He had formerly been a menial in the pleader's employ.

MR. RYLAND, late of the Stamps and Stationery, may now have some peace. He cursed the Bengal Secretariat for not granting him extension of service. He will, however, be allowed to draw special pension.

IN his recent visit to the Czar, among other sights, the Emperor William was treated to a review of between 40,000 and 50,000 troops of the Guard, under command of the Grand Duke Vladimir, brother of the Czar. Here is a description by the Times' correspondent:—

"The two Emperors, on splendid chargers, each wearing a Russian general's uniform, rode side by side up and down the three lines of cheering troops, followed by Prince Henry, in the uniform of the Russian dragoon regiment, of which he has just been appointed chief. The Russian Empress came next, with her daughter and the Grand Duchesses Elizabeth and Mary Pavlovna, with outriders and footmen, but this time drawn by four jet black horses. A brilliant suite of officers brought up the rear. After the inspection, the Imperial party took up a position at the saluting point and the march past began. The first to wheel round from the line on the left flank and pass the flagstaff was the Emperor's body-guard of Circassian dressed Cossacks of the Kuban, with long scarlet coats and carbines. The blue gendarmes of the Guard rode behind this showy squadron, and then came an interesting sight. The Czar trotted off and placed himself at the head of his troops, followed by his Minister for War and adjutant-generals, in single rank. In this order the Czar passed the German Emperor and brought his sword to the salute; then, wheeling round, he resumed his position at his side. William II. leant over and warmly grasped the Czar's hand at this compliment. The infantry then marched past, in columns of companies, in quick time. First came the crack Reobrajensky Regiment, formed by Peter the Great, led by its commander, the Grand Duke Sergius, with the Heir-Apparent marching in its ranks on the right flank. The German Emperor could not help turning round to Count Herbert Bismarck, and nodding his admiration at the sight of these splendid troops. Next came the Ismailofsky Guards (a body dating from the time of the great Empress) keeping correct line. The young Grand Duke Constantine marched with the first company. The Jäger Regiment came on at the double, led by one of the sons of the Grand Duke Michael. All the troops were in field-dress without helmet or cuirass. Both infantry and cavalry were made to go through the difficult task of starting at the double and at full gallop from the halt, a few paces before reaching the flagstaff. The mounting of the cavalry in general was the theme of general admiration. The horses in each squadron were all of one colour to a shade, and some literally marked time to the music in cantering past as if trained in a circus. Among the prettiest sights of the review were the passing of the Red Hussars of the Guard, as they galloped past to the attack wildly sabring the air and the furious rush of the Guard Cossacks, with couched lances, led by their handsome commander, General Jlovaisky. The Cossack Horse Artillery closed the march with an exciting break-neck gallop with their four-horsed guns. The Emperor William returned the Czar's compliment by putting himself at the head of his Viborg regiment, and saluting his imperial host at the flagstaff. On returning to his post, it was the Czar who this time gave him a hearty shake of the hand."

THE Chief Magistrate summoned Sreemutty Dintarini Debi, a pardanasheen lady of Gobardanga, to appear before him and give evidence in a cheating case. Unwilling to appear in public Court, she made an application to be examined by commission. Mr. Marsden could not agree, for that would, he said, delay administration of justice and be unnecessarily costly. The lady however would be examined, as all other pardanasheens, in a palkie in open Court. She next applied to the High Court (Mr. Justice O'Kinealy and Mr. Justice Rampini). A rule was issued. It was in these words:—

"A rule upon the Magistrate to show cause, which he will do by a letter to us, why it should not be ordered that the lady should not be required to appear in the Court. We intimate to the Magistrate that we think he should not enforce her attendance under the subpoena provided she does what she says she is willing to do, that is, come to Calcutta and give her evidence in such suitable place, either within the Court building or not, under such circumstances, to be arranged by the Magistrate, as to secure that she may be examined in the presence of the accused, and at the same time not be exposed to the inconvenience of coming into a public Court-room. We would ask the Magistrate to let us know what arrangement he proposes to make in this matter, and if, as we have no doubt will be the case, under the circumstances, the

"This is an application made by Srimati Deentari Dabi, asking that she might be examined by commission, and not examined in open Court, under Section 503 of the Code. In her application she set forth that she was a pardanasheen and a Brahmin, connected with a family of acknowledged respectability, and herself possessed of considerable property, and she begged that what had been done in some previous cases might be done in hers. On that application, a rule was issued, to show cause, and cause has now been shown by the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta, and by the Crown. The Crown objected, because the lady in her petition had said that it was a degradation for her to appear in a public Court, and the learned Advocate-General argued that it would be intolerable to allow such a principle to receive the sanction of this Court. No doubt the phrase is objectionable, and it will be impossible, as the learned Advocate-General says, to admit the fact that merely appearing in Court is a degradation; yet we do not think that that supports the case. There is no doubt that such applications have been granted, and granted very often, but the question of the habits and customs of the people should be taken into consideration in dealing with matters of procedure. The learned Presidency Magistrate has shown cause by saying that it is the invariable custom for pardanasheen ladies to be examined in palkie in Court. That is not the question. The question was whether a commission was ever issued in regard to pardanasheen women in this Court. Of that there is no mention here. He also says that this lady travels from Gobardanga to Calcutta, but he does not say that she does so publicly. So far, therefore, as cause has been shown by the learned Magistrate, it does not seem that the fact stated by him affects the reasons upon which such commission has ever been granted. Now, looking at the nature of the application, that the lady has actually taken a house in Calcutta adjacent to the Magistrate's Court, that no possible inconvenience can arise to any person, and that she has volunteered to pay the expenses of the commission, we can see no possible reason why this rule should not be enforced, and it will be made absolute."

Holloway's Pills and Ointment exert a rapidly favourable effect in all those diseases which are induced by exposure to damp or by great changes in temperature. They will therefore be found eminently serviceable to those who work in iron foundries, copper mines and collieries. These well-known remedies present manifest advantages in respect of use and effectiveness, being entirely compounded of vegetable drugs selected with the greatest care and regardless of price. When used in accordance with the ample printed directions which accompany them, they act surely but mildly, and do not interfere with the daily work. There are but few diseases which are not capable of cure—or, at all events, of great relief—if Holloway's remedies are perseveringly used.

"It is reported that within two hours of the time of the first innings of the Oxford and Cambridge cricket match closing, the local Daily Telegraph, recording the event, was selling in the streets of Melbourne. This is a feat of telegraphy that probably beats all former records. The cricketers closed their innings at Oxford amid cheers for the wonderful skill of Ferris and Turner, and while the players were still on the ground the news was wired across the world, was put in type, printed, and distributed within a hundred and twenty minutes."

WE extract from the Indian Agriculturist the following significant figures showing the growth of the Tea Industry of India :—

"In 1851 there was but one Company in Assam with a very limited area under cultivation, and a yearly production of about a quarter of a million pounds. In 1887 we find no less than 873 gardens covering an area of nearly a million acres, although but one-fifth of that area is actually planted. In place moreover of an outturn of 250,000lbs. of tea, we are told now of an outturn of 70,000,000lbs. The cost of production, which was originally very high, owing to the outlay for skilled labour that had necessarily to be imported from China, greatly of course arrested the progress of the gardens. The pioneers of the enterprise had to buy their knowledge, and success was dear. To-day, the whole cost of cultivation does not exceed Rs. 54 per acre, while the leaf can be laid down in the Calcutta sale-rooms at 6½ annas per pound, to realize prices varying from 7¼ annas to 9 annas, for shipment thereafter and sale in London at an average price of 11d. the pound, though on occasions quotations are at as low a figure as 7d. The aggregate outturn from all the gardens of India is now from 50,000,000 to 100,000,000lbs. a year, of which Assam, as we have said, counts for 70,000,000lbs."

Native Opinion devotes a leading article to the subject of Dishorning of Cattle.

"As various kinds of novelties are being introduced in every branch of industry we may expect that some persons who approve of almost any kind of foreign novelty will soon attempt to introduce in India the practice of English farmers and cattle dealers, of cutting off the horns of animals. We hope that as soon as this custom is begun, our Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals will take up the question and obtain the opinions of competent men, whether it ought to be allowed, or whether the protection of the Law ought to be invoked to suppress the introduction of this custom hitherto unknown in India. In England many persons desire to abolish this practice because it is cruel and useless whilst others adduce arguments in favour of it."

The practice of dehorning cattle is by no means new in India. It prevails in Provinces under Jain as well as Hindu influence.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

As might be expected, the House of Lords has accepted the Special Commission Bill to enquire into Parnellism. This measure has had the effect of a flank movement against the leading Home Rulers. They must counteract it. Foiled in Parliament by the massive ministerial majority, they are bent on creating a diversion in another field. They have now, of their own instance, sought the protection of that law to which they had been repeatedly referred for clearing their character. Mr. Parnell has at last instituted a suit for libel against the Times, claiming fifty thousand pounds damages. He has chosen the Scotch Courts for his own vindication. The case comes on in October. Mr. Thomas O'Connor, M. P., and Mr. John Redmond, M. P., are also said to be preparing for similar action against the same newspaper in the Queen's Bench. This distribution between them of the two systems of judicature, is doubtless an astute arrangement devised by the fertile brain of the Great Agitator.

Parliament was adjourned on Monday. It reassembles on the 6th November.

COUNT VON MOLTKE has retired from the Chiefship of the Staff. Count de Waldersee fills his place.

THE children of Shem and Ham have given another notable chastisement to the progeny of Japhet, for their unrighteous trespass into their tents. News from Massowah, dated Rome, August 14, reports the destruction of 350 auxiliary troops with all the Italian officers. The disaster is ascribed to Native treachery.

TIPATCHED huts in the southern suburbs have been proscribed—by beat of drum. The proclaiming policeman in Russapugla was not without a reason of his own for the order. He ascribes it to the absorption of the suburbs in the town proper. He is probably right, though premature in the announcement. Even if the new municipal bill be now assented to, it does not come into operation till next year.

THE Government of India has definitely disallowed the application for two lacs of Rupees for the new central road out of the Hooghly bridge toll Fund. This has been a damper to the local Government and to Mr. Cotton. Sir Henry Harrison too has lost heart.

GENERAL Martin, among his colossal charities, endowed a Fund for the benefit of released convicts. The released prisoners of the Presidency Jail have hitherto been the recipients of this bounty. Only good conduct prisoners, recommended by the Jail Superintendent, were given such sums as were considered necessary for their immediate wants, not exceeding Rs. 500. But such has been the administration of the Fund, that it has been swelled by another lac out of the income of the original investment. The present yield is therefore about Rs. 10,000 a year. The charity is at present administered by the Deputy Commissioner of Police with the assistance of the Jail visitors. Recently, on application, the High Court has sanctioned the extension of the charity to prisoners in general in all the Bengal jails.

The Massy Baba John Fund for the benefit of civil prisoners—a much less wealthy endowment—makes its own provision for the unexpended balance. It is annually paid over to the District Charitable Society.

THE papers are full of the praises of Mr. Lambert for his "attempt to improve the Police administration of the metropolis" by "placing each section of the Police under the immediate supervision of a competent, honest, and educated officer." But is it true? The reform, if any, stops with the transfer, from the Superintendent downwards, of every man in the Park-street Thana, after the boy-torture case.

THE Guzerat College at Ahmedabad, teaching up to the B. A. standard, stood first in the recent examinations. It is a native institution thoroughly under native tuition. We do not think it is independent of Government aid, like our local private institutions—the Metropolitan Institution, the City College, the Ripon College—which entirely depend upon indigenous resources. Whatever the success of these places of education, we cannot regard with pleasure the total exclusion of Europeans from the instructing staff. We hope the proprietors and managers will soon awake to the unwisdom of depriving their students of all benefits of European teaching of European learning.

TWO policemen at Sukkur—Juman and Umar—were sentenced by the city Magistrate to one month's rigorous imprisonment each, for perjury in the court of the second class Magistrate, who had sanctioned the prosecution. The Judge of the Sadar Court, who was applied to for revision of the order, declined to interfere. The District Superintendent of Police was not satisfied with the decision, believing his men innocent. The Courts failing—there being no other appeal—he practically appealed to himself, so far as he had any jurisdiction. The rigour of short time imprisonment of favorite hands in the Police, useful at torturing or swearing away the liberty of Her Majesty's unfortunate liege, is usually a nominal affair. In the present case, at any rate, the term was soon over, a part of it being consumed in appeal. Then came the opportunity of the king of the District Constabulary. He gave his jail-birds a cordial welcome back. He warmly embraced them—in spirit if not in the flesh—and coolly reinstated them in their old places. He could not have, in a more marked way, shown his contempt for the Courts. Who will, after that, doubt that the Executive is supreme.

If every case of perjury by policemen were brought to trial, our jails would soon be filled with these worthies.

MESSRS. JARDINE SKINNER & Co., of this city, prosecuted two native contractors for embezzling certain sums of money paid them for procuring cocoons. The Magistrate of Malda sentenced them each, on the 30th June last, to one month's hard labor. The District Judge, in a review of the case, thought the punishment inadequate and referred it to the High Court. The matter came up before the Hon. Justices Wilson and Rampini on the 8th August. Their Lordships agreed with the District Judge, and were about to issue a rule when it transpired that the term of sentence had already expired. The Judges were in a fix, they took time to consider, and, next day, they issued a rule to shew cause why there should not be an order for six months' imprisonment, with the further order that the released prisoners should be rearrested and admitted to bail pending their fresh trial for further punishment.

Is a Zemindary partible in Madras? That is the question of the hour in the legal and landed circles down South. The Court of Wards in charge of the estate of Marangi, contends for the negative. The District Judge of Krishna made a decree for division of the Zemindary property. The High Court, in appeal, confirmed the order. The Court of Wards has applied to the High Court for stay of execution and for leave to appeal to the Privy Council.

In Bengal both the law and the Courts favor partition, and the law prescribes an elaborate process for minute divisions. Cui bono? It are better, perhaps, for the tenants, the landlords and the country generally, if the law were otherwise. The partition of a Zemindary in Bengal is still a costly, and, what is worse, a most tedious, affair. In the blessed metropolis, it is a regular chancery business of the Eldonian régime.

By order of the local Government, Register of attendance for the Judges of the Madras High Court was introduced—when the Chief Justice Sir Arthur Collins was on leave. If the innovation was deliberately so timed, it was a poor "dodge" unworthy of a great administration. On his return, the Chief has ordered the discontinuance of the practice, observing that the Judges were not schoolboys and they had a better sense of their duties. In proof of his own sense of responsibility, Sir Arthur has ordered two appellate Benches to clear off arrears. We hope these nasty accumulations will not be cleared off—with a vengeance, to spite the Government.

A PARAGRAPH appeared in the middle of June in the Indian Agriculturist, which has attracted so much notice among agriculturists, that our contemporary has, within less than two months, quoted itself in extenso. We, therefore, make no apology for placing the whole before our readers:—

"Cultivators in India may properly take a lesson from what has been done in New Zealand, which though not a tropical country, had for some time refused to produce crops of corn on a profitable scale. The straw was short and weak, and the grain both poor and scanty. The suggestion was made to a farmer in the colony to grow and plough into the land a strong crop of mustard while in the green state, and just before flowering. The advice was acted upon, and the result was such as the most sanguine expectation could hardly have anticipated. The first crop of wheat taken off the land after this green crop of mustard had been ploughed in, was marvellously fine in weight and bulk, and the example has been followed. The effect of this mustard manure on New Zealand wheat lands induced an Indian tea planter to adopt a similar mode of manuring in his own tea garden, with the happiest results. The seed was sown in rows between the lines of tea, which had been for some time yielding very poor crops—not more than about three maunds per acre—and that of poor and indifferent quality. The plants came up with the first rains, and when fully grown and on the point of flowering, were dug into the ground between the tea plants, covered up and allowed to decompose. The effect of this treatment has been in every respect equal to that on the fields of corn already alluded to. The tea crops in this manured garden at once rose to five maunds the acre, and in the second year of the experiment, the same land produced six maunds per acre. Other garden proprietors have followed the example with more or less advantage, and a larger yield will now be a general result."

Although the Indian Agriculturist addresses those who are in the tea, and it is in their interest that the editorial note in question has been reproduced in its last issue, yet the information is available to other cultivators equally, and we earnestly desire our countrymen engaged in any analogous culture to try this new New Zealand method. Indeed, it was not in tea that it was tried in New Zealand but in wheat, and with most brilliant results. We trust our wheat cultivators will follow in the path of their fellow-farmer of the Southern Hemisphere. There are doubtless various other kinds of cultivation in which the suggestion may be utilised.

HERE is what they in France think of the new Emperor of Germany—William II.

"The new German Sovereign, who was born on the 27th January 1859, at Berlin, is now in the 29th year of his age.

He is a man of ordinary spissitude, with a full face, having rather a sinister look.

We know that, owing to the unskilfulness of the midwife of his mother, he had at his birth an arm injured, which remains much shorter than the other one and somewhat paralysed.

The new emperor is afflicted with deafness in one of his ears, and often suffers from a disease not yet diagnosed, which has its seat in the affected ear.

With the affection he suffers under, he may attain a long life, but it is always menaced with crises, which could carry him off very rapidly. Crises epileptic—cerebral—even insanity—such are the possible consequences unless the relapse is prevented.

Kings generally consider themselves as leaders of the people. William appears to wish only to be the leader of the army. The first act of Frederick III., on succeeding William I., was to address a proclamation to his people. William II., on taking possession of power, sent to the army his first words and his first salute. What he said to his father was that it pleased him to have the head of the army. He said to the soldiers that he occupied the head of the army. He thought of the people. And what is his last said to the army: 'We belong to each other, I and the army. We are born for each other, and we shall remain united by an indissoluble tie whether we have, by the will of God, peace or storm. You come now to take the oath of fidelity and obedience to me, and I promise you I shall ever keep in mind that the regards of our ancestors contemplate me from the other world, and that one day I shall have to render them an account of the glory and honour of the army.'

His order of the day to the navy is not less significant. 'I can, said he, guarantee that in the grave moments we shall certainly be united and that, in the prosperous day as in the time of misfortune, we shall always be disposed to shed our blood in order to safeguard the honour of the German flag and the glory of the fatherland. God will bless our efforts.'

What do you think of this sort of appeal to arms? Do you not find that these discourses ring like the blast of a clarion? How unlike is this note to what was given by Frederick III., who, in his first edict addressed to M. de Bismarck, declared himself 'indifferent to the éclat of grand actions which belong to glory.' With William II., it is a Corporal King who succeeds a philosophic Sovereign, it is Maximian who replaces Marcus Aurelius."

It is interesting to note the signs of popular interest in local Self-Government in the far off interior. An unmistakable symptom of the people's zeal in their municipal affairs, is afforded by a late election dispute in the Presidency of Bombay. As the finale of the dispute has a lesson for the whole empire, we give the facts from the Satara newsletter dated August 1, of the Native Opinion. The Mamlatdar of Wai, in the Satara District, in his capacity of Polling Officer at an election for the local board, having rejected certain voters' applications as barred by time, appeal was made to the Collector. The Collector disposed of the matter in true Collectorial fashion. He could not quite agree to the Mamlatdar's interpretation of the rules under the Local Boards Act, nevertheless he would not interfere with the Mamlatdar's order. So the Election proceeded, to the intense dissatisfaction of the people. The Wailies are not to be so easily suppressed. They are an advanced people—much more so than those of the District Chief Town, Satara, the old capital, with its still strong leaven of old-world conservatism. They have an active Sarvajanik Sabha—an organised Association for the common weal—and good leaders. They advised and agitated, and caused an application to be made to the District Court for setting aside the election. Mr. Crowe, the Judge, admitted the application and took up the inquiry. The affair had created a great sensation and the case was watched with intense interest. At length, the Judge gave his decision. He not only ruled the Polling Officer wrong in his view of the Rules and in his rejection of the voters' applications, but also declared the election void and ordered a fresh election. Our contemporary's Correspondent, who is evidently a man of ability, regards this decision as a triumph of the popular cause. Unless there is room for the intervention of some weak High Court Bench, he may well do so. He is safe in referring to the influence of the Local Boards Act on the political education of the people. He concludes with the remark that when European officers themselves are now showing a good disposition towards the scheme, it is a pity that our native officers should betray any jealousy. The attitude of Mr. Crowe, the covenanted Judge, certainly presents a contrast to that of the poor Mamladar. But there are Europeans and Europeans, and the Covenanted Magistrate of Satara does not come out of the business with flying colours. He represents the bias of the Service—certainly its illogic. We have seen frequent instances of this failing on this side the country. Some years back, in a case of our own under the Land Acquisition Act, we questioned the legality of our Mamladar's (Deputy Collector's) proceedings, but the Collector, though admitting our contention, concluded with confirming them. He evidently thought that he as Collector or perhaps as one of the great Covenanted, could by his simple fiat convert a declared illegality—admitted to be so by himself—into a legality. Lately, a case of administration of the Municipal Act occurred in a Suburban town similar in essential features to this Wai case. The Bengal business was, indeed, far more offensive. But it is a longish story and had better be reserved for another occasion.

“Mr. Cecil Rhodes matriculated some fifteen years ago at Oxford University, but his funds running out, he went to South Africa. There he took to ‘diamond-digging,’ and doing well, he returned to England and to Oxford and took his degree. He then returned to the diamond fields and formed a syndicate to work the diamond fields. The result is that he is now the richest man in South Africa. He has much influence with the Dutch, and he uses it to the mutual advantage of them and his own countrymen.”

Mr. Rhodes is an Irishman, we believe. He is certainly one of the largest patrons of Parnellism. He lately wrote to Mr. Parnell offering a colossal contribution to the “Rint,” provided the exclusion of Irish members from the British Parliament forms no part of the next programme of Home Rule. He has got the assurance and sent in his cheque. Lucky are they who have Colossuses of Rhodes to look up to!

RAJA GOVIND RAO BABA SAHIB, brother-in-law of the Maharaja of Indore, was sentenced at Secunderabad, by Mr. Tucker, the Second Assistant to the Resident, to 3 months' simple imprisonment and Rs. 500 fine, for ill-treating his Ranee. The order for imprisonment has, however, been remitted in appeal—a clear failure of justice, for which Mr. Forbes, the First Assistant, will, we hope, be called to account by Mr. Howell. A fine is no punishment in such a case. What is a few hundred Rupees to a man in the Raja's position? To make this melancholy matter most distressing to all well constituted minds, the Ranee is in custody to be tried for attempting suicide to escape from the cruelty of the husband. We hope further indignity will be spared her.

THE new municipal bill has passed the scrutiny of the Departments of the Government of India. The only flaw they find is that the Small Cause Court referred to in the Bill needs to be especially empowered. An Act will have to be passed on that behalf before Sir Henry Harrison's law is imposed on the town.

THE first part of the trial of Rao Bahadur Kunjen Menon, late Sub-Judge, Tellicherry, for corruption and bribery, has ended in the Assessors' verdict of not proven. The Judge has reserved judgment pending the conclusion of the second case.

AS many people are in suspense as to the upshot of the proposed scheme of a tramway between Howrah and Amta, we are in a position to say that, to an anxious enquiry addressed by a gentleman living in the District to Messrs. Walsh Lovett and Company, they have replied that the scheme is not abandoned, and that work will be commenced in a short time.

Our last information regarding the other scheme of tramway from Howrah to Shiakhala via Janai, is that it has been sanctioned by all the local authorities concerned, and that it awaits the sanction of Government.

WE learn that the late Babu Sagore Dutt of this city has, by will, left landed properties having an annual income of Rs. 47,000 and Government Securities amounting to Rs. 105,000, yielding an annual interest of Rs. 4,506, for the perpetual endowment of a charitable dispensary and hospital and of a free school at Kamarhati. After providing from the above income all outgoings on account of the management of the landed estates, repairs of houses and establishment and other costs, it is estimated that an income of Rs. 30,000 per annum or Rs. 2,500 a month will be available for the charitable purposes of the testator. The Administrator-General of Bengal is the executor.

THE Stock Notes are to be withdrawn. Since Major Baring floated them as a part of his financial scheme, they were somehow never looked upon with favour. About 16 lacs of these Notes are now in circulation, and they will be converted, on application, into promissory notes of the 4 per cent. loan of 1842-43. Interest will be paid to the 31st July, less premium of 8 annas per cent.

SURPRISE upon surprise! Unless we are being shamefully betrayed by the telegraphists, the Government of Bombay are displaying a strange infirmity of purpose. Mr. Crawford, after all, is not to be let off so easily, as the sudden abandonment of the case, in Mr. Vidal's court, without explanation, naturally led people to imagine. The news that he was going home was premature. He will be tried by a commission of his peers—who may be said to be the peers also of the realm—but not taken from Bombay. The tribunal will be composed of Covenanted Bengal and Madras Civil Servants.

The ex-Commissioner of the Bombay Central Division, however, claims his trial at the criminal Courts. There was an application on his behalf before the District Magistrate to restore the case that had been disposed off behind the accused's back, on the withdrawal of Government sanction for prosecution. Mr. Vidal, in rejecting the application, said that there was no case to make any order upon, and that Government having withdrawn the sanction, there could be no case. The District Judge was next applied to. Mr. Inverarity for Mr. Crawford argued that the withdrawal was illegal and pointed out that the Magistrate had postponed the hearing to the 16th and the Code did not empower him to take it up on the 9th—without the knowledge and consent of the parties, that is. Mr. Inverarity is also reported to have said—“the Government, finding that the Magistrate would release the accused, revoked their sanction in the middle of the proceedings, which was illegal and improper.” Mr. Candy, the Judge, considered that the Magistrate was right after all, although he should have heard the accused before making the order. What good? Why go through a useless formality which could not possibly affect the result?

We do not think it is seriously contended that Government has not the power to revoke its sanction. The real question seems to be whether proceedings commenced can be stayed on such revocation. In the present instance, trial had not begun. There is no doubt, however, that the sudden change of front of Government goes to Mr. Crawford's prejudice.

THE trial of Hanmantrao is proceeding.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 18, 1888.

THE GOVERNMENT ABANDONMENT OF TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

THE question of technical education is shelved. In the Resolution which we were discussing recently, the Government of India have definitely announced that the time is not come for doing anything on a large scale for the promotion of technical education of a practical kind. This virtually amounts to a surrender at discretion to the difficulties of the subject. At any rate, it must now be clear to our readers that our own view of those difficulties was by no means exaggerated or unnecessarily gloomy. They have impressed the Government of India in the same way as they impressed us. We have at all events prepared the public for the new policy which, on a full consideration of all the bearings of the subject, the Government have now authoritatively declared. That policy in its plain meaning puts off action and tells the advocates of technical education that their demand is somewhat premature in the present circumstances of the country. Indeed, the Government are so far convinced of this that they do not hesitate to say that evil rather than good would result from the provision of facilities for technical education, before an adequate demand has been created for skilled labor and for educated foremen and managers as in Europe. The subject of technical education of a special kind presents itself now in a different light from what has hitherto been the usual one, in which it has all along been viewed. The Resolution announces a new policy, or, at least, a new course of action. In support of our interpretation, we will let the Resolution speak for itself:—

"The second class of considerations which have forced this question into prominence is concerned with the need of industrial occupation for a population rapidly outgrowing the means of support supplied by a too conservative system of agriculture. It is also concerned with the need for scientific methods to develop the material resources of India and to improve its agriculture, its products and manufactures; so that they may better hold their place in the markets of the world, where competition is carried on with an intensity of purpose, which has been compared to the conditions of warfare. But technical education in this latter sense—that is in the sense of industrial education—is a matter not so easily dealt with as the technical education of the general elementary character referred to in the preceding paragraph; and it therefore seems desirable that if the present impulse in its favour is to be successfully directed, the conditions of the question should be clearly understood.

Technical education proper is the preparation of a man to take part in producing efficiently some special article of commercial demand. It is the cultivation of the intelligence, ingenuity, taste, observation, and manipulative skill of those employed in industrial production, so that they may produce more efficiently. And thus technical education of the special, as contradistinguished from the preparatory, kind is an auxiliary of manufacture and industrial capital. In India at the present time the application of capital to industry has not been developed to the extent which in European countries has rendered the establishment of technical schools on a large scale an essential requisite of success. But the extension of railways, the introduction of mills and factories, the exploration of mineral and other products, the expansion of external trade, and the enlarged intercourse with foreign markets, ought in time to lead to the same results in India as in other countries, and create a demand for skilled labour and for educated foremen, superintendents, and managers. It may be conceded that the effect of these various influences on an Asiatic people is very gradual, and that it would be premature to establish technical schools on such a scale as in European countries, and thereby aggravate the present difficulties, by adding to the educated unemployed a new class of professional men for whom there is no commercial demand. Still a large field is open for the action of Government and public liberality in the direction of promoting special technical education suitable to the immediate requirements of the country and capable of expansion with its growing necessities."

The Government henceforward will give little heed to the cry so lustily made for a complete system of special industrial education in this country. The utmost they will be prepared to do in the matter are, 1st, to teach drawing and the rudiments of science in the schools that exist for general education, and, 2ndly, to promote industrial education so far and no farther than may be actually needed for the purposes of existing industries. As regards the teaching of drawing and the rudiments of science in the existing literary schools, we must confess it is but a poor outcome of the Education Commission's suggestion for bifurcation of studies in those schools, one course being literary, and another industrial and commercial. Nor, as to the other conclusion of the Government, are we much sanguine of good results. The promotion of technical education, through the means of the Railway workshops and factories under jealous European management, to supply a possible demand for those who receive such education that might arise in municipal towns and large stations, is not likely to prove a success. Indeed, the practical treatment of the question is not at all so easy as is so often imagined.

After stating the above view which the Government have come to hold on the subject, they cannot well abandon the field without setting forth in clear outline their ideal as to the future possibilities of technical education in India. That ideal is, of course, based upon what is the actual state of things among Western nations. Though possessing no practical interest for the present, it is still of sufficient importance in its allusion to the discussion. The Resolution forecasts the future in the following passage:—

"The subject is of such extreme importance, and the insignificance of what has been attempted in India is so conspicuous, that the Governor-General in Council is deeply impressed with the necessity for action in whatever way may be practical and sound. Some Local Governments have indeed recently taken practical measures to promote technical education, and these measures have been viewed with much satisfaction by the Government of India. But as it is desirable that the steps best calculated to promote technical education should form the subject of continuous enquiry and discussion, the Governor-General in Council suggests that Local Governments and Administrations should on a convenient but early opportunity take action in two ways. Impressed with the existing want of information at hand as to the extent, character, and circumstances of important local industries in every province of India, His Excellency in Council would, in the first place suggest that in each province an Industrial survey should be completed. In the second place, he would recommend that, with a view to turning the knowledge acquired by such a survey to the best account in the light of the abundant information contained in the Report of the Royal Commission on Technical Education, each Government and Administration should form a committee of educational experts and professional men, who should make suggestions from time to time for the auxiliary supply of appropriate means of technical education; for such modifications of the State system of public instruction as may aid and encourage industries and industrial employment up to the full measure of such requirement at each provincial centre as may be found to exist; and when the circumstances are opportune, for the establishment of a Technological Institute, for the enlargement of the provincial schools of Art and Design, and for the larger co-operation of the University in the promotion of the object in view."

We consider the decision unfortunate. There are, indeed, great difficulties in the way. Those who ask the Government to make adequate provision for technical education, and accuse them of indifference in the matter, have no just conception of the conditions of the task. They are more led by sentiment than practical considerations. Having said all this, we cannot conceal from ourselves the fact, that to wait for a demand for skilled labor before providing means for its local supply, would amount to an indefinite postponement of any action. "To foster the larger developments of technical education in complete harmony with the sound principle that supply should follow demand," the Government shall have to wait a great deal. Before a demand of the kind could arise, native capital must be induced to launch itself in industrial enterprises, and there must be a larger demand for products of skilled labor. This is virtually shelving the problem. However sound might be the principle in theory, not much progress would take place in anything if its application were to be strictly insisted upon. For, it is not more true that demand creates supply than that supply often stimulates a demand. At any rate, this principle was nowhere when the Education Despatch of 1854 was promulgated. There was scarcely a demand then for educated men to justify the large expenditure of money which was undertaken for their supply. In fact, the wonderful expansion of general education which has taken place, in consequence of that great charter of education, has been due simply to the ignoring of the principle which now finds such warm acceptance. It may be feared that the Government have not dealt quite fairly with the question. In specifying the difficulties which hedge it round, the prime difficulty of Ways and Means has been scrupulously kept out of view. That is the great stumbling block, and the Government seem to have laid themselves open to cavil by their present ingenious device for escaping from an uncomfortable and, indeed, untenable position. The appeal to political economy is mere claptrap which will not deceive many.

THE DIGNITY OF TRIFLES :

THE NEED OF RESPECTING THEM IN FOREIGN RULE.

We have much pleasure in reproducing a very interesting little letter to the editor of the Indian Agriculturist :—

"SIR,—A somewhat remarkable case in connection with 'Trade Marks' has recently come before the Ceylon public, in which the abandonment of a particular trade brand was caused not by any legal process but at the instance of a Buddhist official. A Ceylon planter wishing to employ an entirely novel trade mark for his tea designed a figure of Buddha with uplifted hand, this was drawn and cut on a hard wood block for the purpose of printing the trade mark. A Buddhist official hearing of the matter wrote to the planter pointing out that such a use of the figure of the founder of their cult would be repugnant to the feelings of all true Buddhists: to the credit of the planter he at once caused the block to be destroyed.

Trifling as this incident may appear, I submit it as in my opinion an illustration of one of the causes of the success of British rule in the East: tolerance and regard for Oriental religion and prejudice in contrast with the failure of the more drastic methods adopted so successfully by other early settlers in India, the Portuguese, Dutch, and French.

C."

"C." is evidently a thoughtful earnest man, well worthy of a hearing from politicians, public servants and statesmen. Whatever may be thought of his historical generalization, the practical lesson of toleration and respect for the institutions and feelings of the people he urges, is undoubtedly sound, as the fact, which gives him occasion for his short but pregnant discourse, is sufficiently curious. Europeans may regard that fact of little importance and utterly inadequate to support the weight of the maxim built on it. But sober men of experience and students of history will not, on that ground, dismiss it with contemptuous flippancy. Dequincey notwithstanding, the Poet is still right who sang—

What mighty contests rise from trivial things!

Men in all ages and in all climes are governed by impulses, and the less advanced a man is, the more is he liable to subjection to such impulses, and what is true of the individual unit, is true of associated units or societies and communities. Herein is a fruitful source of the obscurity of Oriental history. Hence small facts deserve more attention and respect in these regions. Hence trifles carry more potential importance in the East than in the West. This great capital owes its origin to the dishonourable maltreatment received by the East India Company's factor—one of the many things which the Anglo-Indian editor of Dacca does not yet know—as an accident in the family of a Delhi Prince first gave that Company an advantageous commercial footing in Bengal. Similarly, the way to empire for the British was subsequently paved by an insult to a Jain family. Who, after that, will not exclaim,

What mighty contests rise from trivial things!

The same principle has been in operation during the British Period itself. At the beginning of this century, the mutiny of Vellore threw the Government into consternation. And what was the cause of a demonstration which, carrying as it did the sympathy of the whole native army and population, threatened the existence of British Power? It was a simple military order on the Sepoys in garrison in the Southern fort in question to crop their hair after a certain fashion. The order was promptly recalled. Since then, grave discontent, sometimes leading to overt disobedience and mutiny, has been caused, in Bengal and elsewhere, by similar indiscreet attempts at discipline. The grandest historic trifle was, of course, the Civil War of 1857, which had nearly destroyed the mighty fabric of British sovereignty in the East, and this was caused by the issue of a new fire-arm—the Enfield rifle. The objection was not to the new gun but to the new kind of cartridge served for it. These were instantly abandoned, but the mischief was past recall. The quiet circulation of a piece or two of unleavened bread from village to village, before the outbreak, was another little incident unnoticed at the time, but which has since occupied the mind of public men, as the harbinger of the Mutinies. These are a few out of numberless examples that might be easily picked up. They certainly establish the intimate relation between trumpery circumstances and serious events. The fact of such circumstances being followed by such events, obviously suggests the idea of necessary causation. But these instances not only prove the potency of trifles, but even more suggest that trifles are not trifles at all. What is chaff to one may be food to another. Difference of status and taste, leads to difference of regard for the same objects. National difference often discovers itself in minutiae. Men of diverse races, creeds, customs and institutions, must differ in their ways and notions in many particulars. Hence, what is a child's play to one set, may be a serious business to another. Hence we find Europeans passing over many things in this country which easily strike the natives, who stop to ponder and act on them. Europeans may do things as a matter of course, which may provoke the Hindu or Moslem, Parsee or Sikh. It is thus that raw foreigners unwittingly offend the people. It is thus that even experienced Indian officers, like Dr. Mouat, caused indignation throughout the country by what they regarded minor matters of jail discipline, as dethreading (as it may be called) convicts of what are called the twice-born orders of Hindus, by relieving them of their badge of blood. It is thus that controversy still goes on among European writers on the subject of Nundcoomar's lock up, pending or during trial, that grave historians still regard the Maharaja's punctiliousness of purity a pretence.

THE HINDU SHRINE IN BELOOCHISTAN :

A BRAHMACHAREE'S ACCOUNT OF THE PILGRIMAGE.

THEY went, eighteen of them, in a body, from Kurrachee to the west, and in twelve days reached the famous shrine vis Chandrakup. In returning, they took the direct route, reaching Kurrachee in eleven days.

It is an arduous journey at best, through the sands of Beloochistan—Kurrachee itself, though politically of Sind, is geographically Beloochee—without landmarks, the tracks being known only to experienced camel drivers. And now in the hot month of Baisakh, corresponding with April-May, it was more than ordinarily trying.

There are two Hindu abbeys—akras—at Kurrachee, called respectively the Bara and Chhota—the Great and Lesser, or Senior and Junior. Pilgrims must place themselves under the protection of the Superior of the one or the other of these institutions. One of the hangers-on or disciples of either establishment must lead each band of pilgrims. Under the name of agud or pilot, this person acts as the Guide, philosopher and friend. Pilgrims go in all seasons. Each band forms a sort of corporation, or punchayet as it is called, with common interest and liability, the Guide acting as chairman and executive officer. Chandranand Brahmacharee and his seventeen fellow pilgrims went in charge of a Guide from the Junior Abbey.

Commencing their journey and making their way through the alluvion of the trans-Indus valley, they were soon confronted by their first water-course. In the neighbourhood of Kurrachee, a dozen miles or so to the west, flows the Hab. It was no obstacle, however. A small stream—although Chandranand calls it a creek of the sea—it was easily passed, without wetting waist cloth.

There were several small rivers, mere rivulets, mostly dry, to pass. But the chief of any importance were two, near to the shrine, called Aghori and Hingul—the Hingul of our maps. In Baisakh, of course, they were fordable, the water in the middle reaching, for the most part, up to the hips and waist, and, at the greatest depths, no higher than the breast.

The Hab is the Rubicon of the pilgrimage. It is a test river. Here, at the outset, is held the preliminary trial of oligibility for the candidates for Heaven by way of the shrine in the desert. If the Devi is propitious, well and good; otherwise, in crossing, the legs swell. That is a sign of no permission; the man is too sinful for the journey and must return. When our pilgrims after crossing saw no symptom of increasing bulk in their lower extremities, they were overjoyed and pursued their onward course through the landward skirts of the beach. The sea was not seen, but it was never distant more than a mile and a half or two miles or so, concealed from view by low ridges of sand. The nineteen were accompanied by two camels laden with provisions for a month, though the journey to and fro occupies only some 20 or 21 days. This is a provision against any contingency of delay on the road by the sudden swelling of the mountain streams, several of which fall in the way. These are usually forded with ease but might be impassable, there being no ferry, indeed no population in the track. Crossing the Hab, they reach the only township or market-town on the way, called Sonmeance. This is a good port for a native state with a tolerable trade, and many galleys—seafaring boats of the huri kind—in harbour. Passing five or six miles, they reach their next river Purali. After that, all is blank. It is a sandy region with a low sparse shrubbery for camel pasture. The whole indeed is an extensive camel pasturage, with no villages, but here and there a hut or two of starved Lumris, Mussulman camel drivers. Camels knocked up at Kurrachee are sent to graze and recover here, whence good conditioned animals are taken to work in the city. The camels graze in charge of the families of the drivers—a woman or an old man and a boy would be found in a hut on the way at long distances. They lead a precarious life. Nothing grows there for human food and nothing can be purchased. At long intervals, the members of their families returning from Kurrachee give them some provisions. For the rest, they depend upon the charity of pilgrims. These Lumris dig a pit in the sand for water, a clear stream issues which they cover up with leaves and go about their business. The pilgrims take water from there, bathe and cook, nobody to obstruct. At close of day, however, the diggers return and sit near the well and when a pilgrim goes to take water, they prevent him. He pays a pice or two, perhaps, which they reject, saying they cannot eat coin nor buy food there. They want bread. This is well known, so the pilgrims provide themselves with bread, one of which they throw to the well-keeper. So they have to provide bread for these Bedouins of the Indian desert for the guide, too.

From a distance they beheld a house on a bare hill top. As they approached, the house disappeared, and there seemed a high mound or round wall, or a hill with a round rim on top. Climbing up the sides of the precipice, they discovered a large well, high in the air, with water to the very brim. There is no convenient footing on the top at the sides of the well. There was danger of one losing his balance if he attempted to stand with both feet on the narrow margin. So they placed one foot on the rim and fixed the other foot below behind in the slope of the rough declivity.

This is Chandrakup, filled with muddy water, as if the element had been colored with a great quantity of ashes.

The earth from Chandrakup is taken and kept by pilgrims for laying at Pashupatinath, in Nepal. Before going to Chandrakup, four miles below, they stop for the day, bathing and cooking and eating, and preparing a huge unleavened bread—Chapti—to which each of the pilgrims contributes his two pounds of atta, for the Mahadeva of Chandrakup. They dig a pit and put the lump of flattened dough on fire, made of twigs and branches collected there, and then cover it up with charcoal and fuel. All night it bakes. In the next morning, two of them purify themselves by a bath and carry the bread on a stick. The rest accompany them (sharing their burdens of water) to the foot of the hill, where they lay down their things and bathe in a well below, having a tall tree beside it, and get up the sides of the Well—the sacred Chandrakup. The Guide, addressing the unseen Deity, says, that he (So & So) has come from the Junior Akra with a band of pilgrims to worship the Divine Mother and awaits permission. To which the Well replies with a loud report. Next he asks permission to offer him favourite stimulants and narcotics. Another report, and then they threw into the Well their offerings of ganja, churrus, siddhi (bharg). Finally, he asks permission to offer him bread. After the usual report, the great bread is thrown.

Next the guide named one by one all the pilgrims, and waited for the sign for each. "So-and-so is an applicant for worshipping at the shrine of the Devi." After some time the water which is continually bubbling as in a boiling cauldron, bubbles a loud Bom or rather Bam! in reply. There is more or less delay in this sign. If there is delay, it is understood to be evidence of reluctance to allow such a sinner to worship at the holy shrine. The pilgrim brotherhood pray to the God to pardon the sinner and give ear to their prayer. They even offer to share his sins. Then when the bubble bursts, it is received with acclamation of thankfulness. In one case the sign would not be manifested, notwithstanding all their exertions. This was a woman—the only one in that band. However, at last, even she received the sign of assent.

The pilgrims were curious to learn the cause of the difficulty about this poor woman. They asked the Guide if he knew anything. At last it was understood that she was in the female way.

There is also another well of the same sounding kind at some distance out of the route, called Gerá Bába or Gerá Babaji ka kup which is continually bubbling and bursting in sound, which pilgrims sometimes visit. At one time it was in good repute, but now it is neglected. At Chandrakup if you throw some thing, the water whirls round and carries the thing down and then rises again into a bubble which bursts with a clap. But Gerá Bába is always bursting his bubbles and making a noise. The Guide told them Gerá Bába was a madcap without discrimination. They need not take the trouble to go to him.

Armed with the permission of Chandrakup, the pilgrims take the route direct to the shrine. After trudging for days in their cheerless path, unrelieved by anything in the shape of interesting scenery, without even the ghost of an accident, they are at length informed that they are nearing their journey's end. There is nothing to make them feel themselves in the divine atmosphere—no cloud-capped towers, nor golden spires, nor sacred peaks to remind them of the neighbourhood of the Holy of Holies. At last they come upon a small stream. It is their penultimate piece of water to cross.

This is the Aghore. There another initiatory ceremony is performed. It is an interesting rite, of the Masonic kind without Masonic mystery—the ceremony of fraternation. As they approach the river, the Guide tells them to cut teeth brushes from the low thistle and brushwood. About two miles from the Aghore, is the last stream, Hingul. In the former, each sticks a datan in the river and exchanges another with his brother, before using it. A mile and a half brings them to a rock called Kalimayi, where a Lumri woman butchers for them the goat they had brought and the Guide pours a cup of its blood on the stone (there is no image) also a cup of grog. Another mile or so, and they see the temple, like a square sentry box, flat-roofed, from a distance. They approach. There is a well below the temple called kennel kund. The temple is called kapti.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

Will you or any of your numerous readers let me know, through the medium of your famous journal, the places and dates of birth and death of Bidyapati? I find in a journal that he was born in Sitahati in 1315 B. S., and died in Cutwa in 1403 B. S. Is this true?

MAHOMEDAN LITERARY SOCIETY OF CALCUTTA.
DISCIPLINE AND MORAL TRAINING IN SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

Dated Calcutta, the 31st July 1888.

From—NAWAB ABDUL LUTEEF, BAHADOOR, C.I.E., Secretary to the Muhammadan Literary Society of Calcutta.

To—The Under-Secretary to the Government of Bengal, General Department.

I AM directed by the Committee of the Muhammadan Literary Society of Calcutta to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of your letter No. 46, General Department, Education, dated the 16th January last, forwarding printed copies of the Government of India's letter, Home Department, No. 10---384, dated the 31st December 1887, and of its enclosure, on the subject of discipline and moral training in schools and colleges, and asking for an expression of the views of the Society on the points discussed.

2. The question of the advancement of Muhammadan education in all its departments being one which has always commanded the earnest attention of the Society, the Committee have given their best and most serious attention to your aforesaid communication, and directed me to forward the following expressions of their views upon the subject.

3. The Committee attach the highest importance to religious instruction as a means for the inculcation of proper lessons in morals and discipline amongst the rising generation, and they view with alarm the general deficiency of students in public schools in matters of discipline and reverence to authority. The evil is one affecting the Muhammadan and Hindu communities alike, and requires the prompt application of effectual remedies before it assumes a graver aspect and greater magnitude.

4. With reference to the recommendation of the majority of the Education Commission that the existing rules as to religious teaching in Government schools be applied to all primary schools wholly maintained by Municipal or Local Fund Boards, the Committee beg to observe that a very wide distinction exists between the Government and local bodies. The Government as a whole represents the whole Empire, peopled by the followers of different creeds, and is as such pledged to strict religious neutrality. But local bodies may often represent populations homogeneous in point of religion, offering little or no chance of a conflict of religious interests. The Committee fail to find any just reason why a local population harmoniously represented by a legal corporation should have greater obstructions thrown in the way of imparting religious instruction to the local youth than a voluntary association of a much smaller number of the people of the same locality acting together as an aided School Committee. The Committee venture to think that the rules as to religious instruction require modification in both directions. They are firmly of opinion that to allow any religious instruction for the purposes of proselytization is a breach of that religious neutrality to which alike on the principle of justice and of expediency the British Government in India is pledged in permanency. Schools receiving Government aid in any form, as well as schools maintained wholly or in part from the funds of public bodies created by statute and discharging functions delegated to them by Government, ought therefore to be equally prohibited from imparting religious instruction for the purposes of proselytization. At the same time proper facilities ought to be afforded in both descriptions of schools for the inculcation of students in the principles of their own religion with the desire and consent of their proper guardians. This involves no breach of religious neutrality or violence to religious feelings. So far as the Muhammadan community are concerned, they would hail with delight such an extension of religious teaching.

5. The special difficulty of Muhammadan students in competing for success in modern instruction has been to make time for their special religious curriculum. Ordinarily that curriculum delays the commencement of their instruction in the English language and handicaps them throughout their University course. The Committee think that it might conduce to economy of time and labour if in purely Muhammadan schools elementary instruction in the vernacular languages were to be given through the medium of books of religious tendency. Where the school is not exclusively Muhammadan, the Muhammadan community might be allowed to supply otherwise properly qualified teachers to lecture separately to the Muhammadan students in the hours set apart for vernacular instruction.

6. The Muhammadan community of these provinces generally speaking have not yet attained that power of organization and of funds to render it easy for them to establish special schools of their own with or without aid from Government, which might combine the modern curriculum with their special religious instruction. It is especially necessary therefore for them that they should be allowed to supplement the teaching of existing public schools by adding thereto a course of religious instruction.

7. Subject to the above observations, the remarks and suggestions contained in paragraphs 7 to 11 of the Government of India's letter command the general concurrence of the Committee.

8. The Committee do not approve of the attempt to prepare a moral text-book, based on the fundamental principles of natural religion, as they think such an attempt to be impracticable in India, and as they apprehend risk of injury to the cause of true religion from the onesided and partial inculcation of certain principles supposed to appertain to "natural religion."

9. The Committee cordially approve of the sentiments contained in the circular from the English Council of Education, quoted in paragraph 13 of the Government of India's letter. They fully appreciate the great importance of teachers in public schools maintaining a high standard of honesty, truth and honour in the institutions under their charge, and inculcating upon their young students not only the general duty of consideration and respect of others, but also the special duty of obedience to, and reverence for, their parents. The Committee, however, beg to add in this connection that example is always more effective than precept, and that consequently it is the duty of the Education Department to see closely to the moral conduct of the teachers under their control. Instances are not unknown of public teachers of notorious immoral habits being tolerated in public institutions on account of their intellectual attainments or the kindness entertained for them by their official superiors. The mischief which such a teacher creates by his personal bad example more than neutralises the benefits of the moral precepts inculcated by all the other preceptors of the institution. The Committee are earnestly of opinion that it ought distinctly to be understood that proved flagrant moral misconduct will positively entail the removal of a teacher, however brilliant his attainments in other respects, or however much he might command the compassion and kindness of his superiors for other reasons.

10. With reference to the question of punishments, the Committee beg to state that corporal chastisement, often of a severe character, was quite common in the indigenous schools of the country. The tendency, however, in modern instruction has been more humanitarian, and the current of public opinion has gradually set against severity in such matters. It is only a manifestation of the same spirit which has led to the abolition of flogging in the army. The sentiment against the use of the rod in public schools is complicated by the fact that whipping has been introduced as a punishment for criminals. The Committee are, therefore, of opinion that only the milder forms of corporal punishment can be resorted to in the case of native students. On the question of fines, the Committee think that, although primarily the punishment falls on the offending parents, still it has a value in this that it draws the attention of the parents to the misconduct of their child. To make the process effective, however, there ought to be a prescribed form which should be filled up by the school authorities and communicated to the guardians concerned.

11. The Committee endorse the desirability of the head-master of every school keeping up a personal knowledge of all the boys enrolled therein. They beg to add in this connection that every head-master should be thoroughly acquainted with the vernacular language of the boys under his charge. Otherwise, in investigating cases of breach of discipline, he has often to rely on his subordinate staff, which is an unsatisfactory and ineffectual method of administration. The head-master of a school ought to be in a position freely to speak to, and to be understood by, every student in his school.

12. The Committee, looking to the backward state of education amongst the Muhammadans and the relatively advanced age at which Muhammadan boys begin their education in secular public schools, cannot support the suggestion for expulsion of boys above a certain age. In their opinion, the experiment ought at first to be tried of removing from school every student who fails to secure promotion from his class for a number of years. This they think will weed out most of the unruly big boys whom it is desired to exclude by the maximum age rule.

13. In conclusion, the Committee beg to suggest that in the meetings of debating clubs and societies, connected with Government schools, convened in the school premises under the superintendence of the teachers themselves, social, religious and political subjects should be excluded from discussion. The immature understanding of young boys is likely to be injured and unsettled by the free discussion of such subjects, and thereby the seeds laid in their minds of that laxity of discipline and want of reverence to constituted authority of every description, which the Committee to their grief find to be the characteristic of many school-boys of the period.

THE following has been going round the press :—

“Across the Atlantic in a Cockle-Shell.—Mr. William A. Andrews was to start from Boston on June 18, for England in the smallest boat that has ever yet crossed the Atlantic. The experience will not be a new one to Mr. Andrews. In 1878 he, in company with his brother, Asa W. Andrews, achieved world-wide fame by sailing in forty-five days from City Point, Boston, to the Lizard in the tiny Nautilus, a dory of only 15 ft. keel. The trip across the Atlantic has been made by four small American boats, the Centennial, the Nautilus, the New Bedford, and the Little Western, all of which were of such dimensions that the trip in each case was a most dangerous one. The craft in which Mr. Andrews will go over is smaller than any of them. The Little Western was largest, being 23 ft. in length and having a ship rig; then came the Centennial, 20 ft. overall, 16 ft. keel, and 2½ ft. deep; the New Bedford 19 ft. 5 in. overall, 13 ft. keel, and 4 ft. 4 in. deep; and then the Nautilus, 19 ft. overall and 15ft. keel. Mr. Andrews's boat is of the following dimensions:—Length of boat, 14 ft. 9 in.; width, 5 ft.; depth, 2 ft.; length of sprit, 17 ft.; of mast above deck, 8ft. of boom, 6ft. 9 in.; sail, 16ft. 3 in. on the fore; foot and leach, 15ft. Half-inch cedar is the material of which she is built, and she will carry a lateen rig. A peculiar feature of the boat will be her keel. During his trip in the Nautilus Mr. Andrews was considerably inconvenienced by the scarcity of space caused by the water jars, and the new keel is intended to do away with this. It will consist of a heavy piece of timber, which will be hollowed out, leaving a space in which nearly forty gallons of water can be easily carried. By means of a pumping apparatus this can be drawn out at any time.”

Important News for India,

WHERE FEVERS AND CHOLERA REIGN SUPREME.

A RECENT TRAVELLER ON THE Chinese Coast found that District remarkably FREE FROM TYPHOID FEVER and CHOLERA. He soon discovered the cause. The people there do not drink cold water from tanks or wells, often extremely impure, but keep a pan of water constantly boiling, into which from time to time they drop a little Tea, and when thirsty THEY DRINK HOT TEA! If the weak and adulterated Teas of China can do this, what may not the pure and strong Teas of India be expected to effect?

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a represen-

ation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne fall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by

SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY

(Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression. It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE GOLDEN JUBILEE.

JUNE 21ST, 1887.

As men look back in after-days
Where once they trod in slippery ways,
And find fresh theme for love and praise ;
And here, they tell, the snow was deep,
And there we venturous dared to creep
Along crevasses dark and deep ;
And there we cut the wall of ice,
Or, desperate gamblers throwing dice
For life, we clomb the precipice :
And all the way we went along,
With spirits clear and bosoms strong,
We often wandered, oft went wrong.
One step alone, the next, we knew ;
Yet still an onward instinct drew
Our progress, till with evening dew,
As birds at twilight roosting come,
We reached our fair Italian home,
The slumbering lake, the peaceful dome.
So we, who after fifty years
Look back remembering hopes and fears,
Melt into gratitude of tears,
For all that is ! the might-have-been Forgot, in this her triumph-scene
When England gathers around her Queen !
For peace at home, and heard afar,
Heard only, threat of distant war,
No bloodstain here our fields to mar !
For India held with stubborn mood
When, 'gainst the furious Sepoy-flood,
Dauntless our little leaguers stood !
Or where, on bleak Crimean height,
Nigh lost, the soldier saved the fight,
And, when chiefs blundered, brought all right !
Or where, 'mid fiend-like dervish-yell,
Betrayed, deserted, Gordon fell,
And England shuddered, as at a knell,—
Too late to save, but not to mourn ;
Yet of one hero left forlorn
Proud to believe a hundred born !
For something lost, yet more of gain ;
For healing arts that soften pain,
That ease the nerve, and soothe the brain !

For Nature conquered, powers of strife
Made fruitful, powers with blessing rife ;
For arts of beauty sweetening life !

For knowledge spread, and useful lore
Brought to the humblest cottage-door,
For kindlier touch 'twixt rich and poor !

For wider justice clasping all,
And, broken down the parting-wall,
One law alike to great and small !

For freedom, elsewhere snatched not given,
Here working like a wholesome leaven,
Raising the heart, and opening heaven !

For these, for all ; the good acquired,
The goal that once our fathers fired
Now starting-point for good desired !

Whate'er our lot, where'er our way,
On this at last her crowning-day,
Father, to Thee we kneel and pray :—

For her, long life with glorious close,
And, dying, honoured place with those
Who lived to lighten human woes ;

Who set an aureole round the crown,
And loftier rise by stooping down
Than in low heavens of war-renown !

For us, that like our sires of old,
Statesman, and soldier, seaman bold,
We may her Empire strongly hold ;

Whether, now reached its farthest scope,
Our downward path begin to slope,
Or upward climb with boundless hope,

With equal heart for every fate,
Not cowering crushed by fortune's weight,
Not with prosperity elate,

But storm, or sunshine, taking all,
Indifferent save at duty's call
To meet the hour, whate'er befall.

For He whose scales the nations weigh,
The Lord of night, the Lord of day,
Breathes, and as flowers we fade away :

And yet again, with pity stirred,
Sweet as at dawn the waking bird,
" Rejoice ! arise ! " His voice is heard.

So seems it still our wisest trust,
To bravely bear what bear we must,
And reverent answer, God is just.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

ALAS for the Health Society and the cause of Furious Sanitation! The Coryphæus has failed in his quest. The Englishman announces that Mr. Justice Cunningham has resigned his seat in the Calcutta High Court, and that he does not return to India. There is one formidable obstacle the less for somebody!

If it is a pity that that brute of a Raja Govind Rao Baba Saheb has been let off with only a fine for ill-treating his poor wife, we are relieved to notice that the Rani has been spared the ignominy of a trial. The Assistant Superintendent of Police declined to lead evidence against her and she was discharged. An act of true chivalry!

SIR GUNPUT RAO, President of the Gwalior Council of Regency, is dead. He had been ailing for sometime with fever. He entered the Gwalior service in 1851. He distinguished himself by his loyalty to the Supreme Government by opening out the Scindia hoards. He was execrated in Gwalior as without. He never minded, so long as he commanded the good will of the Europeans. Somehow, Europeans become inordinately fond of the unfaithful servants who open out the vaults of buried treasure of their dead masters. It is the same in Hyderabad or Burdwan as in Gwalior or Rampore.

THE Military authorities have been relieved of the supervision of horse breeding arrangements. That duty will be done by the Agricultural Department. THE Collector of Moorshedabad is reported to have left on his tour of inspection, as the change on the river during the rains is called. While the head of the District is sailing up towards Jungypore, the knights of industry have it all to themselves on terra firma. They are impartial in their attentions, without fear or favour, even to their kith and kin or fellow-chevaliers. Among the many cases of theft and burglary taking place in the city, one of those specially mentioned is the robbery of silver articles valued at Rs. 50 from the house of "Baboo B. D. Rai, Deputy Magistrate, Berhampore." By B. D. Rai is doubtless meant Baboo Bansidhur Rai, the last of the managers of the Nizamat, who, after its demise, performed the post-mortem as the Deputy Collector at the Sudder station.

AT Plaistow, on the 30th July, three men were struck with lightning. Two of them recovered and one was killed. The post-mortem disclosed that a steel wire ran round the edge of his hat. The medical opinion attributed the death to this cause for that attracted the elective fluid.

In four deliveries, this French prodigy produced 11 births, thus, one girl, two girls, three boys, and four boys and one girl, her latest feat. Just the Eve for a new Colony! France must be in a bad way indeed when, with such prolific daughters, she shows a steady decline in population.

MR. KIRKWOOD has not only resigned the Service but has, it is said, paid down Rs. 500 for the benefit of girl Budhia whom he has wronged.

ACCORDING to an American Magazine,

"the Negro is changing in appearance, and losing some of the birth-marks peculiar to the African race. The flat-nosed, kinky-headed negro is passing away, and becoming an unknown race. All the coloured children show the change. Among the females long hair of that peculiar woolly appearance hangs in long braids or curls down their backs. Aquiline noses and smaller mouths, with thinner lips, are the rule. For years, and, in fact, ever since their freedom, the negroes have endeavoured to do away with the short and kinky hair bestowed upon them by their ancestors. Much of their spare money is invested in various hair tonics and invigorators, and the long attention and care bestowed upon it is shown in their descendants."

Is there any miscegenation in the matter? The information is too meagre for speculation. Hitherto it was understood that the Negroes in America had through several generations retained their distinctive color. Is anatomical structure any whit easier of transformation?

THE Calcutta Gazette of the week publishes the rules for the treatment of recovered criminal lunatics confined in asylums, and for their discharge after certain periods have been passed and certain conditions fulfilled. A standing committee, consisting of the Chief Secretary, the Inspector-General of Jails, and the Superintendent of the Presidency General Hospital, have been formed "to meet from time to time and advise the Lieutenant-Governor as to the action to be taken by him in deciding on cases reported under Chapter XXXIV of the Criminal Procedure Code."

THE Kahar Nannhoo, who stabbed to death the Pleader Kanhya Lal, in the City Magistrate's Court at Agamir ki Deohri, has been committed to the sessions. He stated to the Magistrate that he had been in the service of the Pleader, that he was falsely convicted of theft and whipped and sent to prison, through the instrumentality of the Pleader and his sons, and that, on his release, on demanding arrears of pay, he was maltreated by the Babu. In revenge for all these, he had determined to cut off the nose of Kanhya Lal, and it was purely by accident that the knife passed through the eye. Whatever the fate reserved for Nannhoo, the incident or accident is a warning to inconsiderate masters.

LAST week, Messrs. Lall Chand Kanhya Lall, of Cotton Street, received a cheque for Rs. 15,000 from Messrs. Macneill of this city, and presented it for encashment to the New Agra Bank. The bearer Seo Lall Durwnn, instead of being present while the cheque passed through several stages of endorsement by the Bank people, seems to have gone out on some business of his own. In the meantime, another man answered to the call for the presenter of the cheque, and received 13 notes for Rs. 1,000 each and 200 for Rs. 10 each. The heavy notes were immediately converted in the Currency Office. After an absence of two hours, the real Seo Lall presented himself and demanded the Rs. 15,000, and was struck to be told that the cheque had already been paid. The matter is still a mystery.

Payment by cheque is both a convenience and a protection against dishonesty. But if the fraud under report cannot be prevented at the encashment, the system fails. The Banks are punctilious in many minor matters as regards cheques. Cannot means be adopted to prevent these frauds?

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

WE received on Monday the following telegram from Cuttack :—

"The Utkal Dipika simply expresses public opinion when it attributes the present distress at Kharda to the rigours of the last settlement and the still more rigorous enforcement of the Forest Rules, and questions the wisdom of giving taccavi advances in one hand and collecting rent in the other. The great sufferers are the Bowris, Sobors, Doms, &c., who work as labourers when agricultural operations go on, and during the rest of the year live upon the roots of fruits of jungle trees and by sale of dry wood which they pick up in the jungle and carry on their heads. The Forest Rules deprived them of one means of living, and the stoppage of agricultural operations for want of rains of the other. The sufferings of these classes are the same at Banke and Angul where the Forest Rules are in force with equal severity. It is a painful relief that the local officers have at last found out their mistake and the Rules are now being relaxed. We hope the Government will reconsider the Rules after local enquiry by an independent officer so as to give permanent relief to the victims thereof. Relief measures have been taken up with promptitude, but we have not yet heard of suspension of rent collections."

It is unfortunately too true that Government, which is ever ready to sit upon the luckless squire who happens to have a quarrel with his tenantry, which never loses an opportunity of lecturing private proprietors on their duties to the cultivators, which expects Zemindars and Talookdars to forego their contract rather than press hard upon the rayyets, is itself a bad landlord. In every Province, the peasantry on its estates are more miserable than those on private property. In Orissa, between a harsh Settlement, unsympathetic Forest Laws, and the oppression of the Irrigation department, the condition of the people must be pitiable. We hope the Lieutenant-Governor will do what is practicable to grant relief. In the way of a permanent reform, there are difficulties inherent in the subjects. Thus, valuable Forests cannot be allowed to be laid waste in deference to any sentimental feeling. Short of that, however, every legitimate indulgence should be granted, specially to tribes who have, from time immemorial, vested rights. If notwithstanding, people starve, labour should be provided, or emigration organised.

THE Criminal Sessions opened on Wednesday, Mr. Justice Trevelyan presiding.

The accomplished burglar John Pierce Healey alias Kenneth Ashley Merton, who committed nightly depredations in British Indian Street and its neighbourhood, pleaded guilty to the charges against him, namely, of lurking house trespass by night in order to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment, lurking house trespass by night in order to commit theft in a building, and dishonestly receiving stolen property. The astute lachrymose rogue! The Judge sentenced him to only three years' rigorous imprisonment, although he had rendered himself liable to fourteen years for each offence. There was another charge but his Lordship did not propose to proceed with it, resolved to make things as pleasant as he could, under the terms of the law, for the brilliant sinner. The soft heart of the barrister Judge was evidently moved by the plea to which, for want of any plausible defence, the fellow was reduced. Does Mr. Trevelyan seriously believe that the man will ever reform? For the matter of that, he might just as well be hanged. He has been learning to steal with the assiduity required by a learned profession and the enthusiasm due to a Fine Art, and is it possible for him to abandon his difficult acquisition? He will steal in jail, take our word for it!

MR. MARSDEN evidently cannot take a defeat with grace, or his bump of loyalty to his judicial superiors is not large. The Chief Magistrate has fixed the High Court fees for the commission from his court to examine the lady witness from Gobardanga. Why so? Why should Bow Street stick up its nose as high as Old Bailey? Mr. Marsden could not have devised a better way to discourage examination of Purdana-sheens by commission. What a fine is laid on the good lady of Gobardanga! For keeping to the Purdah, Sreemutty Dintarini must not only bear this cost but also the expenses of her journey to and from Calcutta and a place for the commission, not to speak of the sums already expended for obtaining the order of the High Court, against the Magistrate's refusal. The convicted Raja Govind Rao has got off far more cheaply after driving his wife to suicide by torturing her. All honor, however, to the brave Brahmani! A poorer, but none the less respectable, lady must submit to the stern magisterial command.

THE High Court closes on the 10th September for the long vacation. Messrs. Justices Macpherson and Trevelyan will do the vacation work. Some of the Judges have already anticipated the adjournment, and have dispersed in different directions.

In this connection, we must say that the report, started by the new evening paper, about the retirement of Mr. Justice Romesh Chunder Mitter, is devoid of all foundation. Although he has earned his pension, Mr. Justice Mitter still keeps health and is quite able to do his duties. Why, then, should he retire? He is no bird of passage. He has no turn for speculation on the Stock Exchange or on the turf. He has not got to make love. He has neither to marry nor to divorce. He has not to make a home for himself and to revive associations and to make acquaintances, in order to be able to die among his own countrymen. He has not got to buy lands and found a family, that he should leave his profession in time for starting on another game. He was some body before he was a pleader; he belongs to a family and is himself the patriarch of a no inconsiderable progeny; and he has always his paternal acres to fall back upon. He is not that pest of society—a political Judge. He feels no call from the Muses of Poetry or Eloquence. Happily for himself and the country, he has proved too successful a Judge to need bolstering up his reputation by the production of bad pamphlets and foolish speeches. Why, then, should he be in a hurry to abandon a position which suits him so well and wherein he is more useful than he could possibly be in any other? Nor is the Court so strong that we could well spare so able and seasoned a member of it. So let him stick to his post, until Nature bids him go. He rejoins the Court at its re-opening.

THE Travancore Durbar has received an offer from Messrs. Grant of London, to raise the necessary capital for a railway from Tinnevely to Quilon. The principal condition is that the Durbar should perpetually guarantee the interest. Will not such a contract be bad for indefiniteness? Anyhow, the local Huq (whoever he be) and the big India Office swells may be trusted to make of it a good bargain—for themselves.

AT the instance of the Agent, South Indian Railway, the Government of Madras submitted to the Government of India for sanction alternative estimates, amounting respectively to Rs. 1,25,000 and Rs. 1,18,750, for 50 third-class carriages of the ordinary type and for 25 carriages on bogies with frames, 38 feet in length. The Supreme Government was not at first in favor of this additional outlay, and in reply wrote back that "the Government of India desires to avoid purchasing large quantities of vehicles which, although useful on the occurrence of festivals, might lie idle for the greater part of the year, and, as the practice of conveying pilgrims in goods vehicles is universally adopted throughout India on these special occasions, considers that the present system of carrying passengers in covered goods wagons under special precautions may continue also on the South Indian Railway."

Though not prepared to sanction the outlay for convenience of pilgrim passengers, the Government of India admits the injustice done to them. The letter concludes with the suggestion "whether a very slight reduction of fare might not be made in the case of passengers so conveyed in covered goods wagons, and if this would not meet the views of His Excellency the Governor in Council."

The local Government was so impressed with the necessity of additional accommodation that it again addressed itself to the India Government, and explained that "Although on all lines pilgrims are at times carried in covered goods wagons, it is believed that this is the case to a much larger extent than elsewhere on the South Indian Railway, owing to the great number of ordinary festivals in Southern India."

The Government of India was satisfied, and in reply communicated its sanction "to the transmission to England of an indent for either 25 ordinary third-class carriages estimated to cost Rs. 62,500, or 12 third-class carriages on frames, 38 feet in length, estimated to cost Rs. 57,000, required to meet the additional passenger-traffic on the South Indian Railway on special occasions."

Anticipating the result probably, the Madras Government did not take up the question of reduced fare for goods-wagon passengers. But it applies to other railways. Will they allow that partial relief to pilgrim passengers?

YET another University scandal—but not the last. We shall not hear of the last till the Greek Calends—at any rate, till another Hercules arises and cleanses the Angean stable and sends the brace of impertinent prigs dressed in little brief authority about their business.

One Bhupendra Nath Bose, of the Free Church Institution, went in for the last B. A. examination. He floored almost all the papers, and there was every probability of his passing. But as luck would have it, his name was nowhere on the list of successful examinees. The Principal of the College solicited information as to what subject or subjects the boy was plucked in, and was told by the Registrar in reply that the "cross lists" had not been prepared. He enquired a second time, when, mirabile dictu, the Registrar, putting the saddle on the wrong horse, announced that the boy was absent at the examination! We say ditto to Mr. Burke! The boy must have been absent, his protestation and the evidence of dozens of men to the contrary notwithstanding, for the Registrar of a University is a king and, as such, can do no wrong. What though Mr. So and So comes to you in the flesh and affirms that he is hale and hearty; he must be dead since Sir Oracle says he is! The Principal of the College concerned is not a Tartar of the type of the redoubtable Head Master of the Uttarpara School, who made a European Registrar eat humble pie, and the scandal in question is, of course, as good as hushed up. But do you think that the Registrar will—at least to save appearances—be called upon for an explanation? Egregious fool, that you are! The Syndics, for aught we know, are not so saucy as to do anything that may be construed as savouring of the slightest disrespect to their master—the Registrar. The University may be steeped in scandals, the Registrarship may mean "a negation of all principles," but that need not disturb the equanimity of Dr. Roy. With the Brahma church and parsonage at his back, he is a veritable monarch—of all he surveys. We do not wonder. It is only an illustration of the saying—Give a man luck and throw him into the sea.

THE writer of the Statesman's Moorshedabad newsletter of August 12, is "glad to hear that Government has kindly sanctioned the expenditure of a large sum towards constructing and repairing the residence of Sett Golab Chand, a scion of Juggut Sett, the once famous banker of Bengal. The old family houses are now tumbling down for want of repairs, which the young Sett is not in a position to undertake for himself. It is only a few years since the Government was pleased to grant him a pension of Rs. 300 per mensem."

The provision for the representative of 'Creation's Banker,' contemptibly inadequate at best when first ordered, has ever since been small by degrees and beautifully less, till it has been reduced to the present pittance of Rs. 300. Even this and any other little sums that may be disbursed for the benefit of other branches or members of the great family, are a payment to Paul by robbing Peter. Not a farthing comes from the State. The same we dare say is the case of the large sum said to have been sanctioned for the reconstruction and repairs contemplated. It must be a large sum that would be required for the purpose. In fact, the restoration of the Jugut Sett Palace is a very large and costly business. It is a vast crowd of buildings, none imposing but many of them made at great expense, of choice materials and workmanship not to be obtained in these days for love or money. Nor is the game of restoration to any large extent worth the candle. All, we suppose, that is intended is to put the house in habitable order, to remove the tumbling buildings and repair one or two characteristic pieces of architecture. It is a graceful act, worthy of an enlightened Government, and creditable to all concerned, for which the administration will be remembered with respect at the decayed former capital of Bengal. The Nawab Bahadour of Moorshedabad himself will hardly complain.

Is the Times aging or what? It had always its period of relaxation during the recess holidays, when the "boss" would be off for the mountains or the sea-shore, or fly to the Continent to lounge at Monaco or loaf about in the Tyrol, leaving the Sub in all his glory, singing—I am monarch of all I survey. But that period is by no means confined to Printing House Square, any more than holidays are confined to the Times establishment. With the desertion of London by "society," the superior hands on the whole press, who belong to "society" or affect to belong to it, make themselves scarce, if only to save caste, hiding themselves from the light of day like a guilty thing accursed, in case they cannot afford to repair to even the nearest watering place. Hence it is the period of perfunctory journalism—the period of sloth, slovenliness and slipshod of the whole metropolitan Press. But the Saturday Review chose to call it, in especial the Times's, Silly Season, and justified the phrase by copious citations of inaccuracy and ignorance and nonsense from the columns of its sole victim. Of late, the leading journal seems to have been anticipating the relaxing humours of the recess in the midst of the parliamentary session. The issue of the 18th was actually dated the 17th! Of course, this extraordinary slip is the talk of society and the subject of comment in the other papers. From Punch to the Spectator, every contemporary has had its say.

THE Chablis—we learn from France—has been attacked by the Grisette. Well, no matter, thought we; in fact, nothing could be more appropriate. Who ever imagined she had taken to whisky pegs or the true Teutonic beverage, beer? All the romance that has, during many generations, gathered round the dainty name, would be shattered at the suggestion. Is it possible to suppose that the good grisette, whose tender pulse Sterne felt, has taken to stronger stuff? No, no. Each to his or her taste. Let the Turcoman-confronting Russ have his Raki, if necessary, or the Nature-compelling and world-filling Teuton his Old Tom or new, but, by all means, leave the Traveller Sentimental or Simple his grisette and her chablis. Alas! that the whole illusion should be destroyed in the detail! The grisette in question, we are told, is nothing but a worm. It is a grape-pest which considerably enters appearance between long intervals. It reappears this time after 22 years. On its last visit, it committed great havoc around Auxerre. No remedy has been found to protect the grapes from its ravages. Many scientific men have been deputed from Paris to report on the plague among the white wine crop, which is usually splendid.

It is often forgotten in India that all the British are neither Competition-wallahs nor school-masters in Government Colleges. Here is a glimpse of native simplicity at home, furnished by a correspondent of the London Spectator writing on "Preparations for the End of the World":

"In August, a few years ago, when so terrible a thunder-storm fell upon a Suffolk village that some people were sore afraid, thinking that the last day had come, an old woman was heard to cry,—'And there! Mr. B——' (the good parson), 'he ain't at home.' A pathetic touch of great trust, however small and local her measure of the crack of doom."

Nor is that a solitary case. Sydney Smith's Dame Partington was doubtless a real character, however touched up by the genius of the great humourist. And here is a companion picture, not only realistic but simply real, without manipulation by artist, furnished by another correspondent of our contemporary:—

"My friend Mr. B——occupied a house in an exposed situation upon the island of Sark. A terrible storm one night threatened the house with destruction. The old housekeeper addressed her master next morning with: 'Eh! Mr. B——, did you hear the wind? Eh! I thought the Day of Judgment was come.' 'And what did you do?' asked my friend. 'Eh! Mr. B——, I got up and made myself a little cup o'tea.'"

Like all her belongings, her taste is modest. However, most people would think the good woman's preparations for the awful catastrophe inadequate. Even the Free Masons at initiation, before risking themselves on their stage-awful passage of slippery board and what not, usually require more pronounced prophylactics in the shape of drink.

THE Tellicherry case has ended disastrously to the ex-Sub-Judge Kunjen Menon. In the first case, the Assessors found the charge not proven. In the second, the Assessors were divided. One held it not proved against the Sub-Judge but proved against the second and third accused. The other was satisfied with proof of guilt as regards all the three prisoners. The Judge was in no hurry to express his opinion or pass order. He reserved his judgment. He had known Kunjen Menon for some time, and held a high opinion of him. He wondered that a man of his wealth could be charged with bribery, and was sorry that it devolved upon himself to try so excellent an officer. Next day, however, he was prepared to do the worst. He convicted Kunjen Menon of both the charges and sentenced him to four years' imprisonment and Rs. 20,000 fine, in default, eighteen months' further imprisonment, the punishment being evenly distributed over the two charges. The second accused in the first case, Kunhi Pakki, was ordered one year. The second accused in the second case Sankunni Nair was sentenced to one year with the additional fine of Rs. 1,000, in default another six months. The Judge had by this time exhausted his indignation, and acquitted and ordered discharge of the third prisoner Kaunen Nair.

We have no bowels of compassion for the base man who degrades to the dust the divine office of Judge, dealing out injustice in exchange for dirty lucre. Still less have we any wish to import race rivalries into public questions, if we can help it. But this case has been driven to an exceptional position. The singular want of judgment of the Judge virtually compels our sympathy to the side of the condemned. And, considering how lightly European offenders are usually let off, remembering recent instances, remembering how only yesterday Uncovenanted Deputy Collector Goodricke was allowed to go out of the country with charges of malversation hanging over him, it is scarcely to be wondered at if the difference of treatment of this native Sub-Judge suggests to even ingenuous native publicists a racial explanation. For ourself, if once we can feel sure of the genuine guilt of the convicted, we will submit to even the extreme measure meted out to our countryman, whatever his other claims to consideration. A Judge has no business to be corrupt, and native officers should be like Cæsar's wife—above suspicion. Under the manifold difficulties and degradations of a subject race, be our simple sturdy virtue our peculiar distinction. Let Europeans be lax if they will—they can afford it, having many advantages and qualifications. We must entirely depend on our purity and perspicacity. That is our feeling. But, then, we must be sure of the justice of the doom pronounced on our men. There ought to be no room for suspicion that a native is sacrificed to afford facilities for the escape of Europeans.

We confess the Judge has greatly surprised us. Only a week before, he had privately expressed his high opinion of the worth, moral and intellectual, of the Sub-Judge. He said Mr. Menon was far too wealthy a man to stoop to receive bribes. In the course of a few days, what

A change came o'er the spirit of his dream!

Against the opinion of the Assessors who assisted him on the bench, he found him a miserable peculator. He not only convicted him but was ready almost to flay him and his alive.

The Penal Code may doubtless be quoted to support any barbarity. That precious law is a bloody business. In practice, the humanity of administrators has always moderated its relentless fury. There is no pretence of such moderation in the orders of the special Court. Surely, this is not punishment but vengeance. And the pecuniary mulct—why, it is simply Loot. And not even discriminate Loot. Not only is the convict denuded of his property, but the very portions of his children are robbed.

A fine of twenty thousand Rupees, forsooth! A fine of three thousand guineas! It is preposterous! And the forfeit of this no inconsiderable fortune in this poor country, over and above the penalty of incarceration in jail!—what could be a nicer arrangement for the benefit of subjects who will persist in saving out of their hard earned pittance, in a practically alien land, over whose law-making they have no control? And yet, such are the Daniels set over us, this order is not the first of its kind. It reminds us of a case nearer home—The Empress at the instance of Bhoobun Newgy v. Janoky Nath Roy. It is not many years since this well-known Hatkhola merchant and money-lender, (brother of Baboo Sitanath Roy, Secretary of the Native Chamber of Commerce) was sentenced to imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 20,000. But Mr. Justice Pitt-Kennedy did not certainly pile this enormous money forfeit on a severe term of imprisonment. He evidently meant it as a substitute for a long imprisonment. That was truly justice tempered by mercy. A young Raja in Bengal, we believe, was dealt with in a similar fashion.

SEVERAL years ago, at the commencement of the administration of Sir Rivers Thompson, we had occasion to notice the manners of the Covenanted officials of the Secretariat. We are glad to say our words, not all steeped in Sherbet it may be imagined, had had the desired effect. Since then, we have not heard any complaint, on that score, against any of the series of gentlemen who have held office. To-day, we have to scold our own countrymen—the lucky fellows who, as heads of departments, have brought the reputation of the office to a low ebb. Surely, they ought to have been content with their own undeserved elevation, without trying to bring in their own people at every conceivable opportunity, in season and out of season. At any rate, they might be expected to conform to the discipline of a public establishment and comport themselves with some decency. Some of them—veritable followers of the Old Man of the Mountain—have converted the premises into a smoking saloon, or rather shanty. Of course, the manners of the shanty prevail. The language too is appropriate. The sufferings of the subordinates of these mushroom growth of clerkocracy may be easily imagined. Their juniors, as good gentlemen as they, are in terror and at their wits' ends how to escape insult. The foulest Billingsgate may now-a-days be heard in the great house, addressed by a head assistant to a (say) hand assistant or lung assistant. The European Chiefs to the rescue! Verb. sap.

DEWAN PARUMAL KHUBCHAND, Deputy Collector of Jacobabad, Sind, sentenced by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate Mr. Mules, for corruption, to three months' simple imprisonment and one thousand Rupees fine, has, in appeal, been acquitted by the Sessions Judge of Shikarpore. The news is a great relief. We hope Mr. Kunjen Menon also will be able to show his innocence to the High Court.

So our Tartar of Tangail did not cross the Continent for nothing, but more than earned his rupees. If he failed at home, so much the worse for that tribunal! The High Court had for sometime fallen on evil days, but on this occasion it rolled on the ground and revelled on the dust as it were! During its whole history, never did a Bench present such a spectacle of wrong-headedness. Mr. Ghose drove his points to the hilt, but it was a hopeless business. The Court had eyes, but saw not. It was bound by an evil spell.

THE weather in Calcutta has recently been monsoonish, with overcast sky, constant drizzle and occasional showers. On Thursday, it grew cyclonish, and for 36 hours we had continuous rain and high south-western wind. The regular cyclone was spared the city, but the streets and the maidan were flooded, and some houses and huts came down but without loss of life. Many trees were uprooted and the telegraph posts had had their share of disaster too. The fish of the ponds had travelled into the streets and afforded sport to boys, young and old. The occupiers of many huts had to forego their day meal, for the water had invaded their kitchens.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 25, 1888.

THE LATE SIR GUNPUT RAO.

IN another column, we have already not simply recorded, but briefly noticed, the death of Raja Gunput Rao. The subject will bear dwelling upon. The attitude of others in particular virtually makes a demand on us for interference, in the public interest. Apart from that consideration, however, the subject has native dignity enough to merit further comment. It can hardly be fitting, with a few conventional words, to summarily dismiss, to his final obscurity, one who filled so large a place in the eyes of the world as did the late Raja, long one of the recognised influences in Gwalior, and latterly the regent of that great State. The death of Sir Gunput Rao is undoubtedly an event in our contemporary annals. Next to the acceptance, by the Government of India, of the loyal offer of the Native Princes of military aid in the defence of the frontier and the formulation of the plan for utilising this aid, this is the most important event of the hour in Native India. For it respects not only the weal and woe of many millions of men, but the administrative efficiency and even vitality of the leading Mahratta, we may say the greatest Hindu, State.

We can not affect to be very sorry at the news. That would neither be true to ourself nor just to the people of Gwalior. Sir Gunput Rao was by no means a brilliant man. Indeed, his capacity was of the lowest. The late Maharaja Jeeyaji Rao was neither wise nor lucky in the choice he made in him of his Chancellor. It was a deliberate choice, however, and he never regretted it. That fact may be regarded as one of the marvels of history. For, though deliberate, it was still in a huff that the Scindhia resolved on it. He chose a pronounced and known nincompoop to succeed Dinkar Rao, to spite that eminent Minister. That successful Brahman, giddy with his great elevation, secure in the protection of the British, more powerful than ever after the suppression of the formidable outbreak of 1857, and counting, as a matter of course, on the subserviency of the young Maharaja, had given himself inordinate airs, regarding himself indispensable and irresistible. He had represented himself to the British Government as the real ruler under a puppet prince. Nay more, he had claimed to be the saviour of the State as well as his Sovereign, in terms that almost implied the latter's disloyalty to the Paramount Power. It was a terrible blunder—the greatest in his life—the effects of which he is still enduring and must endure through all time and eternity, until the Divine Mercy should cover him with its all healing ægis! Jeeyaji Rao flew into a rage. His tenderest point had been touched; his highest interest—the British good will—was threatened. He must vindicate his character and status. He would put the pretensions of the Chancellor, so far as they made against the sovereign, to crucial practical test. He resolved to go through a fiery ordeal as it were, before the whole world. He knew he was master, and he would prove that he might be his own minister. It was most uphill work—almost a hopeless programme. The first step was to remove the offending Chancellor, and the British Government was pledged to maintain him. Before Maharaja's force of character and resolute persistency, the British refusal gave way. After repeated attempts to patch up differences irreconcilable, the Viceroy gave up the able minister to retain the powerful master. It was then that the Scindhia set up this Khadkey in the Chancellery, much as Tiberius appointed his donkey, Consul. It was a step too like the frivolous, involving a hazardous experiment; but no hazard was experienced. If all did not at first go merrily as a marriage-bell, there was at any rate no great dislocation in the administration. The Maharaja abundantly proved his point, by submitting himself and his system, such as it was, to a long—a life-long—trial—before all India. He established to every body's satisfaction that he and his Gwalior could do without the British favorite Dinkar Rao.

He showed his contempt for the great Dewan and his achievements in other ways. As the plain Dinkar had been created Raja, so was the simple Gunput. Then, Raja Dinkar Rao was understood to lay great store by his knighthood. Accordingly, his gracious master procured for Gunput that title. Altogether, in course of time, this lay figure of a Premier could call himself Lieutenant-Colonel Rao Raja Sir Gunput Rao Khudkey, Shamshere Jung Bahadoor.

Never was there so lucky an admitted nothing.

During all the time, Sir Gunput remained himself. Though he acquired much experience, he never developed capacity or character. Yet, the master had reason to regard his favorite with satisfaction, for lending himself to his great visible appeal to the British Government and the world, for proving his individuality and his loyalty to the Empire and to all his plans subsidiary thereto. He became more and more attached to his man. So far so good. Unfortunately, however, he came to dote on his favorite at last. The Maharaja confounded the distinction between how the poor thing was utilisable under the master's eye, and what it might prove independently, when that eye was removed. And so the Maharaja, leaving a minor heir at his death, earnestly desired that the British Government might leave, during the minority, his long-trusted agent Gunput at the head of the administration. And so he was put at the head of the Council of Regency. The Maharaja was afraid of nothing so much as foreign interference in the internal affairs of the State. The British were good in their way, and he respected them, but their ways were not suited to the natives, and nothing, in his opinion, could be more disastrous than their breaking through the traditions of Gwalior. Right or wrong, the Maharaja mistook his man by whom he hoped to preserve the integrity of Gwalior. As might be expected, Gunput proved a failure. He is regarded as little better than a traitor. He inaugurated his entrance into power by inducing the Council to abolish hoarding and lend the accumulations of the State to the British Government. That, under ordinary circumstances, might be just the thing to do. The British, at any rate, taught by Political Economy and saturated with commercial notions, could hardly be expected to favour the idea of leaving so much capital vegetating in the vaults without profitable employment. For Gunput, at any rate, it should have been different. He was the representative of the late Raja's views in the State and he knew Jeeyaji Rao's financial ideal, which is indeed the common Oriental one of a large reserve of unemployed capital. He sacrificed it to strengthen himself. Nor was this his only treason. He treated every interest and person cavalierly, neglecting the Palace itself. He had made himself so powerful that every body deemed it prudent to suffer his insolence and injustice in silence, from the Dowager Maharani downwards. He had, of course, virtually usurped the functions of the whole Council. The "adopted son" (in Indian parlance) of the politicals and the Foreign Office, he could well afford to do so. What did the politicals care if the people execrated his name? They were only careful not to let the Viceroy know what the people thought. But he is gone, let us forgive. It is enough to record that we cannot respect his memory.

THE VACANCY IN THE GWALIOR COUNCIL.

Who shall succeed? is the more practical question. A question important to the well-being of the State. The agents of candidates are already in the field, busy touting for their clients. Sir Gunput expired on Saturday last (18th August) and on Thursday the 23rd a leading article appeared in Calcutta strongly advocating the claims of Bhayyiah Bulwunt Rao Scindhia. The writer "has no hesitation whatever in saying that the Bhayyiah will be the right man in the right place." But our contemporary was never given to hesitation. No unworthy doubts disturb the even tenour of its mind, though storms of passion habitually assail it. But our native contemporary, as usual, has been deceived. It has taken a scarecrow in hand to frighten away all grave men and to amuse the waggishly disposed. Except when they are furnished with a special brief, our Bengal journalists do not concern themselves much with the affairs of Native States, and it is well that they do not, as thereby they save themselves from blunders. Thus, here we have our contemporary taking up, with its usual enthusiasm, the cause of a man who has not the slightest chance. In the opinion of the knowing, he is scarcely in the reckoning. The writer shows extraordinary ignorance. He is nonetheless peremptory in his demand:—

"If the Government of India, in selecting a successor to Sir Gunput Rao, should desire to give effect to the wishes of the Maharani Saheb and the people of Gwalior, their course is easy and plain. Their choice cannot fall upon a better individual than Bhayyiah Bulwant Rao Sindia, a member of the late Maharaja's family, who has been recently appointed a member of the Council."

Pure unwitting misleading that! The writer neither knows his own protégé nor the personnel of the Durbar for which he proposes arrangements. Is it to be supposed that the Dowager Maharani prefers a stranger to her own father, and that father so much longer in the Council than the candidate whose pretensions are put forward against the veteran's claims, various and of long standing? And do the Hindus of the great Mahratta State really hanker for the rule of one who is scarcely of their community—a pariah, in fact? The writer conclusively answers himself when he admits that his Bhayyiah is the most junior member of the Council. Surely, he ought to be content with the chance by which he finds himself in the Council at all, without aspiring to be its President over the heads of his seniors by far, who are also his betters in status and experience. His patron in the press designates the Bhayyiah roundly as "a member of the late Maharaja's family." Why does he not out with the whole story? Or, is it possible that he does not know? It is not likely to be in his brief. Yet, the name Scindhia should have warned him. If the client's connection with the royal family were perfectly honourable, ten to one, his specific relationship would be mentioned. But that was impossible, under the circumstances. The fact is, he is not of creditable origin. He calls himself the son of Jeeyaji Rao. Had he been the issue of a respectable connection, he would have been reigning these three years, instead of having lately succeeded in insinuating himself into the Council. He is, strictly speaking, only a son of a Mahomedan Cyprian. She is a famous character of the demi monde of India, and not the most respectable for that matter. She could not be kept within the decent bounds of a kept mistress. She was given a Palace, with a fine establishment and ample allowances, but she was no better than she should have been. Of stooping to folly, there was no end. She might at least take the shelter of the rose. But no! she did not care for appearances, any more than for honour—hers or his. It was here that the strength, for which Jeeyaji Rao was renowned and which he so amply showed in his vengeance on his minister Dinkar Rao, distinctly failed him. The great Mahratta was as dough in the hands of the Mahomedan Magdalene. In meekness, succumbed Mars to Venus. She was an incorrigible truant. A Bohemian to the backbone, she had an irresistible passion for loafing about. The Gypsy turn is difficult to conquer, but of all imps of naughtiness, the female Gypsy is the naughtiest. It was only the nomad instinct of the Mahratta Chief that could put up with such an ignis fatuus. The late Maharaja repeatedly pardoned her, but she, as often, broke her pledge. Of a mercurial temperament, an accomplished Mussulmani of spirit, a grand singer, she loved to see the world and make love at her own sweet will. She several times strayed away, visiting the great cities of Hindostan, where she held séances of all the musicians and singers of the place, admiring and admired. When funds failed, she returned to fall at her princely lover's feet. The season of contrition would not be long. At last, she was thrown on the streets, as it were. She certainly came down to Calcutta as a professional dancing girl. With his usual partiality for Chandrabhaga, the Maharaja took her sons under his protection. The Bhayyiah is of these. Jeeyaji Rao shared the craze of the late Maharaja of Bulrampore, who made his Mussulmani woman's son a Hindu, though Scindhia never went to the length of the Premier Baron of Oudh. So Chandrabhaga's son was brought up as a Hindu, and retains an anomalous position in native society.

If the Government contemplate bringing in an outsider, well and good: There is a wide field for selection. The objection to outsiders is not worth a jot. Strange that it is the British officials themselves who start it and encourage others in it! What are the British themselves, but interlopers all, throughout the East? But, then, they always make a tacit exception in their favour. The prime object is to secure the safety, honor and good government of the State, and if fit natives are not to be had, strangers to a small extent may, and should, be introduced. But our speculation is vain. The prejudice prevails, and Government are scarcely strong enough for a bold departure, except to provide a British protégé who may be forced on it. We believe we may safely presume that there is no intention to seek elsewhere for a regent. If the choice is to lie within the Gwalior State, it is virtually restricted to the Council itself. In that case, we may almost take for granted that the Chair of the Council will be offered to the Senior Member, Bapu Saheb Jado. Nor do we see any objection to such a step. The arrangement will be natural and easy, and sure to meet with general satisfaction within the State. We have exhausted our space, or we should have liked to present to the reader the names and description of those constituting the Regency. We may, hereafter, set forth the rival claims of the different members, and compare them. Meanwhile, we may say in general terms that such a comparison gives the palm to Bapu Saheb. He is a highly respectable man, trusted by the people, as he was wont to be trusted by the late Maharaja. He has ample stake in the country, being one of the largest landed noblemen in it—a very great jagirdar. Last not least, he is the father of the Dowager Queen, and, of course, grand-father of the present sovereign—the minor Maharaja.

THE ENGLISH IN FRANCE.

SKETCHED BY A FRENCH BRUSH.

(Translated for "Reis and Rayyet" from the Paris Correspondence of "Le Petit Bengali.")

The bad weather, which prevented the Parisians from going to the country or the watering places, could not deter Englishmen from invading Paris. Every year in spring, they come like swallows in great numbers to visit our metropolis. They encumber the compartments of railway carriages with their numerous packages—the vade mecum of British comfort. They occupy the saloons of hotels. At the table d'hôte or restaurant, they take up the best places and peep at the choisest morsels. In the public places—the theatres and cafés—you often hear the Saxon idiom buzzing in your ear.

At picture-galleries, they gather round some celebrated pictures, fill the air with their guttural exclamations and banish from the place the peaceful visitor—the lover of calm and silence. As if the Parisian loungers are not enough to disturb us, we are invaded by the English cockneys! They emerge from every road, they enter every gate, they grimace at every window. Taciturn and monosyllabic in their island-home of fogs on the other side of the Channel, no sooner they touch the soil of France, a sort of transformation is operated in them by our clement sun, and they become boisterous, curious, and talkative. What a happiness not to understand the language of Shakespeare!

In the coolness of the morning, a walk under the trees of the Monceaux Park is delicious to a Parisian deprived of verdure. There are some good corners where, half stretched on the back, one can breathe the fresh morning air, allowing his spirit to rove about, before the city's roar well awake him once again. It is the fact. Hardly have I taken my seat, when a ringing noise of rolling carriages and of smacking whips, mixed with the uproar of British jargon, came to drive me from the spot.

These are the cars of the Agency of Cooke, and other contractors of peregrinations at a reduced price, who take their cargo of big folks of red hair to see the world. During summer I love the Park of Saint Cloud with its dome of foliage, on the soft grass of which, one extending at ease on his back, views the fumes of his cigar rising in curls, or reads some pages of his favourite author. Do not go there. You will come in collision with the caravan of English tourists, who will eye you from head to foot and consult their guides to assure themselves that you are not a curiosity. Our grand woods of Mendon, Verriere, Marly, Saint-Germain, no longer belong to us. They will soon be called Green Park and Hyde Park. At every turn, you are in danger of being knocked down by the cars of these excursionists. Too many Englishmen in our city! They have taken Paris from us; let them leave us our Suburbs, if they do not wish that we, imitating the example of the Great Republic with reference to China, should interdict by an Edict the importation of Englishmen into la France. Chased from the parks and the woods, I took my Thackeray by way of reprisals and began to relish—The Book of Snobs.

The class of English travellers who alight on Paris en passant, is not so bad as the set who sojourn long in our capital.

It is now a fashion in England for every rich shop-keeper to put into the pouch of his son a small packet of bank-notes and send him to sow his wild oats in our city—a great honour which the Englishmen do to us! The young man alights with his peculiar ideas of Paris; there he considers himself as in an inn, perhaps in those lodginghouses, which, at the entrance to Vienna, they propose to travellers.

He judges every Frenchman after those whom he saw in the Haymarket, and every Parisian according to the legend of bad novels and the accounts in the newspapers. Then it is not a visitor who comes to us, it is a vanquisher and a conqueror. Have you remarked the attitude of these conquerors in regard to our honest women? Those who in their island are under a chapter so severe, so formal, sometimes so ridiculous, will regard under their nose a Parisian dame and will not lose an occasion for a stupid insult.

In England, it is a great impropriety to smoke before a lady. I have lived in the environs of Paris and twenty times in railway trains I have been obliged to remind these gentlemen that it has been prohibited to smoke in a compartment where there are ladies.

It is now time to cut short the fable of generous Englishmen and prodigal Milords. The truth is that these passenger-sons of City tradesmen mean to make holidays at reduced rates. Consult the chronicles of gallantry from the alcoves of fashion and you will see which side of certain Parisian manners they adopt the soonest. Their reputation on this point has been made from a long time.

THE JAIN CASE IN THE HIGH COURT.

APPEAL No. 11 OF 1888.

In the Goods of Cullumull Sett deceased.

Suruj Kumari Dasse vs. Lab Chand Sett.

Before Petheram, C. J., Norris and Beverley, J. J.

First Day. July 31, 1888.

Pugh with Sale and Abdur Rahman for Appellant.

Woodroffe with O'Kincaly for Lab Chand.

Sale opens: Cullumull died in 1875, leaving a will and a widow Munia Bibi and a daughter-in-law, widow of Nuthmull. By the will of Cullumull he appointed his brother Dhunsook Dass, Fool

Chand and his widow executors and executrix. Fool Chand and Dhunsook took out probate. Leave was reserved to widow. Fool Chand then died. Dhunsook died in 1875, and then the widow died. On the death of the widow Munia Bibi, Lab Chand, alleging himself to be adopted son, applied for Letters of Administration, under the will of Cullumull. The daughter-in-law is Choone Bibi.

To Court. My client does not take anything under the will, but we come in in case of intestacy.

Sale. They say that Suruj Kumari is not entitled to come in.

To C. J. Dhunsook Dass was uterine brother of Cullumull.

C. J. The best thing is to settle this matter and let Lab Chand have letters of administration.

Woodroffe. Suruj Kumari has no interest at all.

Sale continues.

C. J. A man who has no right to Letters of Administration, has no right to dispute the Letters to another.

Sale to Beverley J. Under Sec. 69 Probate and Letters of Administration Act citations are issued.

C. J. refers to Sec. 18 of the P & L Act. Reads Sec. 22, ditto.

Woodroffe. It has been held that those who are entitled to enter caveat are persons who would be entitled to Letters of Administration. They must have some interest.

C. J. Suruj Kumari will have some interest.

Sale. Under the Jain law she claims in preference to her son.

C. J. What would be under Hindu law?

Sale. She would have an interest under the Hindu law too.

Woodroffe. Dhunsook Dass died before Cullumull's widow. No Hindu widow gets any interest in any estate which does not vest in her husband.

Sale. Supposing Suruj Kumari was a Hindu, according to some Bombay cases, she will have an interest.

C. J. You say that if Lab Chand is out of the way, you are heir to Cullumull.

Sale. Yes.

C. J. The learned Judge below says that the adopted nephew takes before the mother. Was their case that the mother took in preference to the son?

Sale. The Jain law all.

C. J. You say the widow takes an estate. Does she take a life estate or an absolute estate?

Sale. She takes a life estate.

C. J. What questions do you like us to try now?

Sale. We say that the learned Judge was wrong in introducing the question of the adoption of Padam Chand.

C. J. At all events what you say is she takes life interest. How does she become an heir to her brother-in-law? The blood relations had to be exhausted.

Sale. Cullumull says in his will that the brothers are joint. Then I say that according to Jain law she is entitled.

C. J. We are trying your right to appear.

Sale. We say that the Judge below was wrong in raising the issue regarding Padam Chand.

Norris. J. Is not the learned Judge right in saying who you were to object to the Letters?

C. J. After issue that you have no locus standi, why should he try the other questions?

Sale. We also said that Lab Chand being so young was not fit to administer.

Norris. J. The truth is your former suit having been dismissed, you want to bring in this suit.

C. J. You say that under intestacy the widow takes in preference to son. In the case of property to which the husband would have been entitled if he had been alive, a Jain widow takes before her son in case of intestacy.

Sale. I would put it "a Jain widow succeeds to her deceased husband's brother's estate upon the death of such brother's widow in priority to her son." And apart from the Jain law, my client would have right of maintenance and therefore entitled to come in.

Sale reads judgment.

C. J. If a Hindu dies leaving a wife and son, do not the wife and son both take?

Sale. Not exactly, as held recently that the interest which the widow took, her share, was carved out of the son's estate.

C. J. What might have happened is this that you might have called a lot of Pandits who quote lots of authorities which have become obsolete, and the living Jains entirely repudiate the law.

Sale. The Pandits say that the law has not in any way been abrogated.

2nd Day. August 1, 1888.

Pugh follows.

C. J. Is the evidence of the Pandits against the people?

Pugh. No.

Norris. J. The Shastras come to this that the widow takes a higher estate than the son. That is all.

Pugh. Yes, but if it was a simple question of custom, the case would have been different. A son does not take until after the widow's death,

C. J. I had to consider the Jain custom as opposed to the Jain custom in a case at Allahabad.

Norris. J. Probably you are desirous of getting leave to say that Jain custom in this case has not been proved. The logical conclusion of Trevelyan. J. is the same.

Pugh. Yes. As to evidence of custom, we have the evidence of Rup Chand Sitia and Sitalparshad. Cites I. L. R. 11 Cal. 492.

C. J. If the property belongs to Lab Chand, she is not entitled to any maintenance out of this property.

Pugh. No.

Norris. J. refers to Sec. 23 Probate and Administration Act.

Pugh. If she has got a right of maintenance, she has a right to proceed. Cites I. L. R., 6 Cal. 494. 2 Taylor and Bell, p. 190. I. L. R. 11 Bom. 199.

Woodroffe refers to 2 B. L. R. 15.

C. J. This question was not taken in the lower Court, nor is it taken as a ground of appeal.

Pugh. If I am entitled to maintenance, I am entitled to come as of right.

C. J. Norris. J. thinks you can't go into this question.

Norris. J. You will not be damnified by the grant of Letters to Lab Chand.

Woodroffe refers to Sec. 541 and 542, Civil Procedure Code.

Pugh reads Grounds. Reads I. L. R. 11 Bombay. There is no evidence that Dhunsook was adopted in the family.

Norris. J. Mr. Sale admitted that Dhunsook was adopted in another family.

Pugh. There is no evidence as to that and Mr. Sale's statement must have been

C. J. We cannot go into that case; it opens up a very large question. The only thing we can do is to remand the case to Court below.

Norris. J. You can bring a suit to establish your rights against Lab Chand, or may apply for revocation of the Letters.

Pugh closes.

Woodroffe not called upon.

Norris. J. The facts out of which this appeal arises may be shortly stated as follow. One Cullumull Sett who died on the 28th August 1875 made a will of which he appointed his brother Dhunsook Das Sett and one Fool Chand Johurry the executors and Munia Bibee, his wife, executrix. The executors obtained probate of the will and leave was reserved to the executrix Munia Bibi to come in subsequently and obtain probate. Both the executors died and after the death of the survivor of the two, namely, on the 28th April 1886, the executrix, Munia Bibi applied for and obtained probate of the will. On the 20th May 1887, she died and on the 7th November 1887 Lab Chand Sett applied for Letters of Administration with the will annexed. The application set forth the facts I have already stated and alleged that the estate of Cullumull had not been fully administered, and that he the applicant was the only adopted son of one Nuthmull who was the only son of Cullumull, the deceased testator; that is to say, that he was the grandson of the testator. A caveat had been entered by one Suruj Kumari Dasi, I think in May 1886 or shortly after probate was granted to Munia Bibi, and she opposed the grant of Letters of Administration to Lab Chand Sett. She alleged that she was the only widow of Dhunsook Dass, the brother of the testator and one of the executors under his will, and that Lab Chand had not been duly adopted as a son; and that in the events which had happened there was an intestacy as to Cullumull's estate and that his property after his death vested in her husband Dhunsook Dass, and after his death in her as his widow.

On the caveat coming on to be argued before Mr. Justice Trevelyan that learned Judge framed the following issues: "Has the caveatrix Suraj Kumari Bibijany and what interest in the estate of the testator Cullumull Sett deceased, and is she entitled to contest the right of Lab Chand Sett to obtain Letters of Administration de do nis non with the will annexed to the estate and effects of the testator?"

Then in answer to her caveat, it was contended that Dhunsook Dass had adopted a son one Paddam Chand, that he was the heir to Cullumull if Cullumull had died intestate and that therefore the lady had not any interest, at any rate not sufficient interest to be allowed to come in and contest the right of Lab Chand to letters of administration. To this the lady replied to this effect: "even supposing my husband did leave an adopted son, according to the local custom of the Oswal caste of the Sitamberi sect of Jains, I am heir to my husband's brother."

The parties then went to trial upon this issue, and upon this issue Mr. Justice Trevelyan says: "During the course of the trial, in consequence of an objection taken to some of the evidence, I found it necessary to express my opinion of what I thought was the meaning of an issue of the description, and I am bound to say that, on a more careful consideration, I am more impressed with the view I then took. As I understand a proceeding of this kind and as I understand Section 23 of the Probate and Administration Act which governs this case, I must grant administration to the next of kin of the deceased. Primarily the next of kin are entitled to Letters of Administration, and as I understand this issue it is not only an issue as to whether the caveatrix has any interest but I have also to decide whether she is entitled to contest the right of Lab Chand Sett to Letters of Administration. So far as I know, no person is entitled to contest a claim to Letters of Administration unless he has a prior right, and if this lady is not next of kin it follows she is not entitled to contest the application. The question whether she is next of kin depends upon whether she or Paddam Chand is entitled to succeed to the estate of the deceased. The question of Lab Chand's adoption has not been gone into here and has been postponed to the decision of the case. The lady admits nothing and the adoption is disputed. It was contended in the course of the trial that I should not go into any evidence as to Paddam Chand's adoption, and it was said that independent of that, the lady has a right to the estate. It seems to me that if Paddam Chand is the heir of the deceased, this lady can have no interest in the estate and therefore would not be entitled to contest the right of Lab Chand."

It has been argued before us in the first place, by Mr. Pugh, on behalf of the appellant, that the learned Judge was in error in not setting this down as a contentious cause before deciding the issue which he framed, but while that point is taken it is I think practically admitted that it really amounts to nothing more than a question of form and does not touch the merits of the case.

The second objection that was taken by the learned counsel is that the Judge was wrong in the view he took of the right of this lady to appear and contest the grant of Letters of Administration.

It may be and perhaps is the case that the learned Judge in the Court below has taken too narrow a view of the rights of parties to come in and contest the grant of Letters of Administration. But what Mr. Pugh seeks to do now is this: after having put his case in the Court below upon the ground that by the local custom of a particular caste of a particular sect of Jains to which this family belonged, his client was next of kin and had an interest in the estate and was entitled to contest the grant of Letters of Administration, he now seeks to take a different ground, it may be arising out of the ground that was taken below, but certainly an entirely different ground to the one taken below, and says, assuming for the sake of argument that I have not succeeded in proving the usage upon which I relied, yet I have a right to maintenance out of the estate in the hands of my husband's adopted son, and if I have such a right, I have a sufficient interest to entitle me to see that the estate goes into his hands and does not go into the hands of any other party.

We think that that is not a case which arises upon the facts, either found or agreed upon between the parties, and that that subsidiary case, as it were, ought not to be allowed to be now made for the first time in this Court, and I may further say that if Mr. Pugh's contention is right, as to which I express no opinion at all, it will be open to him to raise the point in one of two ways, he may either sue the parties in whose hand the estate is to get that right of maintenance declared or he may apply for revocation of the Letters of Administration.

The learned Judge then proceeds to consider two questions of fact: first whether Paddam Chand was the legally adopted son of Dhunsook Dass, and, secondly, whether the caveatrix had proved the local custom which she alleged, and he finds as to the first of these questions that the adoption of Paddam Chand is proved and proved by the brother of the caveatrix, and as to this there is no appeal. The learned Judge also finds that the alleged custom is not proved; and from that finding the caveatrix appeals.

The evidence that was adduced to prove the custom was that of certain Jain pundits who professed to be, and it may be were acquainted with the written law of the Jain community as contained in some old manuscript books, and the learned Judge seems to have been of opinion that those books were authentic. In these books there were certain texts which were accepted by the learned Judge as authorities for the proposition that among the Jains a widow succeeds to her husband's estate before the son. I have looked at the evidence and considered it, and what it seems to me to amount to is this, that these pundits were of opinion, and their opinion was corroborated by reference to these early manuscript books, that among the Jains, at the time these books were written, a Jain widow occupied a somewhat higher position than that occupied by a Hindu widow, and that her estate, whatever it is, is a higher estate than that of a Hindu widow, and that when it came into existence it was enjoyed before the son took his estate.

Mr. Justice Trevelyan then goes on to say, that, though that is the opinion of the pundits who have been called and though that opinion is corroborated by the books which they produce, he finds that as a matter of fact the precepts contained in these books is opposed to the practice of the Jain community. He found upon the evidence, instances of a son suing whilst his mother was living, that is, of suits being brought in the son's name whilst the mother was alive, and upon a consideration of the whole of the evidence, into the details of which it is not necessary for me to enter, he came to the conclusion that the local usage as alleged by the caveatrix was not proved, and with that conclusion we entirely agree.

It must be distinctly understood that, in dismissing this appeal, as we do dismiss it with costs, we express no opinion as to what the local usage or custom among this particular sect of Jairs may be; all we say is that we agree with the learned Judge in the conclusion to which he came that the caveatrix did not succeed in proving the local usage upon which she relied.

We therefore think that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Petheram. C. J. I agree with my brother Norris that this appeal must be dismissed with costs and I only wish to add one word. The lady who was objecting to the grant of Probate was objecting on the ground that she was entitled to the property and that was the ground upon which she based her case and she sought to establish that by the assertion of two matters as matters of fact; first of all, that the person who was said to be the adopted son of her husband had not been adopted by him and secondly that even if he were so adopted, according to the custom of a particular sect in the particular locality in which she lived, she, as widow, took an interest prior to that son. Both these matters were put forward as matters of fact and not as matters of law.

With reference to the adoption of the son, Mr. Justice Trevelyan has found that the adoption was a valid adoption, and as to the other point there is no appeal, and the only real ground of appeal is that this alleged custom is proved. Looking at the evidence which was before the Judge, I can only say that I agree with him that the custom is not proved.

As to Mr. Pugh's contention that, notwithstanding that she has an interest which would entitle her to object to these Letters of Administration being granted, I think myself that in a court of appeal any point of law is open for argument which arises upon the facts which were found or admitted in the case. But I do not think any point is open for argument which necessitates the taking of other evidence, because it is clear that that would not be an appeal from the Judge upon the hearing but it would be a new trial. The question which Mr. Pugh now seeks to raise in this appeal, and having regard to the fact that the establishing this local custom would involve the taking of fresh evidence, is not, in my opinion, open to him to raise in this appeal, and further I do not think there is necessity to remand this case, for the purpose of taking fresh evidence, because this is really only a question as to the person to whom Letters of Administration should be granted, for to whomsoever it is granted, he must give security and does not decide any person's right in the case, and therefore I do not see any necessity to take such a course. Beverley. J. I concur.

Important News for India,
WHERE FEVERS AND CHOLERA
REIGN SUPREME.

A RECENT TRAVELLER ON THE
Chinese Coast found that District remarkably FREE FROM TYPHOID FEVER and CHOLERA. He soon discovered the cause. The people there do not drink cold water from tanks or wells, often extremely impure, but keep a pan of water constantly boiling, into which from time to time they drop a little Tea, and when thirsty THEY DRINK HOT TEA! If the weak and adulterated Teas of China can do this, what may not the pure and strong Teas of India be expected to effect?

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a represen-

ation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "He serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne puff in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kiisto Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINI DASSY (Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohini's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE FRESHER SPRING TIME.

It comes again, thrilling each sense in turn !
We strain the eye to see, the ear to hear ;—
It sickens in each sense and dies of fear,
Yet leaves the spirit tiptoe-set to learn.
We, wondering, look on all sides to discern Aught of its leaving ; turning quick to peer
Into the by-ways of the soul, crying, " Who goes here ? "
But answer comes not, though the temples burn.

What is it ? Who can tell ?—but this we feel,
The moment is as though a rich new birth
Fought with the old to give us liberty :—
The pulse of newness makes the senses reel,
The long-loved past is as a dream, and earth,
Ocean, and sky are quick with mystery !

JOHN HOGGEN.

BONAMY PRICE.

[IN MEMORIAM.]

WHO that beheld and knew thee, but would fain
Preserve thy image for the coming race ?
The prompt, quick mien ; the vivid, mobile face ;
Broad brow, firm lip ; the invigorating strain
Of converse ; argument, that ne'er would gain
A point unfairly ; tales that ran apace,
Not scant, nor overfull ; the softer grace
And tenderer manner, growing with life's wane.

Children would fly yet seek thee, half-dismayed
But wholly mirthful ; every living thing
Felt thy electric presence, and was stirred.
Now all thy cares, thy thoughts, with God are laid
In silent peace, till thine eternal spring
Blossoms at bidding of our Father's word.

DESPAIR—OF FAME.

[The author of these lines—a girl of twenty-five—was drowned in a Welsh river last August. The night before her death she was heard to say : " If I do not die soon, I think I shall make something of poetry. "]

If this poor name of mine, now writ in sand
On Life's grey shore, which Time for ever laves—
—A hungry ocean of unresting waves—
Might but be graven on rock, and so withstand
A little while the weather and the tide,
Great joy were mine. Alas ! I cannot guide
My chisel right to carve the stubborn stone
Of Fame ; and so the numbness of despair

Invades me ; for the sounding names are there
Of all Earth's great ones ; and methinks mine own
Fades in their music ; yet before the light
Has vanished from the sky, and unblest night,
In which no man can work, shall stain the air,
I stand and weep on the grey shore—alone.

" Felix qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas,
Atque metus omnes et inexorabile fatum
Subiecit pedibus, strepitumque Acherontis avari."
" Sunt lacrymæ rerum, et mentem mortalia tangunt."—VIRGIL.

" HAPPY were he who could attain to know
Causes of things, and underneath his feet
Set fear and fate, and the unreturning flow
Of all-devouring Acheron." Oh ! unmeet
Such tearless Stoic calm for thee, the sweet
Half-Christian poet of the Pagan age,
Whom later times esteemed a wizard sage,
And Dante as his guide rejoiced to greet ;
Tender as woman, and as childhood pure !
Not thoughts like those shall in his mind endure
Who learns aright the lore thy genius brings ;
/ But human sympathy for human woe,
And words of thine which tell that " tears must flow,
And hearts of men are touched by mortal things."

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

THE Sikkim difficulty thickens. The capture of Fort Lingtu has only enraged the Lhasa-Lamas and the Thibetians. They showed fight and attacked Gnatong at the end of May, and there were other preparations on the slopes of the Jelepla. Our troops have been strengthened, and a sharp and decisive action is awaited.

THE Legislative Assembly of the Hawaiian Islands has passed a Bill, by thirty five votes against ten, abolishing the naval establishment and reducing the army to sixty-five men. Here is a Lilliput of a State, to be sure. It could hardly take the field against the Republic of San Marino.

MR. TUCKER, the Second Assistant to the Resident, Hyderabad, has sentenced Mr. Job Salomon, the editor, Hyderabad Record, to six months' imprisonment for libelling Mr. G. W. ACCORDING to the Advocate, the Dharam Jivan, a vernacular paper of Lahore, learns that Mr. Larpent, of the great bribery case of Lahore, has been appointed Sub-editor of the Pioneer, and is to get Rs. 1,000 a month.

Mr. Larpent is well-connected, but the report requires confirmation.

THE Cantonment Magistrate has fined a municipal Commissioner of South Barrackpore Rs. 10, for some old and rusty guns discovered in his house by the Police. They would have been better employed in detecting thefts. It strikes us that in the liberal interpretation of the Arms Act, by rules under it, the municipal Commissioners, like Honorary Magistrates, ought to be exempted from its operation.

THE Vernacular Press in the N. W. Provinces is said to have been placed under the superintendence of the Police. The office of the Reporter has certainly been removed from Allahabad to Lucknow and placed under the charge of Mr. Barriell, the newly appointed Assistant to Inspector-General of Police.

A GOODS train on the East Indian Railway had carried along with its contents, a lad from Girihdi to Mogul-Serai, who fed himself for five whole days on the aroma of the confined coal. His cries at every halting station were lost on the ears of the Railway people, till they attracted notice at Mogul Serai, where he was released more dead than alive.

ACCORDING to a St. Petersburg telegram, Colonel Prejavalsky was to have started this week on an exploring expedition in the west and south-west of Central Asia, with Lhassa in view. It is timed for two years and consists of 71 persons inclusive of 24 Cossacks.

THE Parsee Cricketers who are now in England to give battle to the natives show a great improvement on their invasion of 1886, and, of course, earn better success. They doubtless kept up practice, but they evidently profited by their English experience too. In their previous visit,

"their batting lacked the most essential quality—defence—their bowling, while none too straight, was of erratic length, and their fielding was frequently loose and unreliable."

"Now their batting, if wanting in dash, is marked by care and judgment; the bowling is of fairly good length, and the fielding, judged by its high standard yesterday, would not suffer in comparison with that of the best English elevens."

Such is the testimony of the Northampton Daily Chronicle quoted in the Rast Gofstar. There was a great contest at Northampton, in which the natives were totally worsted.

It will be observed that there are natives and natives, even on terra firma. It may be some consolation to our Anglicising countrymen that, under certain circumstances, even the best British are no better than natives.

HERE is the latest development of education in go-ahead America:—

"The Cornell University in the United States is about to establish a school of journalism, with the aim of 'fitting students for the walks of newspaper life in all its varieties.' Professor Smith, at present Professor of Elocution in the University, an 'old newspaper man,' is to be at the head of the new department. Classes of juniors, seniors and graduates will be formed at once. The students will roam about in the neighbourhood of their town, and bring in reports of public meetings, murders, 'personal' scandals, and the like. They will also write leading articles and criticisms of books. Professor Smith will receive the 'copy,' and publicly edit it in presence of the class."

THE rules about prosecutions against public officers have been thus revised by the Bengal Government:—

"1. When a prosecution against an officer of Government is instituted by a public servant, the officer charged will be left to defend himself, but Government will defray his reasonable costs in the event of his being acquitted and it being shown that his conduct throughout had been free from all blame. If, though acquitted of the offence charged, his conduct should appear not to be free from blame, he will receive only such portion, if any, of the cost incurred by him as may seem fitting to the Government.

2. When an action or prosecution is instituted by a private person against a public servant for acts done in the discharge of his public duty, the officer concerned should communicate the facts to his official superior, reporting all circumstances which may be necessary to enable such superior officer and the Government to arrive at a decision on the merits of the case. In cases of importance where a reference will not involve serious delay, such facts should be reported immediately to Government for orders. Should the Government decide to undertake the defence of the case, the Government Pleader will be instructed to appear, otherwise the officer charged will be left to make his own arrangements. In (a) unimportant cases, and (b) cases of urgency where reference to Government would involve serious delay, District Officers and Heads of Departments should use their own discretion regarding the measures to be taken.

3. Where no appearance is entered on behalf of Government and the action is dismissed, or the accused discharged or acquitted, the case will be dealt with as is provided under rule 1, allowance being made for the expenses (if any) realizable under the order of Court.

4. It is to be distinctly understood that charges, the payment of which may be applied for under these rules, must be moderate, and that the Government does not bind itself to pay unnecessary expenses which the officer concerned may choose to incur. In petty cases an appearance in person will be often quite sufficient, and where this is so the employment of a pleader is superfluous. In the same way requests for the payment of Counsel will be entertained only under very exceptional circumstances."

THE average attendance at the Indian Museum, for the 23 days of July, was 1,659, 38,164 persons in all having visited, as follows:—natives, 29,918 males and 7,833 females—Europeans, 333 males and 80 females.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

ISHAK KHAN, the Governor of Afghan Turkistan, has raised the standard of revolt against his master. He has removed from his headquarters at Mazar-i-Shureef to the Shadian Hills. He sent out two regiments to Maimma to spread the revolt, but these went over to Herat and reported the matter. Ishak is a cousin of the Amir and is believed in Cabul to have an eye on the Amirship. Abdur Rahman always distrusted him and several times summoned him to the capital. But he always avoided the call. In the last, he scented a rat and warned his followers at the capital to remove their families. The Boundary Commissioners found him more a priest than a Governor, he was so much given to outward shows of religion. Nevertheless, he is a capable Governor and always promptly suppressed local disturbances.

ANOTHER pretty prospect for the poor tax-payer! A mission has been deputed to Cabul. And why? Because friend Abdur Rahman, good soul, is anxious to have the advice of friend Dufferin on "certain matters of importance on which he has doubts." Nothing could be better, of course. And so the Viceroy's Private Secretary and the Public Secretary in the Foreign Office have been despatched all the way to the heart of Afghanistan, the one to represent the Government, and the other to supply, vicariously though, the personal viceroyal element and sanction.

To descend to particulars, the Mission is headed by Mr. H. M. Durand, the Foreign Secretary, and will be escorted by a squadron of the 18th Bengal Lancers with Captain G. A. Money as Commander and Lieutenants Eardley-Wilmot and K. Chesney as Subalterns. The other members of the Commission are Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace, Lieutenant-Colonel Neville Chamberlain, one Punjab frontier official, Lieutenant-Manners Smith, military Attaché in the Foreign Office, and Dr. Owen, Staff Surgeon to Sir Frederick Roberts in Cabul in 1879-80. Sir Afzar Jung of the Nizam's Army and some other native officers of the Indian Army familiar with Afghanistan also are attached. The party rendevous at Lundi Khana whence the Mission makes ten marches to Cabul, where its stay is not to exceed a fortnight. The mission starts from Peshawar immediately and returns to it early next month.

This Advising Expedition is rather a costly luxury, the repetition of which must be embarrassing. It may be endured once in an age, but there is no guarantee against its forming a precedent. So far as we may venture to judge from the dark, it seems a needless departure. Could not the matters be disposed of by correspondence? There are doubtless delicate subjects which cannot well be so disposed of. We hope the Viceroy is satisfied that the doubts which oppress the Ameer's mind appertain to such subjects. Unless the Government were apprised of the questions, how could they undertake to advise on them? Surely, the advising commission are not armed with a carte blanche to settle matters of imperial policy and international difficulty.

The expense is the least part of the matter. What we are really afraid of, is that this is the forerunner of what is to come. If this peaceful mission does not lead to war, it may lead to preparations for the future. The Ameer may have invited the British representatives for the purpose of palavering them to obtain a large grant of money and munitions of war, to enable him to conquer and subdue his dependent chiefs and the independent chiefs around him, on promise of presenting a strong and united front of resistance to the inevitable Russian advance. And no doubt that is a paramount object worth the sacrifice.

WE notice that in some quarters Sir Dinkar Rao is recommended for the office of President of the Gwalior Regency. An unfortunate suggestion. The famous Brahman never did well again after he fell under the evil eye of his once indulgent master the late Sindhia. He had more than one opportunity of distinguishing himself, after his retirement from Gwalior, and he had the inestimable advantage of thorough British support, but he failed and was speedily compelled to beat a retreat. In Rewah, he had for rival a Bengali, who had neither his prestige nor any local connections. Yet he found himself no match for the Baboo. And now he is old and superannuated, it would almost be a pity to disturb him in his retirement. He has long since abandoned all thoughts of active service. He may possibly still clutch at an offer to rule in the old scene of his power and glory. It will hardly redound to his credit. What is worse, it will probably be regarded as a calamity in Gwalior. Certainly, many influential families in that State will be in terror at the prospect of the old minister's return. Those who supported the late Maharaja Jeeyaji Rao in his resolve to drive him out and keep him out, or to undo his minister's work before and after he finally left Gwalior, have real cause for apprehending the minister's vengeance. In fine, he will never do.

THE following, from the Bombay Gazette, is going the round of the press as "A Hard Case":—

"The Civil Service Commissioners have been troubled by a delicate question. A candidate for the Indian Service appeared before them who said he was born in Oudh on July 13, 1869. 'Was he a British subject?' asked the Commissioner. 'The subject of a protected Native State is not a natural born subject of the Queen—unless he happened to have been born within the Queen's Dominions.' This decision puts Indian princes and their subjects very much in a position of independence. It seems that the candidate and his father have recently resided in Hyderabad, but nothing more is said as to the identity of this A.B., as he is designated. He was not allowed to compete, not being a British-born subject."

To us, this is rather an incomprehensible case. We do not question the dictum of Mr. Pontifex. It is an indisputable proposition in law that the subjects of native states, even of the smallest in Katywar or the most obscure in the hills of Orissa, whose Chief trembles before the pettiest British official, are not the subjects of the Queen. That is law, though the fact may seem otherwise. Yet it is a law which the Indian Bureaucracy would fain abolish, as they do their best to ignore it in practice. But surely this law does not put out the candidate mentioned. If his birth place and birth date are correctly given, he is not only a British subject but a British-born subject too, in Mr. Pontifex's meaning of that phrase—that is, a man born in the Queen's own dominions, either at Home or abroad. Born in Oudh in 1869, he is indubitably a full subject of Her Britannic Majesty from birth. How he came to be denied permission to compete in London for the Indian Civil Service, we really do not understand.

NAWAB Khurshed Jali Shumsul Omrah Bahadour, the Premier noble of the Deccan, as head of the Household or Paiga Force, not only owns a large hereditary Jageer worth several lacs a year, but also a separate jurisdiction on, and in respect of, the estate. The Nawab bears a high character as a Mahomedan nobleman of the old school. He is not only free from degrading vices, but, unlike many an Indian of opulence in the Deccan or elsewhere, he is assiduous in the management of his vast property. From recent intelligence, it would seem that the Nawab's jurisdiction is not free from the corruption prevailing in the entire Government. He has suspended the Nazim of his City Court and appointed Taloqdar Syed Akbar Ali to prosecute the Moulvie for embezzlement of Stamp Revenue and criminal misappropriation in general and forgery, before Mr. R. D. Hare, Sudder Taloqdar and Chief Judge of his Court of Sessions. With so many high and mighty delinquents just now being caught all over India, with a classical Resident of Hyderabad and a critical Judge in Bengal—both of the Covanted Civil Service—just forced to retire, with a Divisional Commissioner in Bengal disgraced the other day, and another far more eminent Divisional Commissioner in Bombay just now to be tired, this may seem almost prosaic business. But there is always sure to be something to prick up attention in Hyderabad matters. Accordingly, we learn that on the 9th August, five days after information was laid against the Moulvie (on the 4th), the poor prosecutor Akbar Ali was surprised by a number of roughs at dinner at his own house and left hors de combat.

We have much pleasure in reproducing the following paragraph from the Army and Navy Gazette of the 4th August :—

“ ‘Bother your sympathy!’ exclaimed a choleric Confederate to a British friend of the South in 1862; ‘it doesn’t fight! Burn a little gunpowder for us, and then we’ll believe you are some pumpkins.’ The Danes, who are assured by the metropolitan journals that they are so dearly loved, and that gallant little Denmark was an object of the deepest interest, solicitude, and admiration to us when she was fighting for her Alsace-Lorraine in 1864, very likely feel as the ‘Secesh’ gentleman did; and when the Danes read all the flummery poured out on them by the London papers à propos of the German Emperor’s visit to Copenhagen, they may exclaim, ‘Save us from our friends.’ Imagine how we would take such twaddling philanthropy from the press of Denmark if Ireland were wrested from the Union by force of alien arms! It is a delusion much to be shunned and deprecated, but it is one very vigorous in the minds of Englishmen, that if they utter pretty expressions, they are conferring substantial benefits on the objects of their praise. The feeling of the Danish Commonalty was unmistakably shown during the Imperial Visit to Copenhagen.”

Them’s our sentiment! In this canting age, it is refreshing to come upon such straightforward language. Bad as injustice is, it is more endurable in its downright avowed ill will than the mockery of its disguise of favour and love, duty and humanity. Probably, the most irritating of all our miseries, from the selfishness of a close governing body, is the unctious talk ad nauseam of our good being the guiding principle of action of men who are always aggrandising themselves at the expense of every other interest, and supporting each other in their worst pretences even unto guilt.

HERE, from the Army and Navy Gazette, is a neat account of the little quarrel between France and Italy which may yet develop into an affair of gravity and perhaps a calamity to the world :—

“Neither France nor Italy has any right to Massowah. But Italy has the substantial possession which is considered the title-deed of the occupier who chooses to hoist his flag on any barbarous coast. The theory of the European Powers is that there are no native rights to the coasts on which they live—that is to say, that if any man-of-war takes a fancy to a piece of black-fellow’s land, he has only to land and seize it, should he not have been preceded by the ship of some other civilised State. But in the case of Massowah there was an actual occupation by an Egyptian garrison as holders of it for the Khedive on behalf of the Sultan. These officers and soldiers marched out under protest; their flag was hauled down, and the Italians hoisted their own on the Turkish flagstaff. The Times accepts—or rather affirms—that there was no force at Massowah when the Italians appeared, and that it was what lawyers call res nullius; but the proposition cannot be maintained for a moment. It is in flat opposition to recorded facts. As a Turkish possession Massowah was subject to the Capitulations, and the French claim for French subjects there the benefit of exemption from taxation, and the Italians refuse to admit the exemption—a pretty quarrel as it stands.”

And capable of developing into a serious complication, specially after the recent despatch of Signor Crispi, backed presumably by the Berlin Chancellor. We believe France will have to submit in the end, the more so as, under the Law of Nations, she has no locus standi.

FROM the same source, we learn with satisfaction that the most conciliatory disposition prevails in the ministry towards the poor Zulus. Sir Henry Bulwer and the General in command of the Dinizulu Expedition have been warned that the recent outrages are not to be punished with any severity. As soon as armed resistance is at an end, every attempt is to be made to induce the Zulus to settle down to their wonted peaceful avocations.

THE Czar has lost his Fouché. On the morning of the Festival at Kieff, on the 9th centenary of the conversion of the Russians to Christianity, the Governor-General (of the South Eastern Provinces) was killed by a fall from his horse. He rose through Guards to the chief command of the rearguard in charge of the communications in the Turkish campaign of 1877. He gave so much satisfaction as, on the conclusion of war, to receive the highly confidential and responsible office of the head of the secret police (known as the Third Section) and Corps of Gendarmerie. Accordingly, he became the objective of the Nihilists, one of whom, Mirsky, followed him on horseback alongside his carriage on the quay of the Neva, till he shot him through the carriage window. In 1881, he was appointed to the joint office of Governor-General of South Eastern Russia (Kieff, Podolia, and Volhynia) and General of the local military Division. A member of the Privy Council and Adjutant-General to the Czar, he received, in March last, the Order of St. Andrew the Apostle, the highest in the Empire. His Majesty telegraphed a message of condolence to the widow of the deceased.

AMERICA is always supplying something to talk of :—

“A shower of hat recently occurred in Norfolk county, U. S. Several hundred straw hats fluttered down from the clouds into the streets of Medfield, though not a few stayed their descent on church-steeple and house-roofs. A cyclone that had visited a hat factory some ten miles off was the cause of this singular occurrence. It had carried to the upper regions of the air some hundreds of straw hats, which were drying in bushels on the grounds of the factory, and had blown them along till they were raised exactly over Medfield, when they gently came down.”

What a mockery of a windfall! To what base uses may the grand forces of Nature may be put! It is as bad as the trick of the Theosophists, who employ Mahatmans as hawk-runners in the air to bring messages that never mean much, if anything at all, in particular, from Thibet, on genuine De la Rue, or that of the Spiritualists, who call up the spirit of Shakespeare to indite doggerel. A cyclone to set hats and umbrellas flying about! And then a shower of straw hats! Fie, Jonathan, fie! One would suppose you would prefer to set free the dollars of your Goulds and Mackays, and send them flying ‘cross country and descending on the lap of the poor emigrants in your backwoods—it would not do to choose such infidel regions as the Atlantic States, and specially the great cities, for the scene of anything like a miracle. You were never given to unmanly punctilios when bent on feats on your long bow, as famous as the shield of Achilles. What, at all events, prevented you from letting slip the scrips of your bloated over-laden plutocrats?

ENGLISH law is scarcely less ruinous at Home than Abroad. Mr. Hutt, the clergyman, who unsuccessfully prosecuted the pedagogues of Haileybury College for defaming his son, a boarder there, as a thief, has been £800 out of pocket. A subscription is on foot for his relief. He must need it sorely. The Reverend gentleman is a poor servant of his master, who has dutifully observed the divine command to increase and multiply, having already thirteen sons and daughters. What would a famous pedagogue of the old Haileybury—Parson Malthus—have said to him?

FROM Ritualism to Romanism, the descent is easy, as that down Avernus, and we are not surprised that the great patron of ecclesiastical millinery in the Anglican nobility, the Duke of Newcastle has joined the Catholic Church.

It has all gone for nought—all the ado taken by the gifted Disraeli to invest his sovereign mistress with the title of Empress and all the tamashah (Anglice, tomfoolery) with which his Lieutenant celebrated the investiture in India. The veriest accident seems now sufficient to keep Her Majesty out of her title. The wife of the late Emperor of Germany and King of Prussia bearing the same name with our gracious sovereign, the latter must practically fall back upon her old distinction. On the Continent, they are respectively termed Empress and Queen. Even in England, to avoid the confusion of identity, the royal press designates the English sovereign as the Queen Victoria, and the Consort of the late German Kaiser as the Empress Victoria.

THE office of Librarian to Her Majesty at Windsor Castle is expected to be vacant, in the event of the present incumbent Mr. Holmes getting a post in the British Museum. Mr. Sidney Colvin, the eminent critic of art and letters, is expected to succeed him. The place will suit him exactly. The Castle is famous for its Raphael cartoons. It has probably the richest collection of prints and miniatures.—Mr. Colvin is of the Colvins of India.

MR. HOOKHAM FRERE'S splendid collection of manuscripts has been advertised. Besides other rare and unique treasures, there are 311 of the Paston Letters. Much as the authenticity of the correspondence of the Paston family has been questioned by eminent critics like the late Mr. Herman Merivale, its substantial vraisemblance strikes every body, and its value as a picture of contemporary manners is recognised by the best historians. The late Mr. Green places it among his authorities, in his brilliant and masterly Short History. We expect a scramble for the possession of these treasures.

Mr. Frere, though now forgotten, was once a literary and political character. He was associated with Canning, Ellis and Gifford in the Anti-Jacobin, in which he was one of the writers of nearly all the quips and cranks, the parodies and squibs which made that brilliant periodical famous. His specimen of a poem on King Arthur was the precursor of Don Juan. In 1809, the same literary friends joined by Scott, a seceder from the Edinburgh Review, founded the Tory Quarterly Review. Frere was a fine scholar in English as well as the classics. He had a rich fancy, and his capacity for versification was wonderful. With more imagination, and a greater love of fame, he would have been a real poet of a superior kind. As it was, he was a smart satirist and an excellent translator. He was employed in the diplomatic service, and went on more than one confidential mission to the Peninsula at an important period, and was made a Privy Councillor.

The Right Honourable Hookham Frere has a sort of connection with India, through his kinsman the late Sir Bartle Frere, who has collected his writings in two volumes, to which he has contributed a pretty long memoir.

UNDER the head of "Death from Hydrophobia," we read in all the papers:—

"There is a saying, says a native Chinese paper, that if a man who has been bitten by a mad dog hears the sound of a gong within 100 days after he has been bitten he will die. In June last, at Yangchow, in Kiangsu Province, a certain man from the country met a mad dog in the city, and before he could jump out of the way the dog had caught hold of his bamboo-cloth jacket. The dog was driven away; and the man, not having been bitten, felt no anxiety about the rencontre. A few days after, however, there was a religious feast in the village and gongs, beating loudly, passed by his door. As soon as he heard the noise he suddenly went mad, and began jumping and rushing about, biting everybody whom he met. His people sent in haste for a doctor, but he died before the potion which the doctor at once set about boiling for him was ready to drink."

That need not be dismissed with the flippant scepticism of cheap philosophy. We can believe the story; there is no inherent improbability in it. There are well-authenticated accounts of the kind in every country, showing the deep influence of mental illusions. Many of the miracles in the East and the West are doubtless explicable on this principle. There are such things as overpowering beliefs. The Chinese story recalls one current in our society. It is said that, in making a thatch, a workman happened unconsciously to fasten a knot with a snake for a string. Somehow, the reptile had no opportunity for a poke of his fangs in the flesh of the thatcher, and, as he did not suspect anything, he had no cause for anxiety. Next year, the same man was called for the annual repairs. In removing the straw or grass covering, he discovered to his horror a dried-up serpent doing duty for fastening the covering grass on to the bamboo framework. He at once fell down dead. He had no opportunity of explaining how he came about by his death, and there was no post mortem held, nor a coroner called in to make the plain unintelligible. Doubtless, the sudden sense of the danger he had incurred by thus handling the deadly reptile the previous year, overpowered him. He collapsed and died under his sudden and extreme fear.

STR SYAD AHMED KHAN is staying at Naini Tal, where Raja Ameer Hossein Khan of Oudh has gone on a visit to the Lieutenant-Governor. The Congressists are naturally exercised on the subject. The Raja has not yet declared himself. If he too goes the way of him of Bhingra, then farewell all hope of the Talookdars joining the Congress.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment are particularly recommended to persons who have to pass their lives in confined and crowded places; hundreds of thousands of our fellow creatures toil from morning until evening in factories and workshops to the detriment of their health, and the deterioration of the race. They suffer in consequence from indigestion, flatulence and want of appetite, and these complaints, if neglected, bring about nervousness and failure of the vital powers. Holloway's remedies can be used by such sufferers to their very great advantage, as they are mild in action, and certain in their effects. No one need therefore lose a day's work when using them, a matter of consequence to those whose daily bread depends on daily toil.

THE Calcutta Police Court house has been condemned. It is past repairs. It will be taken down and rebuilt on a new plan similar to the Calcutta Small Cause Court—one of the best buildings erected by the P. W. D.

THE High Court has been applied to, to declare whether the Agra Bank or Messrs. Lalchand Kanhya Ram are to bear the loss of Rs. 15,000, the amount of the cheque presented for encashment at the Bank and paid by the Bank to other than the presenter. It is well that the matter has gone to Court. Whoever be declared the victim, the Banks will be more careful in future.

MR. JUSTICE TREVELYAN is of opinion that the Burdwan case cannot terminate within the next twenty years, and had therefore no hesitation in granting extension of time to the 15th December to file the written statement on behalf of the minor Maharaja. Are Her Majesty's Courts too prepared to play into the hands of the irresistible Lala, like Collectors and Boards of Revenue?

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1888.

THE APPEAL OF THE STATUTORY CIVIL SERVICE.

WE have a tenderness for the Statutory Service. We think that Lord Lytton showed both statesmanship and liberality in what was a tolerable practical solution of a difficult and vexed problem. That, however, is not the opinion of the class from which our professional politicians and publicists are drawn. Unable to distinguish between the necessary and the accidental, our patriots easily played themselves into the hands of those who are interested in keeping the natives out as long as they can. Before the late Commission the native witnesses were the loudest in condemnation of the Statutory Service. The Press rang—the Platform thundered—to that tune. The Commission ratified the general condemnation. Ignoring repeated pledges, the ink of which was not yet dry, setting its face against promises embodied in Act of Parliament and in regulation thereunder, it sent forth the fiat for not only the annihilation of the Statutory Service, but also the degradation of the present members thereof. Such an injustice was unheard of in the annals of British legislation or administration. But then the Service was weakness itself. A new creation without prestige as yet, and for the benefit of natives only, it was just the dog to give a bad name and hang.

But the very worm turns upon its treacher, how much more will the dog bark when injured! In this case it barks from the scaffold in appeal to the justice of Government and the sympathy of the world. The Statutory Service has been avenged. The Public Service Commission's recommendation to absorb it into the Provincial Service, has elicited a remarkable defence of the doomed Service, in the lately published May number of the National Magazine, from "A Statutory Civilian." Written with real power and downright sincerity, not to say red hot anger, it constitutes by itself a strong plea for the maintenance of the body to which the writer belongs. Surely, there is hope for a Service containing such superior men. The article is a vigorous argument which must give the Government pause in deciding upon the question. It is a well-delivered onslaught on the Service Commission, which cannot fail to tell on the public mind. At any rate, whatever fate may be in store for the Statutory body itself, there cannot be much doubt as to the brilliant future which the writer of such an article is destined to carve for himself; no State will neglect to utilise such ability. We have risen from its perusal with the keenest patriotic pleasure. Penned in evident haste, and bearing necessarily some few marks of a prentice hand, it is nevertheless an article of which almost any man may be proud, and the Statutory Service must congratulate itself upon possessing a penman of such consummate talent and tact in its own ranks. The consciousness of such a possession almost makes up for that want of active public sympathy for the Service which the writer has so feelingly deplored.

The Statutory Civil Service is a part and parcel of the Covenanted Civil Service, and if any change is to be made in its status, it should be merged in the proposed Imperial rather than the Provincial Service. This is the writer's contention, and he has established the justice of his contention with the fullest success. This position of the Statutory Service cannot now be repudiated without a gross breach of faith. "In the hope," says the writer, "not only of an equality of prospects, but of an equality of status with the Covenanted Service, and of a clearly defined distinction from the Subordinate Judicial and Executive Services, have many men who would not otherwise have thought of entering any service at all, aspired to an appointment in the Statutory Civil Service, and secured it after passing the severest test possible,—a test beside which that for the Subordinate Judicial, not to speak of the Subordinate Executive Service, sinks into utter insignificance." The Service was expressly created for "young men of good family and social position,....to whom the offices open to them in the inferior ranks, or the Uncovenanted Service have not proved a sufficient inducement to come forward for employment." Here is a clear distinction made, in a formal Resolution of the Government of India, between the Statutory and the Uncovenanted Services. To relegate it now to a subordinate position would be as clear a breach of plighted faith as any can be.

The Public Service Commission bases its recommendation upon the alleged ground that the Statutory system has failed to secure properly qualified men. This expression of opinion on the Commission's part has called forth a burst of indignation from the writer and a noble rejoinder. He says:—

"Not only has the Public Service Commission done grave wrong to the Statutory Service by a deliberate ignoring of its past, but it has aggravated the offence by adding insult to injury. After shattering the status of that Service by its unreasonable merger in the Provincial, it has thrown out a pretty broad hint that this wholesale degradation was deserved by its inefficiency. Reputation is as dear to many in these degenerate days, as it was in Cassio's, and there may be found persons who inwardly shudder at the thought of belonging to a branded Service. The admitted existence of 'honorable exception' does not at all improve matters when the entire Service is insulted and degraded. A landed fraternity sheds upon an indifferent member a reflected lustre under which brass passes for gold; while the finger of scorn is lifted at real worth for the misfortune of its being linked with what a sweeping censure has pronounced to be buncombe. It is hardly fair to include good and bad in one all-involving remark of general condemnation. It is far worse to include them in one all-involving ruinous punishment. In olden days ten virtuous men might have saved a sinful city. Have things changed so far that the presence of a few black sheep dooms the whole flock to ruthless slaughter? It reminds us of the Emperor in the Arabi Nights whose anger roused by an unguarded word from the grand vizier could not be appeased except by a massacre of his whole family. The procedure which the Public Service Commission has adopted in dealing out punishment to incompetency in the Statutory Service is unique in the annals of penal history. It has recommended that the whole body is to be degraded first, and then individual cases may be considered on their own merits, when settling the position of each. So far as these individuals are concerned, therefore, they are to be presumed guilty until they can prove themselves otherwise. Why, the lowest criminal is presumed innocent until he is proved to be guilty. Not only that. The punishment is to come first and the defence afterwards. Truly, this is Jedwood justice, not British. This perversity appears all the more wonderful when it is considered that apart from any general principle of presumption about which the Commission might wrangle, there was a compulsory statutory presumption to which the Commission was bound to bow. Here is the rule. 'Any person admitted under these rules may, with the previous sanction of the Governor-General in 'Council, be declared by the Local Government to be disqualified for further employment in the said (Statutory) Service.' We believe, that so long as any person is not so declared, he is to be considered qualified, assuming, of course, that the Local Government does its duty properly. We reserve the point whether a person who is finally admitted into the Service after his fitness has been tested by actual work during the period of probation, can be dealt with after the summary fashion of the rule. But the rule, at all events, furnishes a direct, simple and natural solution of the difficulty which the Commission might have pleaded as an excuse for its inability to recommend the absorption of the Statutory into the Imperial Service, and which it has solved in a round-about, unjust and unnatural way. The Government could, under the statutory powers reserved to it, weed the Service of its inefficiency, and then give it its proper and legitimate place. This would secure the required ability, save the Government from the reproach of trifling with vested rights, and other people from the pang of unmerited abuse, from the brand of vicarious punishment. But the Commission chose to put it the other way. Of course, it is the privilege of great men to be eccentric at convenient intervals; it is irrelevant to laugh if they sometimes put the cart before the horse."

Admitting, however, the justness of the Commission's conclusion as to the general inefficiency of the Statutory men, it must not be forgotten that this Service has been more sinned against than sinning, being made the victim of the injudicious selections made by the Government itself. The public, disgusted with the incompetency of these scions of aristocracy, did not remember that there were a different set of officers in the same body. A few wire-pullers passed the word, and the Surrender Nots and No Renders agitated on the platform and in the press, and soon there was but one opinion for the abolition of the Statutory Service. Under the circumstances, the Commission is hardly to be blamed. But, surely, it ought to have hit upon some device for carrying out the objects contemplated by Lord Lytton. The thing is the members themselves imbibed the popular prejudice against the Statutory men. It was bad enough for men like our essayist to be huddled into the same body with uneducated Rajalings. But it was something to feel that you were of the great Civil Service, and entitled to the advantages of that position. What a keen disappointment and humiliation for them now to be sent back to the same Uncovenanted from which they had escaped only yesterday, and after passing the severest tests imaginable. The injustice of the proposal admits of no question. The writer concludes his paper with an earnest appeal:—

"The members of the Statutory Civil Service appeal from the verdict of the Public Service Commission to a higher and, they doubt not, a juster tribunal. They smart under wrongs which, perhaps are not irrevocable, and they fervently believe that the Government will do them justice. They complain that the Commission has most unjustly attacked vested rights; that it has ignored their past, and the actually recognized character and status of their service; that contrary to all principles of justice and equity, it has proposed to give retrospective effect to a newly created disability. The Statutory Service is, in many respects, a most unfortunate body. Begotten in jealousy, and bred in error, it has lived a hard life, indeed, through envy and apathy. The people and the press have looked upon it with suspicion. It has evoked no interest and no sympathy in its struggle for existence. And now that it is about to die an inglorious death, the spectacle has not roused the feeblest sympathy. A handful of men must fight their own battle, without help, without encouragement, without the cheering consciousness of any silently-felt sympathy with their cause, without the inspiration of anticipated success. The Covenanted Service and the Uncovenanted have no occasion to be sorry at its fall; and the nation looks on with a perfectly stoic unconcern. Why, it has not the extent and the attitude to attract popular attention. Even the Public Service Commission, a truly great body which, on the whole, has done its arduous task with earnestness and zeal, has not scrupled to wrong it because it is small and weak. But can injustice plead a set-off? It is justice, and not favor, which the Statutory Service wants. It demands the redemption of promises, express and implied,—the fulfilment of expectations created by acts whose import is clear as the light of day. It resents the stigma and ignominy of insulting degradation. It shrinks from the thought of dishonored death. It has suffered much already. Is that a reason for its suffering more? Does one small transgression sanctify another great one? Is it not right, rather, to retrace the one small transgression, and restore the Service to its proper and intended place? If there have been mistakes in the application of the Statute, are they not capable of a more equitable rectification by the passing of a validating Statute? The history of Legislatures, both English and Indian, teem with instances of such validation of graver and more wide-reaching errors. Is that process of saving actual deeds, the repudiation of which leads not only to self-stultification but to positive injury to others, to be abandoned on this one occasion because the occasion is not 'angust and proud?' Is justice to be measured by the magnitude of its receiver,—by extrinsic pomp and circumstance?

'The poor beetle you tread upon,
In corporal sufferance feels a pang
As great as when a giant dies.'

And this feeble cry, too weak to reach the ear of the authorities, too uninteresting to be effective if it does reach, rises out of a depth of wounded feelings, of crushed young ambition, of stunned and staggered hope, such as would have expressed itself in a truly magnificent howl if the Covenanted Service were thus throttled out of existence, or, what is far worse, reduced to the level of the much-abused Deputy."

Surely, we repeat, there is hope for a body possessing such superior men. What is the glory of the khās Civil Service, but the ability and achievements of a handful of its members! The majority were drones and nincompoops. Even under the competition since 1853, how many fools and madcaps, and rogues and budmashes have not drawn the fair name of the Service through the mire. The Public Service Commission has here an opponent by no means unworthy of its steel. May he live to make his mark! He is of the stuff which ought to redeem the Statutory in the same way that a few great names redeemed the Covenanted Service from the disgrace of its Beamases, Metcalfes, Smiths, the D'Oyleys, Beadons, Moseleys, the Buckles, Levinges, Kirkwoods, indeed, the bulk of this close organized aristocratic Service.

INDORE AFFAIRS.

Aug. 21.—The new minister at Indore has proved a great failure. He is very lazy, and most of the important work that demands his attention is lying undone. The Maharaja himself repents the selection; but he does not shove him out of office, for fear lest the public should again criticize the step unfavourably. Consequently, the lucky minister draws his fat pay and does literally nothing. Since Raghonath Rao's departure, the Council has not been holding its sittings regularly. With one breath the minister fixes dates for the sittings, and with another, cancels them. No proper hearing is given to appeals preferred to the Council against the decisions of the Lower Courts, with the result that the latter receive no check in the mal-administration of justice. The minister's present policy seems to be this: to please the Maharaja and his surroundings at the sacrifice of public interest. All the activity and promptitude in the discharge of State business in several departments perceptible in the late regime, appear to have been dead and gone. Even letters addressed to him by the Politicals remain unanswered until more than one reminder is sent.

His Highness has reduced the Chief Justice's pay to Rs. 700, presumably with a view to make the present incumbent resign the office he holds. The way in which it is done is rather queer. One day the minister calls the Chief Justice (Lala Baijnath) up to inform him that the Maharaja values his services so much that he is pleased to extend his term to a further period of six months from October next. Puffed up with this valuation, the Chief Justice goes straight to Court, where a letter from the Private Secretary awaits him. Thinking the letter conveys news of his promotion, he opens it and, to his great mortification, finds that his salary has been reduced. Mind you he gets this letter in August and the Maharaja's order of reduction is dated sometime in June. Poor Chief Justice! He was dumb-founded. He wrote a long letter to the minister stating his own terms to remain in office, some of which were that the period of extension must be two years; that he be paid his present salary; that more powers be given him to exercise over the subordinate Courts; that he must be consulted in making appointments in the Judicial Department, &c. And he asked the minister to let him know the Maharaja's wishes in the matter within a certain time. The certain time came, but he was not favored with any reply. He then referred the matter to the Agent, Governor-General, who advised him to consider himself free from service if His Highness did not definitely settle as to whether the Chief Justice would be kept in service on his own terms. Another letter was written to the minister who did not condescend to reply to it at all. At last he wrote direct to the Maharaja, who directed him to see him personally. The Chief Justice did so, but the interview did not decide the question. This is one of the many instances which show how things are managed here.

The Chief Justice is, I am afraid, not the soul of honour, or he is exhibiting a curious dunderheadedness. It is no secret that His Highness does not like him since his return from England, and the reduction in his pay appears to be meant to induce him to resign. But he has not the sense to understand this, or will not take the hint.

Aug. 28.—From my telegram you may have seen that Maharaja Holkar extends the tenure of Lala Baijnath's office to a further period of one year, on his present pay, i. e., Rs. 933 per mensem, on condition that he should present Nazars to His Highness twice a year, and that appeals against his decisions will in future be heard by the Maharaja himself. My information is that Lal Baijnath will accept the terms and remain here watching for better opportunities. There is a clique of Brahmaus opposed to the Lala's retention in office. They have directed their energies to see him out. For the present, they have succeeded in alienating His Highness from him; but His Highness is afraid to take the last step suggested to him by the clique. The other day His Highness sent for Lala Baijnath and informed him that he had sanctioned the extension only because he (Lala) had not brought his influence with the Politicals to bear upon the Maharaja for the extension.

Raja Ram and Damodar (State servants) are now on their trial, on a charge of having tortured the witnesses in Khema Naique's case and forced them to withdraw their statements made before the committing Magistrate. Resaldar Major Isri Prasad, of the Central India Horse, is in charge of the prosecution. You know Isri Prasad. He was sent by Sir Lepel Griffin in search of Tantia Bheel about two years ago, with arms, men and magisterial powers. But Sir Lepel is not the man to stand any sort of humbug; so Isri Prasad was recalled after a time, as being too old to catch Tantia. Smarting under the humiliation of a recall, he is said to have hit upon a novel idea of making up a case, against Khema Naique, of harbouring Tantia in his village, with the object of showing to the authorities and notably Sir Lepel, that his failure to apprehend Tantia was mainly due to the State officials giving their support to the dacoit. In Khema's case, the witnesses for the prosecution were his discharged servants and others of no character at all. It appears some of the discharged servants are in the service of Isri Prasad to give evidence against Raja Ram too. In the opinion of lawyers, who watched the progress of Khema's case, if he had been tried by British officials with the same materials, he would have been legally acquitted. But matters are managed very mysteriously in Indore. An impression has taken a strong hold of the public mind that the Judges at Indore give little fair-play to the prisoners before them in these cases, but that with a view to please the Politicals they sit in judgment with a biased mind. Now in the present case of Raja Ram, it appears that Khema Naique, who is undergoing his term of imprisonment in the city Jail and who has appealed against the Saddar Court's judgment, is taken one day before Isri Prasad from the Jail, with the result that his chains are removed and that he comes before the Court holding inquiry in Raja Ram's case, as a witness for the prosecution and gives evidence against Raja Ram, confessing his own guilt himself. Strange world this! But here the matter seems not to end. The prosecution are now trying to see Raja Ram locked up during his trial and not to let him off on bail. At first they moved the Durbar to place Raja Ram on his trial for torturing witnesses, &c. in Khema's case. The Durbar appoints a special Magistrate to hold the inquiry in that question alone. During the enquiry the prosecution move the Magistrate not to accept bail from Raja Ram; but the offence being bailable the motion was rejected. Immediately after they produced Khema Naique from jail as a witness to say that Raja Ram was also harbouring Tantia Bheel. Do you know why? The offence of harbouring a proclaimed dacoit is a non-bailable one. You are perhaps well aware that in backward countries like Central India, when a State official is once kept under arrest, nobody comes forward to say anything in his favour, but hundreds of people can be found to testify to something against him. This state of affairs the prosecution are going to avail themselves of. And the wonder is that they receive encouragement from the Court here. When a Magistrate is specially appointed to hold an inquiry on a certain charge specified and detailed in the appointment order, can he entertain other charges? Common sense dictates, he cannot, and yet here they are entertained.

Again, to give you an idea of the so-called fairplay given to the prisoner, I must not omit to mention that the learned Magistrate specially appointed to hold the inquiry against Raja Ram, starts it with an examination of the accused. Is not this extraordinary? A accuses B, instead of calling upon A to prove the accusation, B is called upon to explain it! There is no exaggeration in this.

AN INDOORMAN.

A MODEL OFFICIAL CHAIRMAN.

ANOTHER and yet another! Verily, our Heaven-born are of the earth earthy! Such is the impression irresistibly forced upon the disinterested public from the successive exposures of incompetent and unfaithful servants of the State taking place in different parts of the Empire. One would suppose that at such a time our officials would take care not to give unnecessary offence. But this is clearly beyond many of them. Impressed with inordinate notions of privilege, supported as they are by their fellows and spoiled as they have been by the favour of superiors, they seem unable to realize their position as mere servants of the public or their obligations to law and justice.

Mr. G. M. Currie, Magistrate-Chairman of Howrah, is not unknown to fame. Having achieved an unenviable notoriety at Cuttack, in connection with the estates of the Dowager Maharani of Burdwan, and having incurred the severest strictures of the High Court, Mr. Currie was transferred to Howrah, in the belief that there, under the very nose of the Government, his vagaries and lawlessness would receive some check. Any other man acting as Mr. Currie did at Cuttack, would never have been let off so easily, but then Mr. Currie is a nephew of Sir Rivers Thompson, and it was Sir Rivers Thompson who had the punishing of his nephew in his own hands.

Without referring to the numerous instances of Municipal and Magisterial vagaries of which Mr. Currie has been guilty since coming to Howrah, we will take up his conduct with reference to a civil suit pending against him as Municipal Chairman in the Munsiff's Court at Howrah. A medical practitioner of Howrah having erected a long brick wall by the side of a lane, he was served with a notice requiring him to remove the wall on the alleged ground of its having been an encroachment on the public lane. Baboo Pramathanath Dass, L.M.S., (for that is the name of the gentleman), addressed the Chairman, by way of answer to the notice, that the wall stood on his own land and was no encroachment on any public lane. Without enquiry of any kind, and without assigning a single reason, the Chairman's order on this objection was, "rejected." Mr. Currie is a staunch believer in the wisdom of Sir William Mansfield's advice to his friend on the eve of the latter's setting out for a Colonial Judgeship,—Give your judgments but not your reasons. Hundreds of petitions are daily disposed of at Howrah with the sapient and laconic order—"rejected," and Mr. Currie could not be expected to make an exception in favor of a mere son of Æsculapius. The next step adopted by Mr. Currie was to serve upon Baboo Dass a peremptory notice stating that if the wall were not pulled down within forty-eight hours, the Municipality would do it for him and at his cost. Baboo Dass, on receipt of this peremptory order, went to the Civil Court for a declaration that the wall was not an encroachment and for a temporary injunction restraining the Municipal Chairman from pulling it down before the decision of the case. The Court of first instance granted the injunction, notwithstanding the affidavit made by a Municipal Overseer and an answer filed by the Vice-Chairman disclaiming all intention of pulling down the wall. This disclaimer, in the face of the forty-eight hours' notice previously served on the Plaintiff, was rated by the Munsiff at its worth. Finding that the Munsiff granted a temporary injunction, the Chairman appealed to the District Judge of Hooghly. The case was argued before the latter ex parte. The forty-eight hours' notice, filed before the Munsiff by the Plaintiff and forming part of the record, had, when the District Judge tried the case, strangely disappeared from the Record. There was nobody to direct the Judge's attention to it. Believing in the protestations of the Chairman that the Municipality had no intention of pulling down the wall, protestations that were reiterated through the mouth of their pleader, the District Judge cancelled the injunction, adding that if at any time the Municipality would really contemplate the destruction of the wall, the Court of first instance could, on application by the Plaintiff, restrain it by a timely order. The victory elated Mr. Currie, and his hands being perfectly free, the very next day to that on which the Judge had, on these grounds, cancelled the injunction, Mr. Currie sent about a hundred people to the spot with instructions to pull down the wall. In five minutes' time the whole wall, measuring about 95 feet, was pulled down with lusty cheers, from the men employed in the work, to the greatness and glory of G. M. Currie, Esq., C. S., Magistrate of Howrah and Chairman of the Howrah Municipality.

It is impossible to speak of this transaction calmly. It makes one's blood boil to contemplate the example of lawlessness and meanness set to the population of a whole town by its executive head. Is the District Judge actually so powerless after having allowed himself to be effectually bamboozled by the false disclaimer of the Municipal authorities? Can no prosecution for perjury lie? Can no case for contempt of court be made out? Is it possible that Mr. Currie does not know how honest men would characterise the transaction, even if a prosecution for perjury or contempt of court fail on any technical plea? We say that the sense of security men like Mr. Currie are allowed to feel, in consequence of their covenanted dignities, is the bane of the British administration in India. A Civilian is above punishment. In vain is a Beames disgraced or a Kirkwood forced to retire, if acts like these are allowed to pass unnoticed. There is no Sir Rivers Thompson now to protect his sister's son. But is the relationship so strong that its influence will still be felt? Is it too much to expect that Sir Steuart Bayley will call for the papers of the case? Meanwhile, we advise Baboo Pramatha Nath to pursue every remedy that the case admits of.

THE LATE FRENCH OFFICIAL TOURS.

THE remark that they order the matter better in France, has passed into a proverb in England. Official Tours are so much the fashion in India, and now that even at height of the season of wet and dirt, the restless foot of the Anglo-Saxon is on the move, it may not be energy thrown away to dwell for a moment on the latest doings of the French in that line. Both the Presidents—of the Republic and of the Council—had been out. M. Carnot went to the South-East frontiers. His progress lay through places rich in historic associations, until he reached the end of his journey—that old Province acquired by Philip of Valois, which was the Wales of the French Crown as giving title to the Heir-apparent of the monarchy.

After his return to Paris from his triumphal tour in Dauphiné, M. Carnot, the President of the French Republic, again left the capital for Fontainebleau, where he intends to spend a few weeks.

Fontainebleau is a small snug town, 37 miles distant from Paris. It contains a palace which is one of the largest and most sumptuous royal residences of France. The palace of Fontainebleau, which was the favourite residence of Napoleon I, is replete with historic reminiscences. It was here that some of the French Kings first saw the light. Charles V of Germany was entertained here with becoming délat. Christina, the Swedish Queen, after abdicating her throne, passed several years in this palace before taking up her final residence in Rome. It was here that Peter the Great, the real founder of Russian greatness, was fêted by the French nation with a pomp and a magnificence befitting the greatness of the guest and the wealth of the host. This palace was twice the residence of a Pope. It was in this palace that the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes was signed, and the sentence of divorce was pronounced against Josephine. It was here that in 1848 the Prince President accommodated the ladies whom he had invited to witness his grand hunting. It was here that Mlle. de Montijo, who afterwards became Empress of the French, occupied with her mother a modest apartment.

The principal entrance to the palace is in the Court of White Horse (Court de Cheval Blanc), which is also called Court of Adeaux. It was in this court that in 1814 Napoleon I bade his last farewell to the soldiers of his Old Guard, who shed many a bitter tear on that sad occasion.

The Presidential family live on the first floor, the Chief of the State occupying the room where formerly slept M. Filon, the preceptor of the Prince Imperial. The personal staff of the President and the domestics are housed on the third and fourth flats. The only place reserved for the promenade of the President and family is the English Garden, the walls of which surround the basin of Carpes. The terrace and the forest remain as free as before to the public.

Here the President of the Republic has for his neighbour the conservator of the Town Library, M. T. T. Weiss, one of the most eminent of living French publicists. He was Under-Secretary of State at the end of the Empire, Councillor of State under President Thiers, Director of Foreign Affairs in the Gambetta ministry. After the strife and struggle of many long years, he has now come to seek at Fontainebleau a literary refuge in his decline.

Before going to enjoy repose in the woods of Fontainebleau, M. Carnot opened in the Palais de l'Industrie the Exhibition of Salvage and Hygiene, of which the director is M. Nirole, who is in France what M. Jules Joubert is in the East and Australia, having, within the last 20 years, organized more than 10 Exhibitions. The great attraction of the Exhibition of Salvage is a grand pool, in which the life-boats performed evolutions with the greatest facility. The attention of the visitors is also arrested by the ambulance of Dr. Nachtel and the very faithful reconstitution of an Apothecary's shop of the 17th century, together with the tools and instruments which M. Eiffel constructed for the sluices for the Panama Canal.

The so to speak Subordinate President proceeded not so far, yet he went to a famous national shrine and on a picturesque mission. He went to the doubly memorable site, where, eleven hundred years ago, Charles Martel saved Europe from being Mahomedan, by hurling back the towering advancing wave of Arab Conquest, and where only in 1870 the Government of the National Defence held its headquarters, when Paris was shut up by the German horde. Such is Tours, where Mr. Floquet presided at an interesting ceremony. It was that of consecrating the monument raised to the memory of the illustrious Meusnier, the academician and general of infantry, collaborateur and friend of Lavoisier, the rival of Monge (the great mathematician and assistant of M. Carnot, the "organiser of victory") and defender of the citadel of Cassel, where he met with his death in 1793, after a heroic defence. The authorities of Tours proceeded at the head of the whole garrison in arms to the monument, the pedestal of which contains the remains of the heroes of the Revolution, recently discovered by the Mayor of the town. General Villain, the commandant of the place, presented the officers of the 9th corps to the President of the Council, who presided over the ceremony, saying that they are prepared for all eventualities. The Archbishop of Tours spoke of the good intentions of the clergy towards the Republic. M. Floquet discoursed about the liberty of conscience, and fraternity. He paid graceful tributes to Meusnier, the Pandit of war.

HINDU MARRIAGE EXPENSES.

I propose to speak a few words on our marriage expenses—a question which presses itself more and more every day.

The expense to which the father of the bride is put, means simply ruination to him. Apart from the fact that if the bridegroom elect, is a Koolin, the bride's father has to pay dearly for the privilege and honor of having secured such an eligible husband for his daughter and the fact that he has to pay more dearly still, if the "elect" be a graduate of the University and a Koolin, the usual expenditure that has to be incurred by the bride's father at our marriages, is much too exorbitant and calls for reform. The classes most affected by this pernicious system are Brahmans (Raree class) Kaystos and Boyddos, but gradually all classes are beginning to follow the fashion and are being engulfed in the sea of ruin.

If the father of any of the above mentioned classes have a number of daughters and no sons, imagine his fate under our present marriage customs—my remarks are confined to the class of society which form the majority. This class has of course limited means, and it does not require very much to drain this class, and only one or two marriages of daughters of this class generally suffice to reduce the fond parent to absolute beggary. I have great respect for Koolins who are supposed to have nine virtues as prescribed by Bullal, but I would certainly inveigh against a system which is the cause of so much misery and distress among the community.

I would, an abler pen than mine, take up this case and advocate the bringing of the system within reasonable limits.

Marriage which is a blessed and a happy state, should be regarded with happy, joyous and kindly feelings, but under the existing state of things, it can only be looked at with fear and trembling.

The remedy of this social evil lies not in legislation by the rulers of the country, as is necessary in the case of other evils, troubles, and annoyances which are experienced by the public at large. I do not look for any special enactment of Government for the abolition of the objectionable practice. I appeal to my own countrymen to stamp out the evil. Let them frame certain social rules on the subject and let such rules be unflinchingly observed. Let it be laid down by our social rulers, that Koolin sons, or such as have taken University degrees &c., are not to look forward to small fortunes from their wives, in the shape of gold and silver and costly and precious apparel, but that they should think themselves sufficiently fortunate in having good, useful, modest, virtuous wives, who will make their homes happy and comfortable, which is the greatest fortune of all. Let the giving of marriage presents be made entirely optional, instead of, as at present, almost compulsory, and I would even go so far as to say let the present state of things be reversed if anything, and let it be required of bridegrooms (for they can earn and afford the expense,) to give presents, within their means, to their brides. This even need not be made compulsory but the present custom certainly needs very great alteration, if not doing away with altogether. And now that I have broached the subject, Mr. Editor, and spoken on it to the best of my poor abilities, I trust you will ventilate the matter thoroughly and be the means of bringing about a complete reformation.

NOTES & QUERIES.

BIDYAPATI.

With reference to the query regarding Bidyapati (R. & R. Aug. 18. p. 393.) I beg to say that there is very little agreement respecting the place of Bidyapati's birth. Four hamlets, if not seven cities, lay claim to the honor of being his birth place. Some persons are for identifying the place of his birth with Chhatna in Bancoora; others hold that he first saw the light at Bhursoot in Jessore in Sak 1355 and died at Navadwipa in 1403, and that his name was Basanta Roy, Bidyapati being only a title conferred by Raja Siv Sinha, in recognition of his merit; while a third party suppose him to have been a native of Birbhum. I have very carefully considered and compared the rival claims of the different places and am distinctly of opinion that the people of Mithila—the modern Tirhoot—have made out the strongest case. They have a very big book, nearly 560 years old, entitled the Punji, containing the pedigree of the Kings and Brahmans of Mithila, in which the following genealogical table is to be found :—

Dharmaditya

Debaditya

Bidyapati

For once the poet was wrong when he sang

It so falls out

That what we have we prize not to the worth,
Whiles we enjoy it,

it being an established fact that Bidyapati stood very high in the estimation of the people and rose to great power at the court of Raja Siva Sinha who—O strange return!—was made a cuckold of by him. We frequently come across the names of the Raja as well as of the false fair one—Rani Luchhmee (with whom our poet carried on an intrigue, probably with the connivance of the husband) in Bidyapati's songs. The descendants of the Raja still live at Sugaona, though poverty has marked them for her own. According to a tradition, which is not all a tradition, Siva Sinha was, on one occasion, thrown into prison by the Emperor of Delhi and was, through the intercession of the sweet Bard of Mithila, set at liberty. The Emperor, it is said, was so charmed by the poetical effusions of our poet that he made him a free gift of a village called Bispi. The descendants of Bidyapati still live there and have in their possession the Samad of the Padsa which they have carefully preserved as a valuable heirloom.

It is difficult to ascertain the exact dates of Bidyapati's birth and death. That he belonged to the preChaitanyite period is admitted on all hands, and is evident from the following couplet of the Chaitanya Charitāmrita :—

Chandi Dās, Vidyāpati, Rāyer Nātak, Gīti, karnāmrita Srf Gīt Govinda, Swarup, Rāmānanda sanc, Mahāprabhu rātri dinc, gāya shunc param ānanda.

Raja Siva Sinha confirmed the imperial gift to Bidyapati by a document dated Sak 1323. The bard must have made his mark at the time the royal favor was shewn to him, and one will be justified in presuming that he was between 20 and 25 years old at the time, that is, he was born between Sak 1298 and 1303. The descendants of Bidyapati have preserved a manuscript copy of S'riāmad Bhagabat written on palm leaves by him in Sak 1379. I further learn from Bidyapati's Durgā Bhakti Tarangini, that it was composed during the reign of Raja Nara Sinha Deb—which commenced in Sak 1395, Punji, of course, being my authority. From these facts, it follows our poet must have died a grand old man.

ECHO FROM THE HERMITAGE OF ADWYAITA ACHARYYA.

MAHOMET'S COFFIN.

"It is said that Mahomet's Coffin, in the Hadgira of Medina, is suspended in mid-air without any support. Many explanations have been given of this phenomenon, the one most generally received being that the coffin is of iron, placed midway between two magnets. Burckhardt visited the sacred enclosure, and found the ingenuity of science useless in this case, as the coffin is not suspended at all."—Brewer.

Will any of your numerous readers enlighten me as to how the impression regarding the suspension of Mahomet's coffin originated?

CURIOSITY.

MONGHYR.

Jamalpoore, Aug. 28.

We had cyclonish weather here for sixty hours right through, that is, from the evening of Friday the 24th, to the morning of Monday the 27th, with incessant rain accompanied by high wind, felling several mud walls and trees. Fortunately for the existing hills commonly known to be parts of the Vindian chain, which run from north to south serving as buffer for the town to the storm, it could not take a serious turn, as anticipated.

The river has risen unusually high this year, the water having approached the main road and the railway station compound, causing several trees &c., to be washed away. The rain and wind have materially affected the local crop "Bhutta."

Colonel Ramsay, District Superintendent of Police, Monghyr, having availed himself of his leave, Baboo Gopaul Hurry Mullick has taken over charge—the first instance of a native posted to the sudder district of Monghyr in executive charge.

The climate of the place has all of a sudden assumed an unfavorable aspect. The fell disease cholera has made its appearance both in European and native quarters of the town, about half a dozen cases proving fatal. What is the Municipality about? The Sanitary Commissioner had better keep a sharp look out, for the better sanitation of the town in the present crisis.

Important News for India,
WHERE FEVERS AND CHOLERA
REIGN SUPREME.

A RECENT TRAVELLER ON THE Chinese Coast found that District remarkably FREE FROM TYPHOID FEVER and CHOLERA. He soon discovered the cause. The people there do not drink cold water from tanks or wells, often extremely impure, but keep a pan of water constantly boiling, into which from time to time they drop a little Tea, and when thirsty THEY DRINK HOT TEA! If the weak and adulterated Teas of China can do this, what may not the pure and strong Teas of India be expected to effect?

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a represen-

ation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sabibs. Our author is compelled to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? No, the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINI DASSY (Author of Kabutarah, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohini's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE LARK AND THE ROOK—A FABLE.

"Lo! hear the gentle lark!"—SHAKSPEARE.

ONCE on a time—no matter where—
A lark took such a fancy to the air,
That though he often gaz'd beneath,
Watching the breezy down, or heath,
Yet very, very seldom he was found
To perch upon the ground.

Hour after hour,
Through ev'ry change of weather hard or soft,
Through sun and shade, and wind and show'r,
Still fluttering aloft;
In silence now, and now in song,
Up, up in cloudland all day long,
On weary wing, yet with unceasing flight,
Like to those Birds of Paradise, so rare,
Fabled to live, and love, and feed in air,
But never to alight.

It caus'd of course, much speculation
Among the feather'd generation;
Who tried to guess the riddle that was in it—
The robin puzzled at it, and the wren,
The swallows, cock and hen,
The wagtail, and the linnet,
The yellowhammer, and the finch as well—
The sparrow ask'd the tit, who could n't tell,
The jay, the pie—but all were in the dark,
Till out of patience with the common doubt,
The rook at last resolv'd to worm it out,
And thus accosted the mysterious lark:—

"Friend, prithee, tell me why
You keep this constant hovering so high,
As if you had some castle in the air,
That you are always poisoning there,
A speck against the sky—
Neglectful of each old familiar feature
Of earth that nurs'd you in your callow state—
You think you're only soaring at heaven's gate,
Whereas you're flying in the face of Nature!"

"Friend," said the lark, with melancholy tone,
And in each little eye a dewdrop shone,
"No creature of my kind was ever fonder
Of that dear spot of earth
Which gave it birth—
And I was nestled in the furrow yonder!
Sweet is the twinkle of the dewy heath,
And sweet that thymy down I watch beneath,

Saluted often with a loving sonnet;
But men, vile men have spread so thick a scurf
Of dirt and infamy about the turf,
I do not like to settle on it!"

MORAL.

Alas! how nobles of another race
Appointed to the bright and lofty way,
Too willingly descend to haunt a place
Polluted by the deeds of Birds of Prey!

FRIENDS.

"Friend after friend departs,
Who has not lost a friend?
There is no union here of hearts,
That knows not here an end."

"FRIEND after friend departs,"—
And oft to those, whom most we cherish here,
Death sends his swiftest darts,
And calls them soonest to a brighter sphere,

Where all are friends—true friends,
Not like to those we often meet with here,
Whose mis-named friendship ends
When poverty and sorrow first appear.

Mourn not to lose such friends!
For still remain those who are friends indeed,
Whom God in mercy sends,
To be the dearest in our hour of need.

"Who has not lost a friend?"
If any such there be, most happy they,
On whom such joys descend
As friendships, unimpaired by time's decay.

But one day soon will prove
All earthly friendships but a broken reed:
When we must seek above
A friend to help in our last time of need.

Then trust His mighty arm,
And humbly at His gracious footstool bend;
For nought thy soul can harm,
While thou canst call the King of kings thy friend.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Self Help.—Prior to the discovery of these remedies an easy, ready, and reliable remedy for outward disfigurements and inward complications was, practically speaking, unknown. No one need now be at a loss if they should unfortunately suffer from piles, ulcers, sores, tumours, boils, bruises, sprains, &c. Enveloping Holloway's medicines are very intelligible printed directions for using them, which should be attentively studied and immediately followed by all who resort to his treatment. Sooner or later the sufferer will assuredly triumph over the worst diseases. This searching Ointment disperses all those malignant humours which aggravate diseases of the skin, prevent the cicatrization of ulcers, and excite inflammatory tendencies in the system.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

THE mail day changes from week after next at Bombay from Tuesday to Friday and at Calcutta from Saturday to Tuesday. Here, to-day is the last Saturday mail day, the next mail being on Tuesday the 18th, that is, there will be no out-going mail next week.

THE High Court, Original Side, will be closed for the annual vacation (including the Mohorum festival, the Mahalaya, Durga, Luckhmi and Kali Pujahs, and the Bhratriditia, Juggudhatri, and Kartic Pujahs) on and from Monday, the 10th September to Thursday, the 15th November, 1888, both days inclusive, and will resume its sittings on Friday, the 16th November, 1888. The Insolvent Court will sit on Monday, the 1st October, 1888. The Offices of the Court, Original Side, will be closed for general business from Monday, the 17th September to Wednesday, the 7th of November, both days inclusive, on account of the Mohorum festival and the Mahalaya, Durga, Luckhmi, Kali, and Bhratriditia Pujahs, and from Monday, the 12th November to Thursday, the 15th November, on account of the Juggudhatri and the Kartic Pujahs. The Hon'ble Mr. Justice Trevelyan will sit as Vacation Judge to take Chamber applications at 10-30 A. M., and Court applications at 11 A. M., on Tuesday, the 11th, and Thursday, the 13th September instant. His Lordship will preside as Commissioner for the relief of Insolvent Debtors on Monday, the 1st October, 1888. In case of special urgency, appointments can be made through the following officers:—Mr. W. R. Fink, 4, Strand Road, from 10th September to 2nd October, Babu Grish Chunder Bannerji, Bhowanipore, Chuckerbere Road, South, No. 31, from 3rd to 20th October, Mr. J. Heckle, High Court, from 21st October to 15th November.

THE heat during the late summer was excessive throughout the land generally. In the Punjab, which habitually suffers from severity of weather both in summer and winter, and oftentimes from alternations between heat and cold in the same season, and even within the twenty four hours, the weather was unusually sharp. At Patiala, the festivities on the occasion of the royal marriage had to be postponed in consequence. They have been fixed for the 17th November, in view of the signs of the heavenly powers and in deference to the convenience of the principal planet of the earth and attendant British stars of the first magnitude.

The Abbotta bad District was last week visited by severe shocks of earthquake, destroying many houses in the country around the chief town and burying to death several men and women and children.

CAWNPORE has suffered terribly from the recent rains. More than two hundred men have been killed by the falling of houses chiefly. Huts have been made a clean sweep of, over 6,000 being reported destroyed.

A DOZEN villages in the District of Nuddea are completely under water from the inundation of the Mathabhanga, viz., Hurodhan, Goneshpore, Rabunbudh, Gurpara, Sirkarpore, Bedyanundpore, Napara, Anundidham, Tarapore, Gazipore Musandura, Sundipore and Goswainpore.

THE Bombay Congressist Mahomedans, though weak in number, are strong in intelligence and energy. They have not let the grass grow under their feet after their late discomfiture. At a second meeting, presided over by Mr. Budrudeen Tyabji, they have got the Anjuman-i-Islam to resolve to lend the weight of their support to the National Congress to be held at Allahabad. It does not signify much. The Congress might always be sure of the attendance of Mr. Tyabji and his following of Anglicised Mahomedans, but this stealing a march over the community, is likely to bring on a crisis in the life of the Anjuman as a truly representative body.

THE Punjab discovers its usual spirit of intolerance. The local Anjuman-i-Islamia, presided over by Nawab Abdul Majid Khan, C.S.I., has recorded the following resolutions:—

“That the Anjuman-i-Islamia, as a united body, should become a member of the Indian Patriotic Association. (2.) That the aims of the National Congress being diametrically opposite to those of the Anjuman-i-Islamia, any one favouring the cause of the Congress will be considered no longer fit to continue as a member of the aforesaid Anjuman.”

FOLLOWING in the wake of the Pioneer and the Statesman, the Pall Mall Gazette has come down with a fierce attack on Sir John Gorst. The Under-Secretary is directly charged with being indirectly concerned with the Hyderabad Deccan Company, through the intervention of his friend, the notorious Mr. Tom Palmer, of Hyderabad.

IT is announced that the Hon'ble H. Hay, son of the Earl of Erroll, and formerly of the Scots Guards, has been appointed a Superintendent of Police in Burma.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE has given notice for calling the attention of the House of Commons, in November, to the report of Sir Henry James's Select Committee, on the affairs of the Deccan Mining Company.

FROM a Simla telegram to the Statesman, it would seem that the question of the Simla allowances, which has been before the Viceroy, has been decided, and that future incumbents shall draw only ordinary travelling and daily allowances, sanctioned by the Financial Codes.

THE Lieutenant-Governor of the N. W. Provinces will come down from his Hills, after the middle of next month. Leaving Nynsee Tal on the 18th October, he will reach Lucknow on the 1st November.

THE following, started by the Civil and Military Gazette, is going the round:—

“By gar! it's a boy—un garson, a boy!” exclaimed Dr. Caius; and so said one Gurmukh Singh, of Jhelum, some time ago, under the following circumstances:—Gurmukh Singh, who thought he should wed, went to Sundar Singh of Rawalpindi and said: ‘Give me your daughter in marriage, and I will pay you five hundred rupees for her.’ Now, Sundar Singh had no daughter at all, but he liked five hundred rupees; and so he smoked awhile in order to consider how he could get over the difficulty of obtaining the money and yet give no daughter. After a short time he replied to his friend who desired an alliance with his family: ‘Very good—I will give you my daughter for the money Gurmukh Singh.’ So the marriage day was fixed and great preparations were made, and the bridegroom arrived at the village, and there was much rejoicing. Blind with his desire for the five hundred, Sundar Singh called to him his son, aged ten, and dressed him up as a girl with the noserings and earrings and spangled skirt of womankind; and on the marriage ceremony being completed, delivered him over to Gurmukh Singh with his paternal blessings. The bride was then taken to the house of Gurmukh Singh and received into the family. But soon the fraud was discovered; and swift return was made to Rawalpindi in order to upbraid Sundar Singh, and demand return of the purchase-money. Sundar Singh, who had in the meantime stayed quietly at home and had not fled with the five hundred after selling all of his immoveable property as he should have done, allowed that there was ground for dissatisfaction, and he surrendered the money, gotten by fraud, and received back his son, aged ten. Satisfied with the return of the money Gurmukh Singh did nothing more, beyond abusing Sundar Singh to an extent equivalent to the shame to which he had been put. And so the matter ended.”

Sundar is Sundar and no mistake! He is an honest Oriental to the backbone in his capacity for taking things coolly, including the explosion of his own game of practical joking, for which he seems to have a decided and enormous penchant! In fact, we have a shrewd suspicion that our contemporary has been another Sundar victim of it, in being beguiled into swallowing the whole hog, from tusk to tail, as offered, without dressing.

MR. KUNJEN MENON'S appeal to the High Court comes off next Wednesday.

THE Byculla Club at Bombay entertains Lord Dufferin on the 16th December.

IT is whispered that richer gold mines than Californian have been discovered on the shores of Lake Superior.

THE Oxus has been bridged at Kerki—the Russian Southern post in the direction of Kham-i-ab.

PRINCESS SOPHIE, sister of the Emperor William, is betrothed to the Crown Prince of Germany.

IN his reply to the address of the Dacca Municipality, the Lieutenant-Governor thus spoke of the extended municipal franchise:—

"You allude with satisfaction to my proposal to give a larger scope to the elective element and to restrict the number of nominations—I wish to take this opportunity of letting you know how this experiment stands. It was first submitted to the public for criticism—some people considered that the appointment of two Government officials, a Magistrate and a Medical officer would swamp the independence of the committees, others (and among these were many experienced officials and native gentlemen) thought that by resuming the power of nomination we should exclude many gentlemen of wealth and position who would gladly give their services if nominated, but who would be unwilling for obvious reasons to seek election and that we could not afford to dispense with this class. In other towns important minorities, such as the Mahomedan community, thought that the withdrawal of nominations would leave them unrepresented. Well, as you know the project could not be carried out without legislation the consent of the Government of India has to be obtained. Looking to the strength and weight of the opinions given against the change, the Government of India have desired that, I should not for the present proceed any further with the legislation requisite to carry out my proposal; so for the present it will remain in abeyance. The other part of my plan, that of allowing the scheduled municipalities for the most part to elect their own Chairman, will however be given effect to."

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

GENERAL BOULANGER has mysteriously left France, it is surmised for Russia.

GENERAL Annenkoff, the constructor of the Trans-Caspian Railway, lately paid a visit to Paris. He was the guest of his brother-in-law Viscount Vogué, and the lion of the hour of the gay and excitable capital. He was entertained by M. de Lesseps, M. Eiffel, and M. Napoleon Ray, the companion of his travels, whom he first knew at St. Petersburg, at the time of the Embassy of General Chanzy.

The latest news is that General Annenkoff has been appointed Director of the Railway of his own making.

THE Railway Conference commenced on the 4th. It does not promise much. Its deliberations are to be private and not to be published till the English Boards of Directors have formed their own conclusions. The report has a good chance of a safe and undisturbed retreat on the upper shelves.

ON the first of the month, Sir Charles Elliott opened the Art Union of the Simla Admiration and Adulation Society, ycleped Fine Arts Exhibition. This is the 21st year of the Institution and marked by the absence of professional exhibitors. It has degenerated into a hole and corner dilettante business. Last year, the presence of Mr. Archer gave it an adventitious importance. This time, it is Scotch without Art.

HIS Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught opened on the 4th instant the Soldiers' Industrial Exhibition at Poona.

THE dismissed menial Nanhu who, for some real or fancied wrong, stabbed his old master Pleader Kanhya Lall, in open court at Lucknow, has been sentenced to death for murder. Lucky for justice, there was no Woodroffe to defend, nor Calcutta High Court to try him.

THE Hunmant Rao trial drags its slow length along.

MR. ARTHUR CRAWFORD is to be tried by a Commission of his own peers—the Hon. Justice Bayley, of the Bombay High Court, Mr. Quinton of the North-Western Provinces, and Mr. Robert Crosthwaite, Judicial Commissioner of the Central Provinces.

THE death of Major Battye and Captain Urniston in the Agrar Valley is to be avenged. The Black Mountaineers must be brought to their senses. A Force, to be called the Hazara Field Force, has been ordered, under command of the Brigadier-General J. McQueen.

SRIMAN SWAMI, a Madras Graduate, who has taken to asceticism, who, having organized a society for the protection and preservation of cows, is now in Calcutta on his mission, drew a large and mixed audience last Saturday at the Town Hall, to hear him on the question and cheer him up in his efforts. Raja Poorna Chunder Singh of Paikpara presided.

The Swami does not proceed on religious grounds. He only asks to spare the cow which is so useful. He contends that she is not slaughtered in any other part of the world, why then should she be made to furnish the dinner table in India, where a majority of the natives reverence her? The Swami has the good wishes of all Hindus and of every good Mussulman.

A NATIVE recruiter of emigrants went with a batch of labourers to Ceylon. He was accompanied by his daughter. His mission ended, he was back to the Continent, with an addition to his household. Not that he had married in Ceylon, or given in marriage, and was accompanied by wife or son-in-law. Nevertheless, they who had gone two returned three, himself, his daughter, and another eminent gentleman, though of unenviable notoriety. The numerical question, however, is an open one still. People in general admitted the return to the Madras country of two persons, but the father protested there was, besides his daughter, another, whom they saw not. But recruiters are not always precise in number, and the neighbours left the little family to enjoy the satisfaction of an imaginary addition. The prospect of a real, or, at least, visible addition was sought for when, shortly after, the girl was married. This hope was disappointed: there was no visible fruit of the union. And this was the work of the invisible presence. The Cingalese spirit which had crossed the sea on the back of the poor girl had caused the barrenness. Of this the father at any rate was certain, and the daughter possibly had gradually been brought round to the same view. So they set about in earnest to free the household of the undesirable presence. A famous diabolic doctor was brought in. He knew what was what. It was the devil and no mistake, and a very formidable one of that ilk. Probably it was the same ancient enemy of our race who had brought death into the world and all our woes, who tempted too womanly Eve, and who had been living retired in a cave of Adam's Peak, until he was, in his dotage, himself tempted in turn by the unadorned native charms of the Coolie Recruiting Sergeant's dark daughter. The doctor was equal to the occasion. He prescribed a drastic remedy and a heroic dose. There was only one way, in his opinion, of escape from the dilemma, and that was by humouring the devil out of his present stronghold with the offer of a human life. True to this diabolopathy, the father went out prowling about unfrequented paths for his prey. A crack recruiter could not be long in finding fit game. He met his man, wheedled him away to drink, and, when toddy had done for him enough, the poor fellow was done for outright. His throat was cut and the blood received into a vessel and mixed with rice into a ball which was thrown into the air for the feast of the invisible one. The body was further cut up and secreted in a tank. As usual, it was discovered, and the father arrested and tried, the daughter being the principal witness.

ACCORDING to Pundit Modhusudan Sitiratna, Professor of Smriti in the Calcutta Sanskrit College—On the 20th Kartic next, both the Swati Martunda Yoga and Kurukshetra Yoga take place. The former is predicative of too much rain or of a heavy cyclone, and forebodes destruction both of buds and men. He defines Swati Martunda Yoga thus:—If in the month of Kartic, a Sunday or a Saturday or a Tuesday coincides with Kuhu-Anabashya (new moon), that Yoga is called Swati Martunda Yoga, Kurukshetra Yoga is the union of Yithi, Nakshatra, and Yoga on the same day, and forebodes evil to Kings, loss of crops, rainless clouds, and loss of wealth by the people. And the Indian Mirror gravely publishes all this stuff, with evident reliance on the prophecy of pseudo-astronomy by a Professor of Hindu Theology, who never looked up the skies and knows not Jupiter from Mars and could not identify any of the Nakshatras of which he glibly talks!

THE Editor of the Hyderabad Record, Mr. Solomon, has petitioned the Resident for revision of the sentence of six months' simple imprisonment passed by Mr. Tucker, Superintendent and Magistrate of the Residency Bazaars, at the instance of the Pleader Mr. Leach. He urges really good reasons, which afford an instructive glimpse of Residency justice. Mr. Tucker framed two issues, namely, 1. Is the accused the editor or publisher of the Hyderabad Record and is this paper published in the Residency Bazaars? 2. Has the accused in the said article defamed the complainant? As regards the first, it seems one witness was examined who deposed that the accused was the editor. There was no proof of publication, and when, after the case for the prosecution, the defence claimed acquittal in the absence of the material evidence which would give the Magistrate jurisdiction, Mr. Tucker rectified the record by calling in his subordinate Lieutenant Tighe to prove a kind of publication. The Lieutenant, we are told, simply said, without producing it, that he saw and read a copy of the Record "which came to him" on his table. The magistrate was so much convinced of the guilt of the accused, that he would not wait for strict proof of a formality of the kind. The other issue was as easily disposed of. The imputations were divided into five, namely, three allegations of drunkenness, one of reckless slaughter of reputation of other men, and one of misconduct of complainant in a case in which he represented the Crown. The accused claimed the benefit of the first and ninth exceptions in sec. 499 I. P. C., inasmuch as the complainant was editor of a paper, a pleader and a Crown prosecutor and it was for the public good that his conduct was brought to light. At an early stage, Mr. Tucker overruled the plea and now disallowed all questions in cross-examination regarding Mr. Leach's private life bearing on the first three imputations. The Court would not accept any evidence of the complainant's acts or offences except their previous establishment in a Court of law. With reference to the fourth and fifth imputations, on formal denial of truth by the complainant, Mr. Tucker framed a charge under Sec. 500, to which the accused pleaded not guilty, and in absence of any other evidence, convicted Mr. Solomon and in the interest of the public, sentenced, to exemplary punishment for "a gross and unjustifiable outrage," a man who seemed to him "to be perfectly ignorant of what the responsibilities of the editor of the newspapers are."

In our issue of the 18th August, we inserted the representation of the Mahomedan Literary Society regarding discipline and moral training in public schools. We are sorry we had been unable before this to notice the same. The document, though addressed to Government from the orthodox Mahomedan point of view so far as the followers of Islam are concerned, does not betray any intolerance of other creeds. In terms it speaks of the wants of the Hindu community in a spirit far removed from antagonism, and is altogether pitched in a tone which is a happy compromise between respect for self and tolerance for others. In deploring the laxity of discipline and the want of reverence for authority in the rising generation, in protesting against any aid from public funds being given to avowedly proselytising educational institutions, in asking for facilities to the instruction of youth in their respective religions in all schools, public or aided, and in insisting that the officers of the educational department should possess proper moral qualifications, the Mahomedan Literary Society put forward demands which will be unhesitatingly endorsed by the Hindu community. It is therefore painful to see a journal bearing, above all, the name of the Hindoo Patriot carping at the Society, under what, in all charity we hope, is only a serious misapprehension. Says the H. P.— "Our friends of the Mahomedan Literary Society have singular ideas regarding discipline and moral training in our public schools. The rod and the Koran, according to them, will cure the evils we all deplore. Let our erring youths taste of the rod, and read a few pages of the Koran without understanding what is written in them and they cannot fail to be patterns of social virtues."

Now to give precedence to things holy, the Society nowhere recommends in terms the study of the Koran, by rote or otherwise. What they ask for is "the inculcation of students in the principles of their own religion with the desire and consent of their proper guardians," the prescribing of "books of religious tendency," and removing the deficiencies of the secular education of Government schools by adding thereto "a course of religious instruction." It is good for every Mahomedan to read the Koran, even by rote. Generally, the particular passages requisite for daily prayers are taught at home at a tender age, when the memory is strong and the tongue flexible. The Mahomedans do not want any instruction in schools for that purpose. Their grown up men often study their holy book, some in the original Arabic and many more with the help of translations. But even this is not what we understand the Society to desire to be introduced in schools. In the 5th para of their representation, they expressly request that in purely Mahomedan schools, elementary instruction in the vernacular languages be given through books of religious tendency; and obviously these books must be in the vernacular languages. Similarly, in the same paragraph, as read with that preceding it, they ask that in mixed schools the Mahomedans be allowed to supply properly qualified teachers to lecture separately to the Mahomedan students upon the principles of their own religion. So far as we can understand, the Society would be glad if the Hindus did likewise for their own students. Is it not unjust and unfair to represent all this as a prescription for the study of the Koran by rote and nothing more?

And then, in the name of all that is sacred in Hinduism and Patriotism, is it intended to suggest that the Society mean to compel a general study of the Koran by all the alumni of public schools? Is not the phrase "our erring youths" proceeding from patriotic Hindu lips suggestive of such a meaning? But not the most careless reader of the Society's letter can ascribe to it such an intention. Turning now to the rod, the critic entirely overlooks the circumstance that the Society do not at all recommend the infliction of the barbarous methods of punishment so common in the old class patshalas and maktabs in India. They are also averse to the use of the rod by way of whipping, and hold the opinion that "only the milder forms of corporal punishment can be resorted to in the case of native students." Do these views shew any ultra radical leaning?

The critic's last fling is at the refusal of the Society to encourage the production of "a moral text-book based on the fundamental principles of natural religion." If the writer in the Hindoo Patriot had but known how the term natural religion stinks in the nostrils of all orthodox Mussulmans in India, owing to the association of ideas created thereby with the heretic Naturists of the Allypore school, he would at once have understood the very strong antipathy and suspicion with which all the orthodox Faithful must regard such a proposal. Apart therefrom, we cannot find anything wrong in the believers of a particular religion insisting upon getting their morals at first hand from their own scriptures, and not in an emasculated and attenuated form, through, what to them must seem, an artificial and defective medium.

THE Tirhoot Courier is one of our best papers, and we are not surprised to read in its issue of the 29th August a sensible article on the National Congress. Starting with the interest created in the movement in England, so much so that Mr. Caine, the Unionist Member for Barrow, formerly Secretary to the Navy, and other political notabilities are expected to be present at the coming Congress at Allahabad, the writer notices the struggle going on in the principal cities of India, between the advocates and the detractors of the Congress. In his own District, however, he sees no signs of any interest in the matter. Tirhoot is too mercenary for political aspirations and withal too ignorant of external affairs. That may be true, only it is, unfortunately, true of the greater part of the Empire. But the Courier lays itself open to the charge of fouling its own nest when it goes on to tell a trumpery, at any rate, foolish, story of "a Mukhtiar here who believes that Lord Dufferin was a Joint Magistrate in Russia. As that country was going to invade India, Lord Dufferin was sent here as Viceroy in order to get Mohullul, (an adjournment) a word dear unto all Tirhutean minds. As he has not succeeded in getting the full time he asked for, he is abandoning the Viceroyalty, without serving his full time of service. Such is the average knowledge of politics in this part of the world."

That seems to us rather a gross exaggeration, and not much to the point. It is, however, a momentary fall into the temptation of smartness. In the main, the article is free from misrepresentation. Even the Mahomedans receive their due—rather a phenomenon in these days in Hindu journalism (we suppose we may take the Courier for a representative of the Hindu, if not the Bengali, Press.) The Courier does not seek to hide the fact that the great bulk of the Mahomedans are opposed to the Congress. It has even the fairness to acknowledge the force of the complaints of the Mahomedans. It not only does not fall foul of the opposition, but, unlike most of its brethren, it has the eye to discern where the shoe pinches the Mahomedans. We think it both wise and honest to recognise the legitimate apprehension of thoughtful Mahomedans that, by joining in the demand for representative institutions, they might be assisting in throwing power into the lap of the Hindus and Parsees, to the practical exclusion of the followers of Islam. It will never do to try to blind men to the obvious.

More wonderful still, our contemporary spares Raja Shivprasad himself, the oge of Indian patriotism of the day. That a Tirhoot journal will deal tenderly with the Raja and the great landowners, was but natural, but that was all the more reason for exhausting all the pent up

Congressist bile on the devoted head of that busybody, the parvenu outsider of Benares. But no—

“Strong supporters of the Congress as we are, we cannot see that we are helping it in any way by reviling our opponents or minimising the strength of their position. The Raja party is naturally opposed to representative institutions. Some Rajas may be representative of the people, as is the case of our chief Tirhoot nobleman, the Maharaja of Durbhangah. Some, however, grossly misrepresent them. And with a system of popular government there is but little doubt that it would not be the Rajas, but a new class of men, the graduates of the Universities, the lawyers, the Doctors and some of the chief merchants that would come to the front. As to the rage of the Raja party as shown in the proposal made at a meeting at Benares, to petition Government that all who attended the Congress should be denied a seat at Durbars, we may allow it to burn itself out.”

But what does our contemporary mean by saying—

“There is no doubt that the warlike races of Hindustan do not love the Bengalee. They do not object to be ruled by Englishmen, for they recognise in them a race stronger than they are. But they have the strongest objection to Bengalee domination.”

That is untenable in theory, and untrue in fact. We thought the Tirhoot Courier knew better than to be deceived by a passing phenomenon. It is true that Europeans, naturally in part jealous of the growing influence of the educated classes of Bengal, and still more irritated by the unmanly system of constant vilification towards them adopted by a set of native speakers and journalists who are far from representing the respectability and education of native society, have succeeded in causing a sort of estrangement between the Bengalees and the other peoples rather than races of the Bengal Presidency. But the feeling is abnormal and absurd and is by no means deep. A difference artificially created must be sooner or later determined. Meanwhile, the misrepresented people should be patient and forbear. It is a great pity that so able and respectable an organ of native opinion in the Bengal Provinces as the Tirhoot Courier, should heedlessly lend itself to the unworthy game of the enemies of both the Empire and the whole Indian people. For nothing that isolates the most intellectual community of all India from the rest or truly alienates it from the Government, can be good for either.

THE Tirhoot Courier writes :—

“Some would put the influence of Western education as the chief factor in making the India of to-day a different India from what existed fifty years ago. We, ourselves, are of opinion that its range is not so wide nor its influence so deep, as the results of science, we have mentioned above.”

Our contemporary is evidently under the spell of the day, or else so able a journal would discern the exaggerated importance it accords to science in changing the moral and social condition of man. Science is irresistible in the long run, but the run is often much too long. It is the moral arts (not to say, sciences) that directly and quickly appeal to the moral man. In India, the facts are distinctly opposed to the writer's view.

He almost admits as much in the following, and but for the “fad” would accept the truth without hesitation :—

“The greatest direct factor in the education of the people, has, we believe, been Western science. It has not indeed made them change many of their insanitary ways. But it has taught them that they are nearer akin to each other and to other races, than they ever thought possible.”

We are astonished to find such a sentence as the last coming from such a clever pen. Has Ethnology really gone down with our people in the way that it is here represented? And does it really teach that the races of India are akin to each other? Will the writer answer the obvious question, Which is which? We are afraid, his science is a sword that cuts both ways.

THE Anglo-Indians are great beyond question—in British India, at any rate. How much greater the khus British at Home! They have just given a singular proof of their superiority to the waifs and strays of insects from the great national Hive who sit on the noses of the Chiefs and princes of the East and bite the sleek persons of the Baboos. It will be remembered how the other day our superior British neighbours swallowed a poor Mahomedan hoax, and not only gave currency to, but some of them even gravely discussed, the announcement that Her Majesty had sent for a tutor of Hindustani for herself, and that a Lucknow Nawabing who, in spite of Mr. Secretary Peacock (his tenant), had repeatedly failed in the Registration Department, had been appointed to the office. Nothing, one would suppose, could be wilder than such an idea, or more absurd than the carrying out of it in the way alleged. But it appears that at Home they have gone beyond the Indian feat. We are told that it is widely reported in London that a Professor of Sanskrit has been appointed in connection with the Imperial Institute, with the view of assisting Sir John Somers Vine in his communications with the Princes, Chiefs, and subscribing people of India!

THE Rev. J. W. Horsley, formerly Chaplain at Clerkenwell Gaol, thus reports, in the Pall Mall Gazette, the progress of drunkenness in England :—

“The following table I have compiled from the Judicial Statistics for England and Wales for the last ten years. The first column gives the number of males, the second that of females, who in the year were found on reception into prison to have been convicted over ten times, and therefore to be not unfairly classed as incurable. The third column gives the proportion the men bear, and the fourth that of the women, to the total number of recommitted prisoners as distinct from mere first offenders.

	Males.	Females.	Males.	Females.
1878	—	—	8'3	22'1
1879	3,706	5,673	8'3	22'4
1880	3,691	5,800	8'3	23'6
1881	3,618	6,773	8'2	27'3
1882	4,148	7,496	8'8	27'4
1883	4,391	8,946	8'9	29'3
1884	4,734	9,319	9'4	30'2
1885	5,188	9,451	10'0	31'6
1886	5,074	8,981	10'1	33'2
1887	5,686	9,764	11'1	34'2

It will be remembered that crime generally has so largely and continuously decreased, and that absolutely and not relatively to the population merely, that there are now 6,000 fewer in our local prisons each day than was the case in 1876. Yet there is always a steady increase in the most noxious and burdensome incurable class. Men in this category are at their worst twice as good as the women at their best; women at their best are nearly thrice as bad as the men in the same year, and twice as bad as men at their worst. The men are only 3 per cent. worse than ten years ago; the women are 12 per cent. worse. These figures represent commitments and not individuals, many, but not all, being committed, and therefore counted, severally in the year. They are chiefly habitual drunkards.”

What a pitiable disclosure! It were ten times better that England should bear the reproach of being a nation of shopkeepers or of Philistines, than incur the odium of being the land of publicans and sinners!

NOR is that all. The vice seems spreading all round, and even penetrating into the educated classes.

HERE is as precious a clerical sot as could be found. At the Winchester Assizes, Mr. Baron Huddleston has sentenced the Rev. Edward Stormont Rounds, a clergyman of the Church of England, to twelve months' hard labor, for stealing a chest of drawers of which he was the bailee. In awarding the punishment, on conviction by the Jury, the Judge said that “from the information before him he found that the prisoner had neglected, if not abandoned, his wife; he had been from town to town obtaining furniture by fraudulent means, and reports to that effect had been sent from the neighbourhood of Sheffield, Derby, and Salisbury. He had also disgraced his sacred profession by continual acts of drunkenness.”

Clergymen are but men, and there will always be sinners among them, as there have been. Friar Tuck is no mere creation of genius, but a character founded on fact. The religious controversies, of rival sects, particularly since the attacks of Wickliff and Luther, have torn to tatters the pretensions to sanctity of ecclesiastics. In later times, a learned clergyman, moving in the highest society—a Doctor of Divinity into the bargain—was hanged for forgery. But though Dr. Dodd was a bolder, deeper offender, we are afraid, for all round depravity, the Rev. Mr. Rounds, true to his name, has scarcely a match in the annals of clerical shame. And yet, according to the doctrine, or rather fiction, of the Church, this man has had a call from Heaven to the cure of souls. No man ever more needed to be reminded of the saying, Physician, heal thyself!

THE Calcutta Municipality has awakened to the unwisdom of allowing structures over footpaths. Sir Stuart Hogg firmly discountenanced all such applications. But Sir Henry Harrison commenced with a different view. He would freely allow these structural improvements of the town, and even exceeded the law in closing a bargain with the Great Eastern Hotel Company. The Company no doubt has added to the beauty of that portion of the town though at a sacrifice of the light, air, and dryness of their own ground-floor. The structure exists but the municipality had to give up the annual income they expected to derive from it. In the native town, the permission has been simply abused. The so called structural improvements only set off the nakedness of the original buildings and have been converted into additional accommodation for residence, the best in the house, over the heads of people, making the main structure more ugly and less wholesome. We are glad therefore that the Municipal Commissioners at their meeting of Thursday the 6th September passed a resolution prohibiting a roof or covering of any kind over a sanctioned verandah over a footpath. We hope they will grow wiser yet, and not sanction an addition where it is not a distinct improvement, esthetically and otherwise. A dear solicitor!

THE Commissioners have commenced to be liberal to their new Secretary. They have sanctioned for him a bonus of Rs. 500 for acting the Vice-Chairman in addition to his own duties for three months, which he agreed to do without additional remuneration—in the face of a resolution that no additional expense was to be incurred while Baboo Gopal Lall Mitter was away on leave. The Hon'ble Commissioner who moved the resolution is fond of bonuses. He allows it to his own office men—as he informed his brethren of the Board.

IN our issues of the 28th July and 4th August, we published, to the vexation of many unprincipled men, a complete list of the pensions sanctioned by Government for the female members of the late King of Oudh's Household. They who knew the anxiety which the royal and noble ladies laboured under, from the representations of designing men and the bleeding to which they were subjected, by the pettifogging amlah, lawyers and law agents or other nondescript varlets who found access to them, will realise the service we did, both to the unfortunate ladies and to the Government, (assuming that justice and reputation are any concern to it) by our prompt publication. We at once knocked on the head all the intrigues and fleecing going on. The chances of making money by false pretences, by offering to procure pensions for the ignorant and cowed down women, were certainly minimised when the Government provision for the late King's Seraglio was out and might be learnt in all detail from Reis and Rayyet.

To-day, we are enabled to do a similar piece of service, by laying before the public the provision made by the Government of India for the more lucky servants of the late King. A few of them are to be dismissed with gratuities, but the rest are to receive monthly stipends. In another column, or rather other columns, for it is a voluminous affair, we publish complete Lists of the Pensions and the Gratuities sanctioned. We have procured the Lists for some time, but the names were a stumbling block to the printer and their "reading" took some time. And then, we were anxious to issue the Lists in one week. Now we have found space for them, comments may well stand over for a future opportunity.

THERE is a fatality about the affairs of the Oudh Royal Family. We hear of the intrigues at Native Courts, and that of the late King Wajid Ali Shah was popularly considered most open to reproach on that behalf. One might suppose, therefore, that Intrigue was interred with the majesty of buried Oudh. Not a bit of it. Intrigue flourishes today as ever; the venue only is changed. The Court of Garden Reach having been dispersed, Intrigue has now taken up its Head Quarters at Alipore, in the heart of the British Collectorate, where it is breeding and "enlarging," and whence it sends its promising progeny out to colonise new and tempting lands and extend its sway to other shores. It is the same at the Presidency as in Moorshedabad. Intrigue has a feline tenacity of life. The things that are done in British Durbars, great and small, fill one with astonishment.

It is three months since we announced that the Honourable Moulvi Abdool Jubbar, Deputy Magistrate, 24-Pergunnas, had been appointed to the charge of the disbursement, under the Collector, of the pensions &c. to the family and retainers of the late King of Oudh. Will it be believed that the Moulvi has not yet got the charge? Under successive Collectors, the orders of Government have remained a dead letter. It is no secret in whose favour this contempt of Government is persisted in. Colonel Prideaux, the Agent of the Governor-General with the late King, in making his report on the arrangements for carrying on the remaining duties of the Agency when it would be broken up, by way of parting kiss to his guide, philosopher and friend, recommended his "Baboo" as his fittest successor for the control of the late King's Household, under the Collector. We say successor, because the Collector's control must be nominal. And the Baboo was no longer to be a "Baboo" but, as the dear old Colonel proposed, elevated to the dignity of a Deputy Collector, with Deputy Collectoral pay and privileges, but relieved of the obligation of Government servants of all grades to shift from place to place. Instead of avoiding the Moorshedabad precedent, the Agent copied it to a fault. His favorite was to be a Bangsidhar at Calcutta. Many strange things are done under the nose of Viceroys and Governors, but this proposed job was rather too much of a good thing. Government rejected the proposal, and directed the charge to be given to one of the Deputy Collectors at the head quarters of the 24 Pergunnas under the Collector, with Kedar as head clerk. It was doubtless considered fortunate that there was a Mahomedan Deputy Collector of acknowledged ability and integrity, then serving also as a member of the Bengal Legislative Council. But here the Collector interposed. He would not have the Moulvi and proposed another of his Deputies, a Hindu. The Government still preferred the Mahomedan as obviously the fitter official for the charge of a princely Mahomedan household. But Government proposes and the District King disposes. And there is no Chamber in India to ask why. Notwithstanding the Lieutenant-Governor's orders, the charge was given to the Hindu. Then Moulvi Abdool Jubbar was on short leave. He has now returned these two months or more, but there was no disposition to carry out the authorised arrangement. Again and again, has Government repeated its command, but to no purpose. It is all the same whether Forbes is King or Bolton. The almighty Baboo is master of the situation. The Moulvi is well out of the "bother," but he can, we fancy, scarcely relish the position of a laughing stock to which, between Baboo and Briton, he has been reduced. Metebrooj, too, doubtless suffers. Meanwhile, the Baboo rules the roast.

THE Lahore Tribune is engaged on a series of leading articles on what it styles "Official Celebrities in the Hyderabad Business." It is a queer title enough, reminding one, in that word "Business" in such a position, of the coarse vernacularity of Porcupine's Gazette. But "Celebrities" too is employed in a rather unusual sense. By "official celebrities" in especial, are ordinarily understood officials—men, that is. Our contemporary applies it to things. Its present article is the sixth of its series. It has for a second title "The Select Committee of the House of Commons." And that is one of our contemporary's "official celebrities in the Hyderabad Business." The opening sentence runs as follows:—

"The greatest celebrity of all, in connection with this Hyderabad business, would seem to be the Select Committee, appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into the causes which had led up to those gigantic frauds on the Nizam, known as the Hyderabad (Deccan) Railway and Mining Companies."

The article closes unfortunately too, in a literary sense, thus:—

"We hope the Committee will realise the truth of the legal maxim 'judex damnatur, cum nocens solvitur.'"

Our contemporary of course draws his legal maxim from the blue and yellow cover of the Edinburgh Review, but there is a mistake in the quotation. The words are—Judex damnatur cum nocens absolvitur. They are from Publius Syrus, whose works the Edinburgh Reviewers from first to last never read. The Syrian was no legal authority but only a playwright, though, as his words so circulated by the famous Quarterly prove, a wise man beyond question.

MR. HENVEY has been to Gwalior and left—for Simla direct. Babu Saheb Jadon, the father of the Queen Dowager, has been temporarily placed at the head of the Regency Council as acting President. The permanent appointment awaits viceregal sanction. Our information, which we implicitly trust, is that the universal expectation and desire is that the Babu Saheb be confirmed in his officiating post. Meanwhile, there is great perturbation from a rumour that the Agent to the Governor-General means to propose the Resident for the direct head of the Regency. We respectfully warn the Government against any such outrage in Gwalior of all places. It will never do.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1888.

WANTED—A JUDGE. OR A JUDGESHIP?

FOR sometime past, the quidnuncs of the local press have been very much exercised at the news of an expected vacancy in the high seat of Her Majesty's Judicature at Fort William in Bengal. It began as a decision of the question of inheritance to a worthy Judge—not less so because he is a swarthy one—who had no intention of dying an official death so soon—and whose retirement from public office in the prime of his powers would be a great public loss, as we explained in a recent issue. Since then, the rumour has taken another shape, namely, that there is to be a third Native Judge in the local High Court. The names of two distinguished Vakils—Hindus for no fault of their own—were mentioned as the limit of selection. We believe there is some foundation for the rumour that the Native element was to be further strengthened in that direction. The report of the Public Service Commission frankly admitted the success of Native Judges and clearly indicated that further liberal progress in such appointments was desirable, and it is not unlikely that the English authorities would advocate concessions in this direction, when they have been bold enough to admit natives of India to executive charge of districts. We think that either of the two names, if selected, would give public satisfaction. The one a Brahman and the other a Kayasth, and both very able, upright, and independent. It is a common remark that Brahmans and Kayasths furnish the bulk of our most intellectual and educated men. On the High Court Bench, the first Judge elect was a Brahman, who never lived to enjoy the distinction. The first pucca Judge was also a Brahman and, although his worthy successor was a Kayasth, the next appointment—an officiating one—fell to a Brahman. These worthies have all been gathered to their forefathers, but the last officiating Native Judge and both the pucca Native Judges of the present are Kayasths. If we were to follow the policy of balancing various communities so often preached to Government—and once seriously acted upon in the Western Presidency to the serious detriment of the poor Brahman—the third Native Judge should be a Brahman. But this is no question for tribal rivalry. For that matter, we may even allow that the names alluded to do not exhaust the field of selection—as there is a distinguished Vaidya Vakil, much by far their senior, who is quite qualified, by his intelligence, integrity, independence and attainments, to discharge the duties of that high office.

Things had reached up to this stage, when an editorial note appears in the Englishman, deprecating, in the usual covert style, the addition to the strength of the Native element on the High Court Bench, but asserting that, if such an evil were to come, the least unacceptable form of it would be the appointment of Mr. Amir Ali. This is advocated on grounds of justice to the large Mahomedan community of Bengal. For ourselves, we have the fullest sympathy with our Mahomedan brethren in Bengal and out of it, and we fully sympathise with their endeavours after more extended employment in the public service. But a Judgeship of the High Court is still such a rare prize for natives of the country, that it should only be given on the ground of absolute merit and not upon the ground of belonging to a particular creed or caste. The British have still a wide part of the field, and they may afford to commit a job now and then, and fill up a vacancy with a man of mediocre attainments. But a native Judge in the High Court is still the cynosure of all eyes, the van-guard of the march of native progress, and, as such, he may still make or mar the future prospects of his countrymen. The unsuccess, for instance, of Babu Mohendro Nath Bose in his officiating appointment has dealt a serious blow to the prospects of the subordinate Judicial Service in that direction, although, at the very latest moment, the fair name of Babu Brojendra Kumar Seal has been mentioned. Besides, the Europeans have so many prizes to give away that, if they throw away one, they do not thereby disappoint for long their really deserving men. The natives of the country, on the contrary, are more numerous, and the prize appointments within their reach are still to be counted upon ones fingers. Under such circumstances, the failure to select the most competent Native for the High Court Bench, may inflict far greater injury to deserving individuals than could be the case in the wrong selection of a Britisher.

The Englishman speaks of Mr. Ameer Ali as a candidate for the post. We are not in the secrets of that learned gentleman; we are bound to suppose the newspaper which speaks of him so admiringly is in such a position. But certainly we are entitled to protest against the use of the term for the Hindu gentlemen whose names have been taken in this connection. We are sure they would all scout with derision the idea of submitting humble applications for the post, or enforcing their candidature to the attention of the authorities by kindly notices in the public press. The Hindu community would certainly cease to respect any gentleman who stooped to candidature or canvass for such a post. From their point of view, the honor ought to come unsolicited as a recognition of undoubted merit, and not as a favor procured by tout-ing of any description.

If another Native of India is to be elevated to the Bench of the High Court, we sincerely trust that the selection will be made on grounds of merit alone, irrespective of political or racial considerations. Memberships of the Legislative Council—ornamental and harmless baubles that they are at present—may well be thrown away as a sop to political clamourers, but it would be an evil precedent to import such considerations in the constitution of the Bench. To have been a keen politician ought to be rather a disqualification than a recommendation for a Judge.

Looking even to the narrow ground upon which the Englishman bases its advocacy, many will arrive at a different conclusion. Mr. Amir Ali has travelled to England, adopted European habits of life, and latterly married a European lady. To the great mass of his countrymen, he is more a sahib than a native, and the ignorant amongst them will wonder that the appreciation of his talents was reserved to be made until this late stage of his career. The elevation of such a man would be a strange way of humouring Islam and securing the interests of the Mahomedan community. His connections were before barely Mahomedan—now they are becoming Frank and Nazarene. Of course, if the British mean to offer a premium on natives to follow the example, it is useless to argue.

VENICE IN CALCUTTA AND THE PURITAN DOGES.

HITHERTO the discovery of mares' nests was a line of journalism in which the Mirror held a monopoly. In its latter days, the grave Hindoo Patriot seems emulous of the distinction. Between them, they have, in the late rains, fished a whale in the Hoogly—discovered a regular Nero. Seniores priores, the Patriot is entitled to precedence in this notorious feat. It first hooked its prey, when the other helped to capture and board it. Thus, in noticing the recent flooding of the streets, the Patriot says:—

"Inhabitants of some of the streets had an opportunity, which they freely availed, (sic.) of fishing at their own house-doors and a fashionable Babu—a scion of a great family—made a day of it by actually manning a pleasure-barge with a party of musicians and sailing down the streets! Neso in burning Rome could hardly have been so happy.”

If the Hindoo Patriot had just the decency to refrain from naming its “Nero,” the Indian Mirror was retained by no such minor scruples. It actually named a respectable Zemindar of the city, the younger son of the late Baboo Romaprasad Roy, (first native Judge of H. M. High Courts in India,) and grandson of the illustrious Raja Ram Mohan Roy, as the atrocious man. But our contemporaries may find this sort of search after equine quarters a costly game. They have laid themselves open to a charge of defamation as well as a suit for damages. Baboos who haul up a barge on land to launch it in the streets and sail through them, are prima facie dangerous to meddle with. The editor of the Indian Mirror, who was the other day taken up on a warrant from Rajshaye District for libelling the Government Pleader there and is now on bail awaiting trial, might be expected to be more careful in provoking young shoots of aristocracy pursuing their own pleasures in quiet at their own sweet will. Are people to be gibbeted because they do not join the National Congress or fail to see wisdom in the Indian Mirror or cannot parse the Patriot? At any rate, it is not always a safe diversion. In digging for worms, our contemporaries may find themselves drawing out the hooded serpent.

And for what? What nonsense is this about Nero? Has Baboo Peary Mohan really done anything atrocious if he has voyaged through Calcutta? One would suppose he had done a very smart and sensible thing in discarding his coach and horses and bringing in his boats when Calcutta was under water. Who knows but that the young gentleman, who is reputed to be highly intelligent and a person of education, had been taking soundings of the streets to ascertain the success of the drainage system and the adequacy of the town arrangements, and that he may yet favour us with the results of his investigation? Or, was the band on board the special sin in the eyes of our contemporaries, deaf to the voice of music? It would have been all right in the Prince of Wales or the Viceroy, if either had been so accompanied on his voyage. It is said that the great American theologian Jonathan Edwards used to strike terror into the hearts of his congregation by his sermons. Our contemporaries are preachers after the stamp of the Transatlantic Calvinist. Their idea evidently is that the Baboo, who is their butt, had no business to be happy under the dispensation of God by which the land was filled with water. Why not? As a landlord, he has done the most natural thing in jubilating on the favour of God in granting the opportunity for cultivation to the peasantry which will bring grist to his mill and put money in his purse. These Cockney editors have no other notion of the rain than as a nasty thing which spoils the roads of the town and incommodes the poor of the metropolis.

What would our woe-begone moralists have? And what did they do? Can they say that they did not go out to see the water in the streets and on the maidan? Is it allowable to go out in carriages which are almost useless and certainly very inconvenient on such occasions, and not to use boats? But then the Baboo had music with him! So much the better for him. Instead of admiring his taste, he is flagellated. Ought he to have been crying over the huts that were injured? But did our unco-good journalists themselves cry? The Baboo's act was only similar to skating in Europe and America, with the band playing, during a severe winter, which necessarily means distress to thousands.

For ourself, we confess we regard Baboo Peary Mohan's proceeding with absolute admiration. There may be genius in diversion, and he has shown originality in pleasure—usually a sad business at best. He has achieved the rare distinction of discovering a new sensation.

Our contemporaries we would address in the words of the Poet—

*Quid de quoque viro, et cui dicas, sacpe videto:
Percontatorem fugito, nam garrulus idem est,
Nec retinent patulæ commissa fuleliter aures;
Et semel emissum volat irrevocabile verbum.*

ELECTRICITY IN OPHTHALMIC MEDICINE.

NOT long ago, we wrote a leading article on Electro-biology. (On referring to it in our issue of July 11, we remark that in the 2nd paragraph, line 3, between would and on, the word proceed has been left out.) On that occasion, we referred to the more mysterious manifestations of the human consciousness which, for want of any better explanation, are roundly attributed to electricity or magnetism. But there is a more prosaic and far more useful aspect of the subject—we mean the relation of electricity, magnetism and galvanism to Pathology and Medicine. This branch of the subject, strangely neglected in England, has been cultivated with some success on the Continent. The French are the leading authorities, British physicians are, for the most part, content to draw their information at second-hand from French and German treatises, as to allow foreigners almost to monopolise the practice of this branch of medicine. Be that as it may, the value of mesmerism, magneto-electricity and galvanism in certain diseases, of the nervous order in especial, is admitted. It comes to something like this, therefore, that, whether or no electricity is life itself, it has an intimate connection with, and influence on, the characteristic peculiarity of animal existence. That electricity, in the form in which it is commonly and strikingly manifested in Nature, exercises a dangerous effect on man and beast, in fact a crushing, extinguishing effect, had been long known. From the earliest ages, men have seen how the lightning strikes animals deaf and dumb and even dead, how it burns up whole forests—cuts through the hardest rocks. But these several actions might be, as they seemed, the necessary results of the physical properties of the lightning, instead of being the outcome of any inherent subtle faculty. As fire it burns, and, by force of the prodigious momentum with which it is charged, it cleaves and makes its way through the hardest obstacles in its path. Its fierce light and terrific report overpower the senses and life itself. The question still remained, whether, apart from these accessory features, it possessed any specific attribute capable of exercising an influence on the animal economy. Divest lightning of its combustible and explosive properties, and is it good or bad for anything? If other words, is electricity pure and simple, a vitalising or devitalising agent? This was in part answered in the affirmative by the researches we have alluded to. We say in part, because, after all, galvanism and magnetism, though they have something in common with electricity, are not necessarily the thing. A recent occurrence seems to set the matter at rest. The Wolverhampton correspondent of the Times reports that “during the heavy thunderstorm of Tuesday, July 17, a collier named Bates, who had lost his sight through an accident, was being led home, when a flash of lightning was reflected on the spectacles he was wearing to conceal his disfigurement. After the peal of thunder which followed he complained of pain in his head. The next moment, to his surprise, he found that he had regained possession of his eyesight.”

We quote we do not know at what (we wish we could say whathh) hand, not having seen the Times ourself. The date of the thunderstorm must be a mistake—unless the passage, which we noticed many weeks back in the papers, had been exhumed lately from the Times of last or any preceding year. We think we may safely accept the genuineness of the passage and the truth of the relation. The account is circumstantial, and the circumstances are vraisemblant. The fact mentioned is, beyond doubt, of the highest import. It has not only a speculative interest but also a practical suggestiveness of great value. It opens a hope to suffering humanity, in a direction in which “Despair” is placarded. The eyeless Milton, under his tragic deprivation, had, doubtless, in the depths of his soul, consolations unavailable to ordinary humanity. Nevertheless, the scholar and patriot bard groaned the groan of his fellow victims of commoner clay, in immortal verse:

Thus with the year

Seasons return; but not to me returns
Day or the sweet approach of even or morn,
Or sight of vernal bloom, or summer's rose,
Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
But cloud instead, and everduring dark
Surrounds me, from the cheerful ways of men
Cut off, and for the book of knowledge fair
Presented with a universal blank
Of nature's works, to me expunged and rased,
And wisdom at one entrance quite shut out.

If the ages to come should be fortunate enough in producing their Miltons, they will probably be pared the pathetic spectacle painted with such painful vividness by the great tan Bard himself :

but chief of all,
O loss of sight, of thee I most complain !
Blind among enemies, O worse than chains,
Dungeon, or beggary, or decrepit age !
Light, the prime work of God, to me is extinct,
And all her various objects of delight
Annull'd, which might in part my grief have eased, Inferiour to the vilest now become
Of man or worm ; the vilest here excel me :
They creep, yet see ; I, dark in light, exposed
To daily fraud, contempt, abuse, and wrong,
Within doors or without, still as a fool,
In power of others, never in my own ;
Scarce half I seem to live, dead more than half.
O dark, dark, dark, amid the blaze of noon,
Irrecoverably dark, total eclipse
Without all hope of day !
O first-created Beam, and thou great Word,
" Let there be light, and light was over all ;"
Why am I thus bereaved thy prime decree ?
The sun to me is dark
And silent as the moon,
When she deserts the night,
Hid in her vacant interlunar cave.
Since light so necessary is to life,
And almost life itself, if it be true
That light is in the soul,
She all in every part ; why was the sight
To such a tender ball as the eye confined,
So obvious and so easy to be quench'd ?
And not, as feeling, through all parts diffused,
That she might look at will through every pore ?
Then had I not been thus exiled from light,
As in the land of darkness, yet in light,
To live a life half dead, a living death,
And buried ; but, O yet more miserable !
My self my sepulchre, a moving grave ;
Buried, yet not exempt,
By privilege of death and burial,
From worst of other evils, pains and wrongs ;
But made hereby obnoxious more
To all the miseries of life,
Life in captivity
Among inhuman foes.

Between the progress of ophthalmic surgery and the discoveries of electric medicine, blindness—absolute stone blindness—will be reduced to the category of the curable, to a disease, more difficult of mastery perhaps, but not more formidable than simple fever. It will be remarked that the man who got back his sight in the thunderstorm had lost it by an accident. That is a form of blindness which is now absolutely beyond medical interference.

THE BARRACKPORE MAGISTRACY.

A counter memorial got up by the friends and admirers of Colonel Hopkinson is being signed for presentation to His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. I would not stop to characterise the way in which the signatures are being obtained. The memorialists take their stand upon the popularity of the Colonel! The word popularity is so very wide in its signification, that some people, without fear of being stoned, may apply it to the Mosleys and the Kirkwoods. Mr. Editor, I will point out some proceedings of the gallant Colonel which will conclusively show that Colonel Hopkinson is not what he is represented by his friends and admirers. This amateur magistrate ordered a boy to be twice whipped for one and the same offence, because forsooth the child did not cry at the time of the first infliction. On another occasion this magistrate ordered a three-legged calf to be shot, but this atrocious outrage on the Hindu religion was avoided, because a large number of Hindus, headed by Dabec Persaud, a friend of his, begged the Colonel to spare its life. The calf was given away to Dabec and eventually it was restored to its rightful owner, when he threatened a suit for damages. Then again the magistrate got one Bidumoney Dassce, a Hindu widow, the relict of a native physician, arrested and ordered her to be medically examined under the provisions of the C. D. Act. The woman, rather than submit to this indignity, heroically fled from the Lock Hospital where she was consigned for compulsory medical examination, and moved the High Court. The latter quashed the illegal proceedings of the magistrate and ordered a new trial. The woman was again convicted and ordered to present herself for medical examination. Immediately this order was passed, she applied for copies and instructed her counsel to move the High Court, when the magistrate came to a compromise and removed her name from the list of women of the town. In another case, a native servant of a European officer filed a plaint against his former master for arrears of pay, the Colonel rejected the plaint in that his master's gold buttons had been lost through the plaintiff's negligence. Now, Mr. Editor, I should like to know how could the Colonel know about the loss of the gold buttons, unless he is a thought-reader. In another case, one Nitto Bewah brought a charge of outraging her modesty against a relative of Ramanath Dey, an Honorary Magistrate and a friend of the magistrate, who drew up a charge against the accused. Babu Ramanath came to Court and deposed before the magistrate that the father of the girl came to him and confessed that the case was false and got up by some persons in the village; wherefore the magistrate dismissed the case and went out of his way to abuse the so called instigators in his judgment. Every tyro in law knows that the statement of Romanath was no evidence, but what does that matter? this Daniel is a law unto himself. Mr. Editor, I do not like to multiply instances to show that Hopkinson is not what he is being represented by his friends, but I would invoke your assistance to call for a list of cases reversed by the appellate courts, which will no doubt show that the hero of Barrackpore is no hero to his valets who now pretend to worship him.

Important News for India,

WHERE FEVERS AND CHOLERA
REIGN SUPREME.

A RECENT TRAVELLER ON THE Chinese Coast found that District remarkably FREE FROM TYPHOID FEVER and CHOLERA. He soon discovered the cause. The people there do not drink cold water from tanks or wells, often extremely impure, but keep a pan of water constantly boiling, into which from time to time they drop a little Tea, and when thirsty THEY DRINK HOT TEA! If the weak and adulterated Teas of China can do this, what may not the pure and strong Teas of India be expected to effect?

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a represen-

ation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however para led. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and humanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "It's serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pull in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY (Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression. It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

ON DEAFNESS.

I sit in silence—to my ear, there comes no sound of words,
No children's ringing laugh I hear, nor joyous song of birds—
I see the warblers on the wing and children sporting round,
But to my deadened ear they bring no sweet and welcome sound.

I walk in silence—tho' I know that ev'ry flow'r or tree
Is vocal with the music sweet, of bird and humming bee—
I see the fields of waving corn stirred by the summer breeze,
But still to me no sound is borne from flowers, or fields, or trees.

Each day I see around our board my friends their places fill—
I see my mother ask of God a blessing on each meal ;
But yet no word I ever hear of that familiar prayer,
And not a sentence greets my ear from all assembled there.

Although to church, on Sabbath days, I duly still repair,
To offer there my sacrifice of humble praise and prayer,
To me through all that blest abode unbroken silence reigns,
Silent to me the word of God—silent the sacred strains.

To me the streams in silence flow, the distant sea to join,
There's music, in their waves I know, to every ear but mine,
I watch the billows as they reach and break upon the shore,
Yet though I stand upon the beach, I hear their sound no more.

To me the storm in silence roar—the threatening clouds I see,
But though the rain in torrents pours, it brings no sound to me—
I see the trees by tempest riven, its gathering force I feel,
Behold the angry flash of heav'n, yet hear no answering peal.

Alas ! to me all nature's voice is now for ever mute,
And ne'er again may I rejoice in sound of song or lute—
Yet still doth faithful mem'ry bring the sweet melodious lays,
I heard my loved companion sing in earlier, happier days.

Oh would that I could hear once more the charming sound of words,
The music of the winds and waves, and melody of birds—
Could hear the Sabbath bell again sound from the house of prayer,
And join in every sacred strain with those who worship there.

And dashed it to the ground.

She found the ruin wrought,
But not cast down, forth from the place she flew,
And with her mate, fresh earth and grasses brought,
And built her nest anew.

But scarcely has she placed
The last soft feather on its ample floor,
When wicked hand, or chance, again laid waste,
And wrought the ruin o'er.

But still her heart she kept,
And toiled again ;—and last night, hearing calls,
I looked, and lo ! three little swallows slept
Within the earth-made walls.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

ERRATA.—By a truly djabolical trick last week, our exclamation "A dear solicitor!" was suffixed to the first of the two Notes on the Calcutta Municipality, instead of, as we intended, the next following. Our readers will please read it as coming at the end of the second paragraph.

In col. 1, p. 428, line 5, for retained read restrained (.)

In tugging over our file, we notice, p. 411, col. 1, 9th line from the bottom, "a" wanting to the second syllable of the italicised word.

MR. A. C. CURTIS, Ting Ling Tea estate, Pahighatta, has perpetrated on our contemporary of the Englishman a conjurer's trick. He sent the editor a prodigious egg of a Muscovy duck—which proved the equine egg of the Bengali proverb. In the ordinary course, the egg was sent to the kitchen to be boiled. In the process, the shell burst and discovered a second perfect egg in another shell. The first had "no yoke but only glare"—whatever that may mean or be worth.

NUDEA is this year again under water. It occurred thiswise :—

"On the 2nd September Navadwipa witnessed a scene which will not soon be forgotten. At about 12 P.M., the bunds, with which the town is encircled, gave way, and within an hour or so it was inundated, no dry land being visible. Most of the inhabitants had sat down to take their meals, when the rush of water drove them out. They naturally ran towards the bund and did everything in their power to temporarily stop the breach, but all to no purpose. The poor are suffering a great deal, and if this state of things continues any longer, the results will be disastrous. Everything is selling at an exorbitant price, such as very few can afford to pay. No one can go out but in a boat, and the people are living in a state of suspense. The breaking of the bunds this year is entirely due to the unwise neglect of our municipality. If after the floods of 1885 it had kept an eye on the embankment, our little town would not have met with this misfortune. Most of the commissioners, including the chairman and the vice-chairman, are away from here practising in the courts at Krishnagur, and we are therefore left helpless."

WHILE the late rains have flooded the Bengal Presidency all through, the necessary seasonable showers have been withheld from the Western Presidency and the Deccan. There is grave anxiety in consequence in those parts. In Poona, distress has already manifested itself in a form and to an extent to necessitate prompt measures. The Collector has opened relief-works.

A TELEGRAM of the 7th September from Washington reports that the United States Senate has passed the Bill, already passed by Congress, forbidding the return of Chinese after once leaving the United States, and cancelling all tickets of identity. The United States Minister at Peking has telegraphed to President Cleveland that China has postponed coming to any decision in reference to the treaty for excluding Chinese emigrants from the States, and will deliberate further on the matter.

THE unfortunate women who abound in London, are just now under a special prejudice. Four of this class have been successively savagely murdered in Whitechapel, two having been found in the streets with their throats cut and disembowelled. The crimes are believed to have been committed by a maniac. The police have as yet made no arrests.

THE House of Representatives has passed the Bill granting powers for making reprisals on Canada asked for by President Cleveland.

THE "Patriotic Fleet" lately celebrated its tenth anniversary. It came into existence in 1878—to develop the maritime resources of Russia and to aid the Government in times of war. It was started by national subscription. The wealthiest nobles all subscribed, the fund raised being four million roubles. It began with three steamers. Now six ocean-going vessels of fair speed forming the fleet are principally employed in the trade or transports between the Black Sea and Vladivostock. They always carry their armament in the holds. The fleet now receives a subsidy from Government.

THE Maharanee of Searsole has accused of bribery Baboo Hari Churn Banerjee, Sub-inspector of police, Raneeunge, and the charge is being heard by Mr. Streetfield, the Magistrate.

HERE is a precious pluralist, religious and connubial, at Moonsheegunj, in the Statesman's newsletter from that station:—

"There is an interesting case pending before the 2nd Moonsif. One Monoranjan Gangooli, first a Hindu, a Brahman, then a Christian, and now a Mahomedan, sued to recover one of his Brahman wives. At the very outset a warrant of arrest against his wife was prayed for before judgment, but the prayer was disallowed. The case has been adjourned."

THE same letter has the following notice of a lightning accident:—

"A brazier while on board a country boat in a canal close to this place was killed by lightning at about 1 P.M., on Sunday last. Some copper coin wrapped in cloth round the waist of the deceased were found melted into a lump of copper. The boat sank, but two persons who were in it were providentially saved."

THE legal sensation in Berhampore is a forgery in Court—is not open Court:—

"A daring forgery has come to the notice of the public which occurred in the Sub-judge's court. Rai Dhunput Sing Bahadoor, complainant, filed a suit against one Ram Chunder, a medical practitioner of Moorshedabad, for Rs. 10,000, on a deed which has been properly registered. There was a certain landed property mortgaged, and from the income of that property the debt was to have been cleared off. When the document was filed the court did not happen to see the back of the deed. But on Monday last, it was found that an entry had been made of the payment of the sum. The writing seems to be a suspicious one, and to have been written with fresh ink, whereas the date given is upwards of three years ago. Besides, a year ago, this document was admitted in the Calcutta High Court and a true printed copy of it lies in our Judge's court which does not show any endorsement at the back. The complainant has cited 24 witnesses to prove his case, who are all very respectable persons."

LINNILLE COMBS, aged 11 years, weighing 70 lbs and upwards, of four feet high, of Breathitt County, has been consigned to the Frankfort penitentiary, Kentucky, for sororicide. He murdered his sister Nannie Belle Combs, not quite three years of age, because "Samps Collins told me he'd give me a pair of boots and suspenders if I'd do it." When questioned how he did it, he artlessly narrated "She was just walking along the floor, and I hit her in the head with a skillet. She fell over into the fire, but she was dead already. I pulled her out of the fire, and threw her into the creek." Next, when the body floated and he was informed of it, he drew the body ashore, and it was interred. The matter might have been hushed up, but the ingenuous murderer himself went about relating his feat of devilry, until he was arrested in a month's time, and after trial found guilty on his own admission, and sentenced. There was no Woodroffe to help to send this precocious imp back to society.

THE Chinese in Mauritius number about 4,000, and they are on the increase. That is everywhere their "dark way."

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR A. ALISON has succeeded General Foster in the India Council.

FRANCE has at last awakened to the barbarity of duel. A Bill for abolishing the practice has been introduced in the Chamber of Deputies.

A NEW play called the "Mahomet" by M. Henri de Bornier will be played in Paris next winter.

MR. STONEY, the district engineer, Burdwan, will be succeeded by Baboo Bidhu Sekhar Banerjee, the Supervisor.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN, M.P., the chief promoter of the Channel Tunnel and railway scheme, is expected in India in the winter.

DR. RIBBENTORP has returned to Simla from Burmah, where he went on special duty, in connection with the leasing of the Upper Burmah forests.

THE Home remittances from the 1st April to 8th September, 1888, amounted to £5,653,000. The Budget estimate for the whole year is £14,000,000.

THE Cape Parliament has passed a bill authorising payment of fifteen shillings a day to members during the Session. The Transvaal Republic pays the members of the Volksraad at the rate of three pounds a day.

MR. HENRY VIZETELY, publisher of Henrietta Street, is being prosecuted for publishing translations of Zola. The Bow-street Magistrate has sent up the case, at request, to the Central Criminal Court instead of to the sessions.

THE Sessions Judge Mr. Forbes has reduced the sentence on the editor of the Hyderabad Record from six months' simple imprisonment to seven days' and a fine of Rs. 500, in default another month. Mr. Solomon has petitioned the Resident for stay of execution for an appeal to the local High Court.

THE Eastern Herald says that it is believed that 9 out of the 39 candidates at the Holkar Durbar Pledership Examination have passed. The small number of successful candidates is accounted for by a sudden change of rule, by which examinees must obtain 33 per cent. marks in each of the four subjects, instead of, as hitherto, 33 on the aggregate of marks.

THE same paper reports the sudden death, on the 17th August, of Dewan Chaturbhuj Sehai of the Chhatarpur State. Munshi Chaturbhuj was British Deputy Collector when, less than two years ago, he was appointed manager of the Native State.

THE largest steamer next to the Great Eastern is The City of New York. She forms one of the Inman and International Steam-ship Company's fleet, is 565 ft. long, 65 ft. broad and 44 ft. deep, is 10,500 gross tonnage and can accommodate 2,000 passengers. The engines are capable of 20,000 horse power or double that of the Great Eastern. She is fitted with the electric light.

THE Indian Spectator quotes, from a Scotch county paper, some notices of the family of Sir William Wedderburn, retired Bombay Civil Service, now the Liberal candidate elect for North Ayrshire. The surname of the family is derived from a place in Berwickshire. Its importance dates from Walter de Wedderburn "who swore fealty to Edward I. at Berwyck Sur Twed." The first who came to India was the first Sir William, father of the present Sir William. He too was of the Civil Service and was Accountant-General of Bombay.

"His eldest son, Mr. John Wedderburn, who was also in the Civil Service of India, was killed at Hissar in North India, his devoted wife and their child sharing the same fate. This was during the dark days of the Munity, but far from embittering the family, the event seems to have attached them the more to this unhappy country. Sir John's second son was David, our Sir David Wedderburn, who, though he had little to do directly with India, was yet one of her warmest friends in and out of Parliament. Most of our readers must have seen him at Bombay—a delicate-looking studious man, but with a keen sense of justice and an indomitable will."

THE Hunmant Rao prosecution has entered the second stage. The defence has begun. The principal witness Mr. Crawford has been examined and cross-examined. In examination-in-chief, he denied all imputations against himself in the case. In cross-examination, he deposed that

"he first met Hunmantrao in the village of Bijapore, where there had been a flood. This was in 1883. He had raised subscriptions in Bombay, and went to Bijapore to see the relief works. The accused was a prominent citizen, and made a good impression on Mr. Crawford, who had known his uncle and grandfather, the latter a distinguished Government servant. When Mr. Crawford came to Poona, the accused was there. They became intimate. 'And how did he come to be employed by you at the time, as was notorious?' 'I was in debt, and aware he knew Marwaris and local money-lenders, and I got him to negotiate loans and pay instalments. I employed him as my broker. I had no other business transactions with him, but once set him to get information for me, suspecting B.G. Sathe of corruption.' He said he had had eight or ten loans from Marwaris, and as many renewals. 'What did Hunmantrao get for this?' 'Nothing from me; the usual brokerage from the Marwaris, I suppose.' 'Why did you get him to do this business for you?' 'I was aware he knew Marwaris, and knew for a fact that he had acted in connection with Colonel Stopford's affairs.' 'What was he to have for helping you in the Sathe business?' 'Nothing.' 'What prompted him to act for you?' 'Personal animosity against Sathe, and personal friendship for me.' Mr. Crawford said he did not know Dabir was placed over the head of a qualified aval karkhoon. He admitted in one case acting contrary to the Collector's recommendations, and without consulting the Acting Collector; but stated that he was justified in so doing. Dabir's appointment was due to an error and neglect in the office to make up the list.

Mr. Crawford cancelled Sindekar's transfer to Jowli, on account of the statement he made in a petition, to the effect that his wife was ill, and about to be confined, and he could neither remove her with him, nor leave her in charge of anybody else. He was not aware that the woman had at that time been actually confined at the house of his father-in-law, and in another town altogether. How could he divine that the man was lying? He made no enquiry into the matter. He considered the domestic troubles of Sindekar a sufficient justification for the temporary cancellation of his transfer; temporary was all he agreed to, as the season was late, and he saw no reason why he should not defer it till after the rains. Questioned as to his personal financial position, he admitted his embarrassments from the time of his appointment to the Commissionership; that his income was hypothecated, and was being drawn by King, King and Co.; Rs. 1,700 per month were allowed him. He banked with the Kings and the French Bank. He had no current account with the French Bank, and only three rupees in the bank book which was lost. He repeated that Sathe was adversely disposed towards him, and he believed Sathe's visit to him, and the monetary assistance given him shortly before his suspension, was only a plan to enable Mr. Nugent to see it. He admitted having disappeared in disguise from Poona, and having endeavoured to get a passage on the steamer Teheran, and he dare say he did write that letter to his brother, stating that he was going to drown himself in the river; but he said that, at that time, he was not responsible for his actions, and was not in his right mind, and was not responsible from 14th to 20th July. He became responsible again after that date. During the cross-examination, it also transpired that, on his return, the survey settlement officer of Chopda stated that the Commissioner had recently visited his taluka; he now denied having ever been there, though the draft book revealed an entry in his own writing; he explained he must have written 'taluka' for 'district.'

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

GENERAL BOULANGER has turned up in Christiana.

THE telegraph announces the death of Richard Anthony Proctor, the astronomer, who had done so much to popularise correct knowledge, not of astronomy alone.

SIR STEUART BAYLEY, on completion of his seasonal tours, reached Darjeeling yesterday. There was a large gathering at the railway station to receive the Lieutenant-Governor.—The last Tour was not without its accidents. At Mymensing, the steam launch crushed to death a native boy swimming. The poor parents were humanely paid Rs. 300. Another man escaped with an injury.

WE are glad to see the Hon'ble S. Subramania Iyer appointed Government Pleader, during the absence on leave of Mr. Powell. This is the first time that a native has been allowed the distinction, and it has properly fallen on the Hon'ble pleader of the Madras High Court.

THE New Club at Simla has been destroyed by fire. The house was insured for Rs. 40,000. Most of the furniture was saved. The New Club will now have a new home. The nasty and dangerous kerosine was the cause of the fire, by the upturning of a lighted lamp.

WE are told—

"The latest fad of His Highness the Maharaja Holkar has been the electric light. An engine, with all the necessary apparatus, arrived from Bombay about two months ago, and a considerable portion of the lamps, &c., had been erected, when suddenly H. H. stopped the work. So the whole of the plant has been taken up and returned to Bombay, the Maharaja agreeing to pay ten thousand rupees for this little freak. We believe there is some talk of the Gackwar also going in for electric lights. Let us hope they will succeed better at Baroda than they seem to have done at Indore."

We cannot join in the hope. The electric light is an abomination, and we are not sure that it may not turn out dangerous on a large scale. It must tend to general blindness.

THE noticeable river accident of the week is the loss of the ferry steamer Ostrich, plying between Kailahghat, Calcutta, and Telkalghat, Howrah. She had landed some two hundred passengers at Calcutta and was returning to Howrah with about one-fourth of that number, it is said. When in mid stream she collided with the Port Commissioners' floating crane Hercules and sank in two minutes. A few passengers jumped over into the crane and some were rescued from the river. The actual number dead and drowned is not known nor is ever likely to be known. The rumour however ran that about 200 lives were lost. According to the Police report, 32 persons have been saved and only 8 lives lost. The following statements have been made by the Serang of the Ostrich and the engineer in charge of the crane.

"Joomonati Serang says—I am serang of the steamer Ostrich. I left the police ghaut landing stage at about 10 A. M. with about 40 passengers, and 9 crew, and one sircar on board. The ebb tide was running very strong. I steamed head up the river to the outer buoy off No. 7 Jetty, when I saw a large boiler floating down the river close to the buoy. I shifted my helm to port, and thus allowed the boiler to clear me on the starboard. In doing so, the steamer was thrown across the tide, and just then she was struck by the 30 ton crane vessel on the port quarter. My vessel at once went down, and the passengers and crew were all thrown into the river.

Mr. F. W. Arnfield, engineer in charge of the 30 ton crane, states—I was alongside the S. S. Professor, at No. 4 Jetty moorings. I lifted out a large iron boiler for the vessel, and lowered it into the river, where it was taken charge of by the Bowraah Mills steam launch. I saw the launch tow the boiler up stream, and I breasted out from No. 4 Jetty moorings to mid stream and dropped down stern foremost, or head to tide, to Koila Ghaut, intending to go alongside the S. S. Clan Macgregor, lying at No. 8 Jetty moorings. I then saw the boiler I had lifted out of the S. S. Professor, and which had been taken in tow by the steam launch, adrift, and floating down the river in a line with my starboard bow. Just at this time the steam ferry Ostrich, which was crossing the river, was swept by the tide, and her port quarter collided with my bow, and she sank at once. My vessel was at a stand-still at this time, and we rescued 16 of the passengers."

LAST Saturday, one Englebregt suffering from hernia and piles repaired to the Medical College hospital. He was admitted, to be operated upon. The preparatory chloroform was a little too freely administered, a circumstance which the operating surgeon did not detect till he had commenced his work. It was then too late, neither the galvanic battery nor any artificial respiration could bring back life. This is not the first instance of the kind. Medical manslaughter is a common enough incident in Hospital practice. Their license gives the Order of Sts. Louis and Cosme practical immunity for all their omissions and commissions. Will not the Lieutenant-Governor inquire? Or, will the surgeons be left to continue the reform of vengeance inaugurated in another regime and complete the popular horror of Hospitals?

AFTER all, the Mission to Cabul is not to be—for the present at any rate. When everything was ready for the start, there came sudden qualms of conscience at the British Durbar—fears of the brave, if not follies of the wise. The British are never welcome in Cabul; yet they have somehow a strange fascination for the place. In spite of repeated warnings, they again and again go there, to bleed—in every way. The passion had again seized our rulers, and nothing, we thought, would prevent them from satisfying it. At the eleventh hour, however, wiser counsels prevailed. It was recognised that just now the Afghan country might be found more than ordinarily unsafe. The Ameer has patched up a peace with the Shinwaris, and the Commander-in-Chief General Gholam Hyder is free to return with the troops in the field to the capital. But a new and worse danger has appeared in the North, in the revolt of Ishak Khan, Governor of Turkestan. As Ishak is a cousin of Abdur Rahman's and is understood to have supporters in Cabul and at the capital, it was not considered prudent to add to the already combustible elements of the Afghan metropolis, by sending a large British party.

"A PUNJABI" writes to the Civil and Military Gazette :—

"Passing through the Mundi State en route from Kulu and the north. I was told by many Mahomedans of the treatment they had received on the occasion of the death of the mother of the Raja of Mundi. Every Mahomedan in the State was forced to shave his beard. Those who refused were ill-treated, seized and their beards cut forcibly. Two men, Kamran, Pathan, and Sumdu, Kashmiri, the latter a Moulvi and religious head of the Mundi Mahomedans, were by the Raja's express order seized, their beards burnt off with oil and gunpowder, and imprisoned, and I am told there were other similar cases."

The Panjab has always been the Indian Province notorious for inter-religious animosities and persecution. There is no inherent improbability in this correspondent's account. These Hill Hindus and their princelings are given to strange pranks. We only wonder their people, Hindus or Mahomedans or Buddhists, submit themselves so meekly. We hope this Mundi man will be called to account for at any rate the outrageous lengths to which he carried out his "domestic institution" of enforced popular mourning for the death of the Rani Dowager. Such persecution, always unrighteous, is more than ever impolitic at the present time. We are afraid that this Mundi revelation may be seized by Party for political capital.

WE are shocked to hear of the conduct of the new Governor of Cashmere. This briefless barrister, Pandit Surajbal, D.C.L., is an A S S, without either loyalty or gratitude or manners. Like many another waif from India, he must have kept the lowest company in London. He is familiar with all the ignorant and indecent tittle-tattle of Babylon. At a state dinner at Jummoo on the Maharaja's birthday, he, in proposing His Highness's health, went out of his way to abuse Her Majesty the Queen and make atrocious insinuations against her and John Brown.

The Pioneer first gave the account and the Civil and Military Gazette follows up as follows :—

"A contemporary gives publicity to a story which attributes some atrocious remarks regarding Her Majesty to Dr. Suraj Bal, now in high favor at Cashmere. We had ourselves received the story, but gave it neither publicity nor credence. Our contemporary, however, appears to have received confirmation of the facts stated, and performs an unpleasant duty in bringing them to light. The remarks were made at a dinner by way of pointing an allusion to the well-known 'habits' of the Maharajah of Cashmere; and if Suraj Bal is wise, he will in future avoid the company of Englishmen, and we trust, of such Natives as regard Her Majesty with the reverence which a good and pure-lived Queen deserves from her faithful subjects. We would like to hear, meanwhile, what action Prince Amar Singh has taken in the matter.

In connection with the unpleasant matter mentioned above, a well-informed correspondent writes :—'There have been intrigues going on at Jummoo to oust Suraj Bal from his appointment, and for either the present Financial Minister of the Council, Dewan Janki Pershad, or his uncle Dewan Budri Nath, to succeed him; and I am not astonished at Suraj Bal doing as he did to try and get a stronger hold upon the Maharajah, to retain him in his appointment as Governor of Cashmere. I can, however, tell you as a fact, that some years ago I was personally present at a party in the Nashut Bagh in Cashmere, and other officers were also present. Suraj Bal was then one of the Judges of Cashmere, and on this occasion presided at the dinner table, and when it came to the proposing of healths, Suraj Bal put Her Majesty the Queen aside, and proposed the health of the Maharaja in most fulsome terms of flattery. His rudeness in ignoring to drink the health of Her Majesty first, was so very marked, that an officer, whose name I at this moment forget started up and called Suraj Bal to order; but instead of doing so, he became insulting and there was a dreadful row. The officer finally requested Suraj Bal to grant an apology, or the following morning he would chastise him publicly. Suraj Bal had to grant the apology. I know also that he is utterly disrespectful in his language generally to the Government; and, under existing circumstances at Jummoo, he will not hesitate to speak language which he thinks may give pleasure to the Durbar, who bitterly hate the Government of India and all things English. What I have said about Suraj Bal's conduct at the Nashut Bagh dinner party cannot be denied.'

The outrage is so great that the Foreign Office can scarcely overlook it. The Maharaja himself should be the first to call upon his servant for explanation. If the allegation is true, the amplest reparation should be promptly made to the Imperial Power.

THE Pioneer gives the following description of His Honour Doctor Suraj Bal :—

"He is a son of the late well-known Pundit Manphul, Mir Munshi attached to the Punjab Secretariat. Going home with a Lawrence scholarship, and after seven years at Oriel, he managed to stumble through his Bachelor's degree. Subsequently his University presented him with a D.C.L., which proved too much for him. Failing at the Lahore bar, he went to Cashmere as Judge of the Court there, and is now governor of a province."

It is not of such hot brained youth that Governors of Provinces are made.

JOBUT is a small Bheel State in Central India. During the minority of the Chief, it was managed by a Superintendent under the Bhopawar Agency, while the Chief himself was sent to the Daly College at Indore. After completing his term there, he has for sometime been joined in the administration with the Superintendent. He is now twenty-two years of age. Having completed his noviciate, it is natural that he should be desirous of being placed in independent charge of his own State. Rana Sarup Singh is reported to be a well educated young Chief, an accomplished cricketer, and fond of field sports, of active business habits and sufficient knowledge of affairs. We see no reason for deferring his installation.

A correspondent of the Eastern Herald points out that during the incumbency of Col. Miller, Political Agent, in 1882, the Chiefs of Bhatkatgur and Nimkhera were promptly invested with the management of their respective chiefships.

FROM the Cashmere letter of the 20th August in the same paper, it appears the Maharaja's troops, more than eleven thousand in number in the neighbourhood of Gilgit, were awaiting His Highness's order to attack the rebels.

This is a queer arrangement. What did the State mean by massing such an army there if not to fight? How could the Maharaja command his troops from such a distance? He is no Carnot or Moltke, and there are no facilities for quick communication with his Northern frontiers.

THIS Correspondent's letter affords a good and, we may add, poor, specimen of the kind of complaints common to our newspapers. Thus we are told—

"Dewan Luchman Dass, the late Prime Minister of Kashmir State, who was forced upon his Highness the Maharaja by Mr. Plowden the Resident of Kashmir, had pleased his patron the Resident by purchasing from British Government Promissory Notes to the extent of Rupees twenty-five lacs, out of which the sum of Rupees eighteen lacs was paid down at once. Now the creature of the Resident is no longer in office; and although his Highness the Maharaja is not willing to purchase more Government loans, yet he is obliged to pay the balance Rupees seven lacs in order to fulfil the promise of his former Dewan."

And why not? If the State has entered into any agreement or given any pledge, it is but just that it should fulfil it. Wherein is the Zooldom of the British Government in all this? Our gentlemen of the press are never slow to come down with all their resources of reasoning and railery and indignation, whenever the British Government shows the slightest tendency to back out of its promises. And yet they are not ashamed to preach a different standard to the Native States. If the Maharaja of Cashmere has, under advice of his present minister, made up the balance of the twenty-five lacs he offered, under the advice of his late Dewan, to invest in the British Loan, he has done a proper thing, which will enhance his character and the reputation and credit of his Raj. Instead of making of the obligation a grievance, he should be encouraged to regard it as matter of course. If our Princes were to repudiate the acts of their ministers, or if one ministry were to cancel the engagements of another, matters would come to a pretty pass. In the present case, the Maharaja might, had he chosen, withhold the 7 lacs, but not with good grace. Seven lacs is a good round sum to Cashmere, but no great matter to India. It is a drop in the ocean of British Indian necessity. He had only to ask to be freed from paying in the balance. Our Government would not have suffered in the least. Cashmere's omission would no more have been perceived by John Bull than his prototype in the fable perceived the presence of the fly lodged on the point of his horn. Had the Viceroy been any way aware of the pecuniary difficulties of Cashmere, he would, we are persuaded, have himself relieved it of the embarrassment of making up the investment. Under the circumstances, it is ungenerous in us to talk as if the Maharaja had swallowed a big bolus under compulsion and only for British benefit.

THE Advocate of India is again looking up. It is a good paper and we rejoice in its prosperity. After its early triumph, it fell on evil times and, though conducted with as great ability, wisdom and spirit as ever, it did not meet with the necessary measure of support, although the enterprise and liberality of the proprietor (Mr. Anderson) and the ability, liberality, and prudence of the editor (Mr. Bailey) merited a rich reward. We cannot from this distance divine the cause or causes. Local jealousy was presumably at work, but we suspect that the dire offence of the paper was its moderation. It did not represent the fiery orators and Radical Reformers in Church and State. It criticised with freedom, but without violence, and often with a delicacy of thrust which must have been lost upon the general, however welcome it might be to cultivated men of mature years. In fine, the concern proved a misnomer. The Advocate was too much of the judge for the Native Bombay, in its present Political Revival. The enormous value of such a moderator between the Native Press and the European was not understood. The Advocate was allowed to languish. Subscribers and advertisers fell off, until it was constrained to reduce its size and double its price. At the same time, it was offered for sale. It has now passed from its original spirited owner to a new proprietary. There is an apparent diminution in the size, but a real increase in bulk. The literary department continues good, so far as the writing itself is concerned, but there is a visible lack of supervision. Thus we read:—

"Moola Mahomed, a Moogla, who superseded Moola Ismail for a short time as Royal customs farmer in Rangoon shortly before the outbreak of hostilities, has been awarded 1,23,000. An adjustment claim of 1,90,000 against the Burmese Government for monies advanced to them by the late Persian Consul has also been paid, and Rs. 9,000 out of a claim of Rs. 16,000 for jewellery supplied to Theebaw and his Queen."

We don't know what a Moogla is, but surely Rangoon was never a royal port in this generation.

The following, in the same number, reporting the recent lecture at Simla, is worse:—

"The lecturer expressed the opinion that good half-bred English stallions for were best Indian mares. This class of horse could not be got from Australia, and Arabs were too small."

A respectable paper ought to be better done up than that.

A CALCUTTA telegram to the Morning Post of Allahabad says:—

"Owing to the contents of Mr. Veasey's confidential Police Circular having been communicated to the Press, a special department has been created in the Office of the Inspector-General of Police, consisting of a Superintendent and a few European assistants. The post of Personal Assistant to the Inspector-General of Police will merge in the new superintendency. Mr. Tucker, Assistant District Superintendent of Police, will probably be the first incumbent."

That is in the usual way. Anything for an excuse for multiplying appointments! One would have thought that the rational thing to do, on the appearance of the Confidential Circular, was to find out the base man who supplied it to the tempter in the Editor—and punish him severely for grave misconduct. But no!—the wise men of the Circumlocution Office know better. They are a truly pious set, the rulers of the Departments and their Viziers, acting strictly according to canon. How they obey to the letter the scriptural command to increase and multiply! The offices of a Superintendent and a few European Assistants have already been created; and the first Superintendent is named! Doubtless, the European Assistants have also been appointed.

It is true the traitor, who communicated the Circular to, and inspired the disturbing comments of, the Native Press, could not be discovered. So much the worse for the Department! What is the value of a Police that cannot maintain discipline within itself? How is the Department to trace crime in the community or the country at large, when it is not equal to detect its own black sheep? Its Chiefs could, no doubt, on a vague suspicion based on no circumstantial foundation, disturb the whole administration, by a wholesale massacre of clerks. Such a measure would have had a show of force, if not of reason, and heads of departments are naturally tempted to set themselves right with the Government and the public by action in this direction. The Inspector-General deserves great commendation for not perpetrating any such folly and injustice. Whatever the newspapers may think of him, Mr. Veasey, at any rate, is no Buckland of Zooloom.

The fact is, the Circular was ill timed. At such a period of excitement, anything of that kind was almost sure to be misunderstood in the Department and certain to be resented by the public. It might have been gradually introduced without irritation. But to sow an elaborate little Procedure of the kind broadcast throughout the Police in the country and expect it to be unknown to the people, because it was marked "Confidential," was preposterous. It could not possibly be kept secret. That was out of the question.

ACCORDING to the report of Acting Consul W. Holland—

"The smallest shopkeeper at Newchwang, is a banker, and is allowed to issue notes, against which he may have no cash or bullion as security. Unless, therefore, he happens to be a capitalist, or a trader with good credit, the smallest run upon him may involve bankruptcy. In that event, the principle of 'first come first served' is acted upon in honouring the obligations, as in selling goods across the counter, and the late applicants find themselves in possession of worthless paper. Foreigners, however, run no risk, since, if they hold notes of a bankrupt firm, the local authorities always exchange them for paper issued by solvent parties. It may be supposed that this free and easy system would lead to a good deal of fraud, but it is said not to do so. On the contrary bills are seldom dishonoured. Over-speculation is a frequent cause of failure among the Chinese, but deliberate fraud seldom occurs. It seems that wealthy bankers and mandarins, not caring for their wealth to be known, often make deposits with bankers without taking receipts. It may very well happen, therefore, that on the death of a depositor his heir may not know where to lay hands upon some of his money, which remains in the banker's hands. For the sake of greater secrecy a depositor will even forego interest on his money, which the banker is nevertheless able to employ to his own advantage."

So much for the American legend of the "Heathen Chinee"! It would be difficult to match such simple virtue as the Celestials possess out of Asia. Can it be said of the West, cis-Atlantic or trans-Atlantic, that "deliberate fraud seldom occurs"? Notwithstanding all the sanctions by which it is guarded—notwithstanding the weekly admonitions of the Church—notwithstanding the frowns of society and the terrors of the law—commercial morality in Christendom is, in many countries, a soiled dove. It is probably at its lowest in America, where dishonesty is scarcely under the necessity of assuming the disguise of honour and virtue. Fraud openly stalks the city in broad day. Great robbers are among the leading citizens and men of power as well as position. Confederacies of these men awe the legislature and rule the State. And it is here that the non-Christian or non-White has the least chance. It is among the unworthy Americans that Asiatics are to-day blackguarded and persecuted, as Africans heretofore were enslaved and scourged. It is a poet of California, who, speaking as the mouthpiece of the narrow trades-unionism of his fellow citizens, has consigned the respectable Mongolians to infamy in about the most popular American verse of the day, which begins and ends thiswise:—

Which I wish to remark,—

And my language is plain,—

That for ways that are dark

And for tricks that are vain,

The heathen Chinee is peculiar.

Such is the treatment of the East at the hands of the West!

IN another column will be found a letter from Patna which is worth attention, specially for the closing reflections. Our Correspondent is a most respectable member of the Mahomedan community, wellknown for ability. He wrote in a great hurry, as we happen to know. Nevertheless, he writes well. His matter is good, and he drives his point home and is thoroughly trustworthy in his facts, and sober in his views. When such a man complains that Mahomedan boys are going to the bad from too early political dissipation, after the manner of the Hindu lads in Calcutta and other towns, his community should take warning.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1888.

LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

THE SANITATION RUN AMOK AGAINST SERAMPORE.

DR. LIDDERDALE is evidently determined to galvanize his department into a new activity—into a power to be feared. Not that the Sanitary Department was without activity of a kind. In the person of its subordinate officers, it was always renowned for locomotion. It wrote a number of Inspection reports on a number of localities visited by them, and once a year these reports saw the light of publicity in a blue book of portentous bulk enough to justify its raison d'être. Dr. Lidderdale, it is true, was too fond of the breezes of Dareeling to descend to the insanitary plains except for short flying visits, but he evidently wrote a good deal, and saw that his Deputies did not neglect the work of inspection. At any rate, a flood of sanitary inspection notes and memoranda kept pouring in upon him, and he had no small ado to sift, compress and compile them into his Annual Report. The strangest part of the thing, however, was the character of these notes and memoranda. They bore such a family resemblance upon them that, were it not for the inevitable differences of the names of places and minor divergences of local conditions, they might well pass for the outturn of some mechanical contrivance—a kind of new mould for the special use of Sanitary Inspectors. They were so typical that reports of any two places were as two drops of water, in all essential respects. Some time ago, we transcribed in our columns specimens of these curious documents to show that we were perpetrating no exaggeration—no figure of speech, in our view. Indeed, looking at these productions, it was not too much to say that they might as well be manufactured in the recesses of their study, instead of a number of high paid officers scouring the country, at no small expense to the general funds of the State.

These Inspection reports were cast in the same mould. An analysis of one would serve for all. It was first a scientific examination of the soil of the locality, and a learned description of its physical aspect. Then followed an examination of the usual sanitary defects common to all Bengal villages and towns, the whole wound up with a string of suggestions for their improvement, embodying the highest ideal of the latest development of sanitary science. As to the defects, no ghost of a Sanitary Department was needed to point them out. Every body, not even the "barbarous" Hindu peasant excepting, was too well aware of them, and as strongly desirous as any sanatarian for their removal. But there was the stumbling block in the way—the question of ways and means. The impracticability of the Sanitary Department's ideal proposals has always been a matter of notoriety. Its word is—"thorough," but it curiously enough shuts its eyes to the practical side of the question. Officers of the Sanitary Department like Surgeon-Major Gupta, or Dr. French-Mullen, who have, at intervals, officiated for Dr. Lidderdale, we confess, have shown more moderation and practical wisdom than usually characterize its proceedings, and its relations to other administrative departments. So far as we have heard reports of these two gentlemen, they fully appreciate the difficulties of the problem, and are satisfied that the progress of reform can only be gradual, and commensurate with the funds at our disposal. No practical considerations, however, seem to have any weight with the chief. His ideal standard of perfection must be conformed to—and this, not by throwing the work over a number of years, but at once. Dr. Lidderdale would not budge an inch, so that he has hitherto presented the amusing spectacle of year after year pressing the same ideal recommendations which no body was in a position to carry out. Even sober officials of the position of experienced District officers had come to regard the Sanitary Department's proposals as only meant for the ear to hear—not the hand to execute. Their extravagance neutralized even their legitimate effect, so that Inspection reports have hitherto been regarded as things which were to be read, and then forgotten for the next twelve months.

From Dr. Lidderdale's recent attack on the Serampore Municipality, it would seem the chief of the Sanitary Department has been touched to the quick by this attitude of general disregard. He is determined that Inspection reports should no longer be regarded as innocuous waste paper, and his fulminations as mere brutum fulmen. This might be creditable to the self-respect of Dr. Lidderdale himself, as well as to his proper regard for the honor of the Department over which he presides. He will be no mere ornamental figure-head any longer. But however creditable may be his resolve, it can only have a chance of success with the aid of that practical good sense the want of which has ruined its prestige in the past years. Traces of this practical good sense are, however, wholly undiscernible in Dr. Lidderdale's new manifesto. The municipality of Serampore, whatever its sanitary defects, may, for argument's sake, be assumed to be, is certainly in no worse state than municipalities in general. In fact, there is no municipality free from insanitary conditions which none, however, can regret more than the Municipal Commissioners themselves. They regret them keenly, and are doing all they can towards their gradual removal. This is the state of things everywhere, and there is no municipality under Lidderdale which will come up to his ideal standard of perfection. Why single out one municipality, then, and pour all the vials of your wrath upon it? Admitting Dr. Lidderdale's statement that the Commissioners have failed to carry out some of his suggestions made in his past report, all the responsibility which could justly attach to the municipality for this failure would be its omission to report the reasons which prevented their being carried out. Even this responsibility, however, it must be exonerated from. The judgment on this point must go against Dr. Lidderdale, from his past condonation of similar neglect on the part of people in general. So far as we know, sanitary recommendations nowhere meet with a different treatment, and Dr. Lidderdale would have acted like a wise man if, instead of resenting one single instance of disregard of his authority in inflammatory language, he had, in the usual course, issued a general circular laying it down as a rule that reports should be furnished to him wherever, from any causes, some of his actual suggestions could not be given effect to. This would have saved his honor, and the municipalities would have set in motion another stream of correspondence to swell the flood of writing which has been all the tangible good the public have derived from the existence of his Department.

That Dr. Lidderdale should have gone out of his way to indulge in sarcasm against the scheme of Local Self-Government, is much to be regretted. It is hardly in keeping with the official position he holds, and we dare say he must be, in his cooler moments, regretting the language into which the heat of passion has betrayed him. But what are we to say of his insane recommendation to the Commissioners to displace a Chairman, who has so deep a hold on their confidence as to have been elected to that office successively for two terms? Who is the Sanitary Commissioner to make such proposal in an official capacity, through the medium of an official document? So far as the law is concerned, he has no legal locus standi, in his relations to municipalities. We really wonder how any man of years and experience could so far demean himself in the way he has done, in his infatuated fulmination against the Chairman of the Serampore Municipality. Is Local Self-Government come to this, that the honored leaders of our urban communities are to meet with such scant courtesy at the hands of any official inquisitors? The other day, a wretched clerk of a Local Auditor held language in respect of another Municipal Chairman for which he ought to have been sent back to a school of manners. Magistrates who are the legal controllers of our Municipal administration, are not often models of gentlemanly demeanour. Dr. Lidderdale, however, has surpassed all in the plain directness of his attack. It is high time the Government intervened. Its officers apparently do not learn from its own affability and courtesy; what could be more delicate, for instance, than Sir Steuart Bayley's allusion to the faction-fights of the Dacca Municipality? Here was the head of the Administration speaking on the same subject—the failure of Local Self-Government, but was he at all rude? Let Sir Steuart teach more plainly, and issue a pamphlet on etiquette for the benefit of his lieutenants.

THE HINDU SHRINE IN BELOOCHISTAN:

A BRAHMACHAREE'S ACCOUNT OF THE PILGRIMAGE.

THERE is little population on the way, only at a few places there are one or two poor sheds. At one of these, they secure a goat and carry it to the Devi. From a distance the temple of Hingláj is seen—a small house on a hill top again. Coming to it they find a small room indeed of unequal unhewn rough stones, with two doors in the front wall apart, with flat roofing of earth, the roof reached by a flight of steps from the outside. There is no human being there, nor habitation nor men nor beast in the surrounding country. At the foot of the hill, however, they had found a woman, the sole tenant of the place, a poor village Mussulmani, to kill their goat, which she jabbed of course. The Guide took the blood and poured it on the hill and broke on it a bottle of the grog they had brought from Kurrachee. They go up to the temple—kapát.

The small room has two doors in two corners of the front wall. The room was shut up from the outside by chains, but not locked. They do not open to see what was in. The Guide told those who had no objection to animal food and fermented or distilled beverages to dress and cook the meat of the goat brought up with them and drink of the remaining liquor in the possession of the party. All were in for it, except four of them, including the two Bengalis, Chandranand Brahmacharee (formerly Chandranath Roy, Srotriya, of Gwari Kishnagar) and Shama Charan

Ray of Satgachi. The majority joyfully dispersed, leaving the Baboos to cook their simple food and have their fill. It was soon over. In the evening, as the Guide told them, they took their seats outside around the temple and waited. There is no idol in the temple or about it. There is no worship or prayer at the place in particular. There is nothing to see or do in particular. So the two Bengali Baboos and another lounged before the temple at one place together. The Guide himself, soon after their arrival, had gone up to the roof. They were curious to learn what he was about. So, although they had been told not to stir out or about, but wait for the appearance of the Devi who came usually towards the latter part of the night, our informant raised his head and peeped. He saw the guide place on the floor of the roof a white cloth and then a red robe and on it female ornaments, cheap jewellery, vermilion, shell bracelets, a looking glass, combs, &c., &c., and mumbled something. All night they thus lay in wait for the manifestation. Not so with the braver souls. Their business of creature comforts would take more time. Again, as Shama Charan said, they must be drinking and making merry after dinner. Accordingly, they themselves might now go to sleep. By the time the bacchanalians might be disposed to go to sleep, they would awake and mount guard as it were. They had collected sticks from the jungle and lighted up several fires, for fear of wild beasts. So they went to sleep. The Guide had gone up on the top of the room, and, after cleaning the place with water from his lota, spread a white sheet, then a red cloth, and over it churi, sanhla, sindur, &c., and mumbled any mantras if he had such. During their sleep, he might have come down to take his food—his share of chapatis from the pilgrim brotherhood—or he had the bread brought up to the roof where he might have eaten. They don't know. He might have gone to sleep on the roof. He was a prudent man—it was a safe position in that night. It was a moonlit night. As the sounds of the orgies died away, our Bengalis got up and sat to listen to Shama Charan's stories. Towards the latter part of the night, they heard a sound like the humming of bees. Immediately, the Guide stood up on the roof and raised the alarm that the Devi was up, and they must get up and be ready. He descended and told all to hurry and bathe in the well. It has been related that at the last stream they crossed,—the Aghori—the Guide had told them to cut teeth-brushes from the low thistle and brush-wood on the banks and asked each man to fix a partner who would be a brother to him in the approaching pilgrimage or a sister. Each set of two enters the temple as brother and sister or as brother and brother. If a man and wife go on the pilgrimage they enter as brother and sister. The operation of brother-making is simple. Each person gets two teeth brushes. One he fixes in the bed of the river, and another he exchanges with another person who has become his brother by giving him his own unused one. Where husband and wife are pilgrims, they exchange teeth brushes with each other, thus constituting themselves for the nonce brother and sister.

The Guide commenced with asking the Brahmacharee (whom he loved and respected as a Brahman and holy man) whom he had exchanged datan with. He gave the name of a Hindustani. (We thought Shama Charan and he would have exchanged the sign of brotherhood. But Shama Charan was his senior by many years and he preferred a Hindustani.) The next question was—Which of you offered the datan first? The answer being that he had first given his datan to the Hindustani, the Guide said then you are senior, you must have precedence. Soon he dipped himself in the well and changed clothes. Before he had well put on his dhoti or robe, the Guide put him in the temple, the door of which he then opened. Having introduced him, he shut one half the door and asked him to deliver his clothes, which was accordingly done. Then his "brother" was sent after him, and in the same way was denuded. Then they were told to proceed through and come out at the right door. So he shut up the door completely against them. It was there pitch dark and oppressive. It was a severe trial. There was no knowing what was in. No one had entered the room before them that day. There might be animals even reptiles. There might be obstructions in the building, which was rough, of mud and unhewn stones which were sticking out and in. With right hand fingering rudraksha beads and poita on the breast and left hand raised over the head and beyond it to feel any obstruction, he tremblingly felt his way, advancing his right foot cautiously first. On the right his body felt a post rather towards the middle of the room, a kind of broken uneven pillar of earth, in avoiding which his left side struck against the pointed stones of the wall. Once he feared what would be his fate if the Guide left them shut up there, but then he remembered there were others outside, sixteen of their companions. So they came out by the other door—and received their clothes.

And the same process was repeated upon the others.

In the morning, they see that they have all been changed in color into the color of infants soon after birth, almost red. Informant, not a fair man but not black or dark for a Bengali, retained this color for a day or a day and a half. The other Babu, who was a very fair man, retained it for some days.

That is all the Tirtha of Hinglaj.

AMATEUR STATESMANSHIP.

INTERESTED as we are in the cause of the Native Press, we cannot help feeling distressed at any grave lapses or ludicrous blunders committed by our brethren of the quill. An instance of the latter kind has just come from the Western Presidency. The Civil and Military Gazette publishes the following telegram from Poona:—

“Mr. Baines, of the Civil Service, has been appointed on special duty in connection with the Crawford case. The Chief of Bhoze has had an interview with some Government officials regarding the case. It is alleged that Mr. Crawford borrowed money from him. It is also stated that the Government is bringing pressure to bear on him in order to effect disclosures. The Natives show strong sympathy towards Mr. Crawford. When he was released on bail, the Brahmans in Poona and Rutnagherry testified their joy. The latter distributed sugar. An orthodox person paid twenty Brahmans to pray for Mr. Crawford. A Native journal warns Government that the public are watching to see if the decision to appoint a Commission be honest or not, and objects to Government officials sitting on it. It suggests that the Commission be composed of the Editors of the Pioneer, Englishman, Statesman, Mirror, and the Amrita Bazar Patrika, and that it be presided over by a Judge of the Calcutta High Court, to supply the requisite legal knowledge.”

That is a characteristic specimen of the intelligence of a section, and that not the least loud, of the Native Press, both English and vernacular. It seems an echo of voices nearer home—of the Mutius Scævolas of the Platform and the Press, who are ready to govern the country through the Indian Association and the National Fund and even prepared to defend India against Russia, with their three hundred brave youths enrolled as Volunteers. There is profound statesmanship in the suggestion of this Western journal. The personnel of the proposed Commission to try Mr. Crawford has been fixed with great discrimination and no end of diplomacy. There is no absence of the appearance of justice, seeing that all parties are represented. Indeed, there is too much appearance of fairplay for the end in view. Three powerful English dailies are juxtaposed to only a couple of Indian prints, one of them a weekly, thus—

The Pioneer
The Englishman
The Statesman

The Indian Mirror
The Amrita Bazar Patrika.

The Indian Daily News is evidently not trusted, and we are neither here nor there. But we protest against the exclusion of the fiery Bengalee. Or, is it too suspected? O tempora! Let our Gifted of the Gab look to his laurels. No Render is already elbowing Surrender Not out of his own.

We wonder why our statesman of the Native Press was not out with his nomination to the Presidency, instead of simply contenting himself with desiring a High Court Judge. Can a better man be found than Mr. Justice Mitter? With him for President and holder of the casting vote, how beautifully the balance would be even and the cause of Justice and Native Politics triumph! Perhaps, the schemer counts upon the Statesman, as in the press so on the Commission, quarrelling with his European colleagues and lending his weight into the opposite scale. The more the merrier! is it not?

What a pity that this nonsense should be transmitted through the telegraph from one part of India to another, to the discredit of the Native Press and the distress of sober Indian patriots! But the greater pity is that this sort of stuff should be carefully composed, set up, and printed and published in any of our newspapers. It is extraordinary that the absurdity and impertinence of such things should not strike their authors.

This Poona writer had not the slightest doubt of the capacity of his nominees for the task to which they were to be appointed. Men who could draft leading articles could do anything short of the miraculous. And why should not critics of Judges make good Judges themselves? That is unanswerable argument, to be sure. But there is another little consideration to which this sapient journalist might in pity for his cloth have paid some heed. Was it possible to get together for such a duty some half a dozen independent gentlemen belonging to an exacting profession? Such is the character of a good deal of amateur native statesmanship. The fact is that, from too long disuse, governing is fast becoming with us one of the lost arts. Hence, we fondly cling to the small measure of local administration our rulers are disposed to humour us with. Hence, we hate the very sound of “annexation,” and are indignant at the intrusion of British officials in Native Administrations.

SELF-GOVERNMENT IN THE SUBURBS.

LOCAL Self-Government seems destined to have no peace. What between enemies abroad and factions at home, it has from the first had a hard time of it. All the more cautious and moderate should our leaders of Self-Government be, under these circumstances. They should remember that they are placed on a trial, on the issue of which hang not their individual interests but the interests of the country—that their power should be turned to the good of the public rather than to their own enjoyment and vain-glory. Their position may expose them to much undeserved opposition or even obloquy, but without allowing this to sour their temper or warp their judgment, they should hold the even tenour of their way, doing their duty according to law and justice. Above all, their conduct should be above the suspicion of being dictated by motives of vindictiveness or self-glorification.

We have been led to this strain of moralising by a report of certain proceedings on the part of the Chairman of the Rajpur Municipality. It would seem that the Rajpur Vernacular School had been for years in the uninterrupted enjoyment of a Municipal grant, and that, in consideration of the usefulness of the institution, neither the present Board nor its predecessor had ever thought of withdrawing the grant. Since the late elections, however, the personal relations between the Secretary of the school and the present Chairman have been somewhat strained, and the Secretary is no longer a persona grata to the head of the Municipality and his party in the Board. The existence of parties is a matter of public notoriety at Rajpur, and there is no use ignoring the fact. The School Secretary appears to have made himself prominent by his opposition to the election of the present Chairman and incurred his enmity. At any rate, our information is to the effect that the Chairman secretly meditated vengeance upon the School, and at the last budget meeting brought forward a motion for the withdrawal of its grant. The usefulness of the School, however, prevailed, and the Chairman was outvoted. But he, rather than learn wisdom from this discomfiture, was not prepared to be baulked of his object. At the next meeting, he came better prepared, and reopened the question. Here again the votes were against him, but, with the exercise of a species of high-handedness for which there is no parallel, he disallowed one of the Commissioner-friends of the School from giving his vote, on the curious ground that in the speech which he made a slight error of fact had inadvertently crept in. He wanted to withdraw the particular remark, but he was not permitted to do so, nor was his vote counted. Even now, the votes were equal on both sides, and the Chairman was of course in an indecent haste to give his casting vote and carry the day. We wonder there is so little knowledge about us of the responsibility implied in the exercise of this great privilege, and it is exercised so often without any sense of the responsibility—in mere lightness of heart, nay, a spirit of braggadocio. It is always a situation of delicacy to have to give the casting vote, and no Chairman who realizes the moral responsibility it involves, or even possessed of practical prudence, but would gladly escape from the situation by declining to give the vote, and put off the discussion for a fresh ballot. It may be pleasant enough to be thrust into a position of authority, and proceed according to the forms of constitutional government. But the forms are never truly learnt unless one goes beyond the letter to their spirit. The Chairman has apparently been unwise enough to give a handle to his enemies who may, with good reason, say he has been led by private feelings in the matter. If he had any public reasons for his proposal for the abolition of the School grant, the way in which he has gone about the matter hardly shows this. At all events, it was not proper to reopen a question of the kind so soon after it had been deliberately closed to deny the right of voting to a Commissioner on such a flimsy pretence.

• We understand the aggrieved party in the Board having laid the matter before the District Magistrate, Mr. Bolton has quashed the proceedings, on the ground of the irregularity of the exclusion of the rejected vote.

THE ANTI-CONGRESS WAVE IN BEHAR.

Patna, Sept. 10.

A rather novel public meeting was held yesterday in the Patna College, which is for some time being used for all sorts of school boy meetings. I doubt whether the College authorities are aware of the character of such gatherings, and the subjects which are discussed there. There is an association of the Mahomedan school boys named Anjumani-Islami, the meetings of which ordinarily take place in the College on Sundays, and in which preachers and Moulvies are invited to discourse and preach on religious subjects for the moral and religious instruction of the boys. Preachers of every denomination are invited to lecture and preach here on the above subjects. Yesterday (Sunday), as usual, people went to hear the preaching, and, to their great surprise and mortification, they found the Government pleader, a Mahomedan Khan Bahadur, delivering a speech against the National Congress. The Municipal Vice-Chairman, M. S. Fazley Imam Khan Bahadur occupied the chair and the junior Khan Bahadur Kazi Saheb was said to have been armed with a letter of advice or instruction from the veteran and venerable Sir Syud the Commander-in-Chief of the anti-Congress agitation in N. W. P. It was whispered among well-informed persons in the meeting that, at the suggestion of the old gentleman, this young association of the young men was utilised for the purpose of carrying out a partizan political object. The three Khan Bahadurs took the most leading part in the proceedings. All who went to hear a religious discourse or lecture, were quite surprised when they saw the pulpit changed to a political platform and heard things of which they could understand little or nothing. As far as I know, the object of this meeting was not advertised or mentioned in the invitation card. Everything was done by keeping the public in the dark. After this anti-Congress business was over, the preacher or the Moulvie addressed the meeting on some religious subject. Most people who are supporters of this young association were much disgusted by the underhand means by which these inexperienced young men were prevailed upon by their elders to lend the help of their religious association to a political agitation. The speeches addressed to the meeting were miserably poor and repeated some of the oft-repeated arguments of the old Syud Saheb—none of the speakers appeared to have been prepared with his subject or to have studied it properly. They spoke something at random, depreciating the Congress. What has become of the branch N. M. Association at Patna, and why was not a meeting of that branch Association called to protest against the Congress or to ascertain the views of the Mahomedans of this place about it? Is its use now confined only to enlarging the lists of so-called branches in the addresses to Governors and memorials to Government? Why was not that Association utilized for its proper object? This clearly shews that there is something rotten in the state of Denmark. If that Association is in need of the help and influence of schoolboys, the Nationalists ought to be ashamed of the great fuss they always make of representing the Mahomedan community. Was it fair to utilize a religious association of the boys in this way? It is a great mistake to mix up schoolboys in political agitations and give them a taste for things for which they are not intellectually prepared. For these reasons, many young men are neglecting their studies, and the college authorities are better aware of it than an outsider. These gentlemen are quite welcome to hold any meeting which they think proper, but they should not use such childish means to give a representative character to the meetings and divert the attention of the students from their studies. Yesterday's meeting has done more harm than good to the cause for which it was held and also to the Anjuman-i-Islam. Politics has already spoiled a large number of schoolboys in Calcutta and other parts of Bengal, and it has been doing great harm to the students here. Parents are receiving complaints against their children who are in the schools. The college authorities ought to watch what the boys discuss at their clubs and meetings, and should not make the college hall a platform for party politics and abusive and sensational speeches, for which there are many places in the town. Although almost all the leading Mussulmans of Patna are against the Congress, they highly deprecate such tactics to gain their political object as was tried in imposing the anti-Congress movement upon the young students' Association. Such a step betrays the weakness of the cause of the agitators, and should not have been taken.

It is now high time that the thoughtful and leading men of our society should take lesson from the painful experience of their Hindoo brethren in dealing with their young men who are receiving a Western education. The best course is that these should be left alone until they have completed their education and obtained a due sense of responsibility of their own actions, conduct and views. It is dangerous to encourage them to join political agitations or to discuss freely on social customs and usages, and thus directly and indirectly criticise the conduct of their guardians and the elders of the community. If the boys are treated and recognized as members of society, and their opinions on public questions are asked, their heads are turned and they attach an amount of importance to themselves which is not only unbecoming but offensive, and they grow disrespectful to their superiors and the authorities. The other day a school-boy protested against his father having a mutâ or nikkâ and was so impertinent as to argue with some of his elder relations on the point. I hope that the so called leading Mahomedans of Patna will spare the schoolboys for the future and carry on their political campaign unassisted by these untrained young soldiers.

SHAN STATES BILL.

The Hon'ble Mr. Scoble, in moving for leave to introduce the Bill, spoke as follows:—

“Among the territories formerly governed by King Thebaw which, by the Proclamation of 1st January, 1886, were declared to have become part of Her Majesty's dominions, were several groups of Shan States, a few lying to the west of the Irrawaddy, and some beyond the Salween, but most of them occupying the great Shan plateau between those two rivers. These States, upwards of seventy in number, large and small, have an aggregate area of over 40,000 square miles, and contain a population estimated at two millions. Under the Burmese Government, their administration seems to have been left in the hands of their own Chiefs or Sawbwas, with but little interference so long as the due amount of tribute was regularly paid.

“After the fall of Mandalay, letters were sent to the Shan Chiefs telling them that the British Government did not desire to interfere with their autonomy so long as they kept the peace, paid the usual moderate tribute, and abstained from fighting with each other. Accordingly, my learned predecessor, Mr. Herbert, in presenting the Upper Burma Laws Bill to this Council in September, 1886, remarked:—

“There is no present intention of importing British law into the Shan States, and therefore we have excluded those States from the operation of the laws which we declare in force in Upper Burma, merely reserving a power, which may possibly be useful hereafter, to introduce into any portion of those States such laws, if any, as may be required.”

“During the two years which have elapsed since this Bill became law considerable progress has been made in the settlement of the relations between the Shan States and the British Government; and the object of the measure which I now ask leave to introduce is to put these relations upon a legal basis. Its main feature is to vest the administration of civil and criminal justice and the collection of the revenue within each State in the person for the time being recognised by the Government as the Chief of the State, subject to such conditions as the Government may prescribe; and to provide that, until varied by the introduction of British law, the law to be administered in a Shan State shall be the customary law of the State in so far as that law is in accordance with justice, equity and good conscience, and the punishments which may be awarded thereunder, or the practices which are permitted thereby, are in conformity with the spirit of the law in force in the rest of British India.

“The system thus introduced carries out the traditional policy of the Government of India. When a territory has newly come under our administration, and is not ripe for the introduction of the more perfect system which prevails in our older provinces, we have not introduced it. ‘To govern the people through their native Chiefs,’ as Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone well observes in his Report on the Territories conquered from the Peshwa, ‘is the only one practicable plan until the gradual effects of civilization have produced their natural results.’ ‘The plan,’ he adds, ‘has many obvious and palpable defects, and many more will no doubt appear when its operations are fully observed. It has this advantage that it leaves unimpaired the institutions, the opinions and the feelings that have hitherto kept the community together, and that, as its fault is meddling too little, it may be gradually remedied by interfering when urgently required.’ It makes no great changes, either real or apparent, in the laws, and it leads to no revolution in the state of property. The established practice also, though it be worse than another proposed in its room, will be less grievous to the people, who have accommodated themselves to the present defects and are scarcely aware of their existence; while every fault in a new system, and perhaps many things that are not faults, would be severely felt for the want of this adaptation.'

"Working upon the lines thus laid down by one of the wisest of Indian statesmen the Bill empowers the Local Government, with the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council,—

- to appoint officers to take part in the administration of civil and criminal justice and the collection of the revenue within any Shan State into which it may be desirable to introduce British agency ;
- to define the powers and regulate the procedure of the officers so appointed ;
- to direct by what authority any jurisdiction, power or duty incident to the operation of any British law that may be introduced into the State is to be exercised or performed ; and
- to modify the customary law of the State in so far as, in the opinion of the Local Government, that law is not in accordance with justice, equity and good conscience, or authorises punishments, or permits practices, which are essentially repugnant to civilized ideas.

"These powers will be exercised, as regards the Shan States generally, only when the occasion for putting them in force is imperatively demonstrated ; but there is a collection of petty States, called the Myelat, or middleland, between Burma proper and the Shan plateau, in regard to which, though it may not be desirable to introduce direct British administration, it is necessary to make immediate provision for the establishment of the British Government as the direct controlling authority. Under the Burmese régime, these petty States had a certain independence in the management of their internal affairs, but in all important matters were subject to the orders of the Government at Mandalay. Section 6 of the Bill will enable the Chief Commissioner to exercise in the Myelat the powers formerly possessed by the King of Burma ; and it is hoped that by carefully regulating, watching, and as opportunity occurs improving, the existing methods of local government, he may be able to render the Myelat an example which the other Shan States may be spontaneously glad to follow."

Important News for India,
WHERE FEVERS AND CHOLERA
REIGN SUPREME.

A RECENT TRAVELLER ON THE Chinese Coast found that District remarkably FREE FROM TYPHOID FEVER and CHOLERA. He soon discovered the cause. The people there do not drink cold water from tanks or wells, often extremely impure, but keep a pan of water constantly boiling, into which from time to time they drop a little Tea, and when thirsty THEY DRINK HOT TEA ! If the weak and adulterated Teas of China can do this, what may not the pure and strong Teas of India be expected to effect ?

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a represen-

ation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? No, the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINI DASSY (Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohini's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

NATURE.

How graceful was that Grecian creed
Which taught that tongues, of old,
Dwelt in the mountain and the mead,
And where the torrent roll'd ;
And that in times of sacred fear,
With sweet mysterious moans,
They spoke aloud, while some pale seer
Interpreted their tones.*

II.

And, Lady, why should we not deem
That in each echoing hill,
And sounding wood, and dancing stream,
A language lingers still ?
No lovelier scenes round Delphi spread
Than round thee stretch divine ;
Nor Grecian maid bent brighter head
By haunted stream than thine.

III.

Then fancy thus that to thine ear,
While dies the autumn day,
The Voices of the Woodlands bear
This tributary lay.
Soft winds that steal from where the moon
Brightens the mountain spring,
Shall blend with Mulla's † distant tune,
And these the words they sing :—

1.

"Thou'st shared our thousand harmonies ;
At morn thy sleep we stirr'd
With sounds from many a balmy breeze,
And many a jocund bird ;
And far from us, when pleasure's lure Around thy steps shall be,
Ah, keep thy soul as freshly pure
As we came pure to thee !

2.

"At noon, beneath September's heat,
Was it not sweet to feel,
Through shadowy grasses at thy feet,
Our silver water steal ?
Sparklingly clear, as now the truth
Seems in thy glance to glow ;
So may, through worldly crowds, thy youth
A stainless current flow.

* Although the allusion refers, in the verses, to Delphi, it was, I think, at Dodona, in the earliest period of oracular influence, that this belief prevailed.

† "And Mulla mine, whose waves whilome I taught to weep."—Spenser.

3.

"At eve, our hills for thee detain'd
The sun's departure bright.
He sank—how long our woods were stain'd
For thee with rosy light !
The worth, the warmth, the peace serene,
Thou'st known our vales among,
Say, shall they be reflected seen
Upon thy heart as long ?

4.

"Morn, noon and eve—bird, beam and breeze,
Here blent to bless thy day ;
May portion of their memories
Be ever round thy way !
Sweet waters for the weary bark,
Through parching seas that sails ;
Friends may grow false and fortune dark,
But Nature never fails."

THOUGHT AND DEED.

Full many a light thought man may cherish
Full many an idle deed may do ;
Yet not a deed or thought shall perish,
Not one but he shall bless or rue.

When by the wind the tree is shaken,
There's not a bough or leaf can fall,
But of its falling heed is taken
By One that sees and governs all.

The tree may fall and be forgotten,
And buried in the earth remain ;
Yet from its juices rank and rotten*
Springs vegetating life again.

The world is with creation teeming,
And nothing ever wholly dies ;
And things that are destroyed in seeming,
In other shapes and forms arise.

And nature still unfolds the tissue
Of unseen works by spirit wrought ;
And not a work but hath its issue
With blessings or with evil fraught.

And thou may'st seem to leave behind thee
All memory of the sinful past ;
Yet oh, be sure thy sin shall find thee,
And thou shall know its fruits at last.

COMPENSATION AND CONTENTMENT.

To quench its cravings ;—till the draught shall seem Pleasant and soothing as a happy dream.
Though sometimes God's redeemed and loved may lay
In abject poverty, yet day by day
He feeds them, as He feeds the little bird,
Whose grateful song the forest's heart hath stirred.
Each day is food provided—~~from~~ the morrow,
No useless cause of added grief they borrow ;
But seeing everywhere their Father's works,
Where'er an insect sports or blossom lurks,— Viewing His tender, ceaseless care for those,
They look to Him in hope through want and woes.
Has not the little bee a draught as sweet*
From the bright flower that springs beneath our feet,
As the tall stag, through acres free to stray,
From the broad river rushing on its way ?
Canst thou not slake thy burning thirst as well
From a full cup as where clear waters swell
O'er marble basins, at whose sculptured brink,
With golden chalice, wealth may stoop to drink ?
Be thou contented only, and thou'lt be,
With but thine herbs and brook, more rich than he
Who pineth 'midst his luxury and pride,
For some poor trifle to his grasp denied.

“The general distribution of the rainfall of the week was on the whole, similar to that which has characterized the present monsoon hitherto. Over the greater part of Burmah, Bengal, the North-Western Provinces, and the West Coast the total rainfall up to date is in excess of the average, whilst in the Punjab, the Central Provinces, and the Peninsula generally it is more or less in defect, the deficiency being most marked in some parts of the Bombay and Madras Deccan, Hyderabad, Mysore, and Coorg.”

THERE was a serious fire at Hamburg. It originated in a sugar refinery with explosion of a petroleum lamp. Ten persons were burnt to death, and large quantities of cotton, saltpetre, matches, sugar, wines, spirits, palm oil and 30 barges laden with coal were destroyed. The total loss of property is given at nearly five millions. The English insurance offices suffer most, namely, the Commercial Union £99,000, the London £250,000 and the Phoenix £300,000. This petroleum is a dangerous nuisance, and the nations will yet wake to the necessity of checking its indiscriminate consumption and careless storage.

Holloway's excellent preparations are effective singly, resistless in combination, and have been recommended by grateful patients to be resorted to as alteratives when all other means of regaining health have failed. Their action is temperate, not violent or reducing.

"A marine brake has been invented by M. Pagan, and was recently tested on the Seine. It consists of a cable, having attached to it a series of canvas cones, which open out by the action of the water, and exert an enormous retarding force on the vessel. WE read in an English trade journal:—

"Messrs. Davies, Codner, and Company, of 175, Upper Street, E.C., and Bromley-by-Bow, are about embarking in a new manufacture, which promises to become a very important branch of the steel industry and a powerful rival of corrugated iron in the construction of buildings. The invention comes to us from Belgium, and is known as the 'Danly' system of patent steel buildings. It is the outcome of many years' experimenting by Mr. G. Danly, manager of the Société Anonyme des Forges, at Aiseau. The object of the inventor has been to do away with the many objectionable features which are inseparable from the present use of corrugated iron as a constructive material. In the first place, corrugated iron buildings are extremely unsightly, as usually constructed; and, in fact, the material in that form does not lend itself to any great degree of ornamental use or variety in design. Secondly, this class of buildings, though furnishing a comparatively secure protection against fire from without, rather increases than diminishes the risk of total destruction in the case of fires originating within the building. They consist merely of wooden structures, covered externally with a shell of galvanised iron, and an internal fire feeds upon the woodwork, heating the iron shell, and speedily turns the structure into a furnace. Thirdly, they are unstable in gales of wind. Fourthly, there is a lack of ventilation usually; and, in fact, a proper system of ventilation is not easily effected with the use of this material. In torrid climates, particularly, corrugated iron structures are often found intolerably hot and stifling, preventing a free circulation of air and becoming at times almost uninhabitable. Mr. Danly has aimed to correct all these shortcomings by employing steel as a material of construction. By beginning with a unit of construction and making all parts multiples of the dimensions of this unit he has been able to produce not only one but a great variety of designs, all built up of parts bearing this definite arithmetical relation to each other. Each piece is a stamped steel plate, with relieved surfaces, giving to the face a resemblance to cut stone panelling. These panels, which have perpendicular flanges at their edges, are laid in horizontal courses, and tied together with flat iron ties interposed between the courses. Holes of uniform gauge are punctured in the flanges, so that marking or numbering of the pieces is wholly unnecessary, and to make the joint impervious to rain the lower flanges are bent over them, thus making the joints watertight. To secure desirable architectural variety different models or units of construction are employed, so that any desired style of architectural combination which occurs in wall construction can be obtained, columns, architraves, lintels, &c., being produced with remarkable fidelity. If the ground is level, no preparation of foundation is required for these buildings. Two rigid [shaped iron frames, securely tied, form the base, and the building is placed directly upon the ground. Stamped metal sheets bolted to the lower wings of iron beams form the ceiling, which can be made sufficiently strong to support a fire-proof flooring. Ventilation is made as nearly perfect as can be by utilising the hollow spaces between the walls, to which the air in the rooms obtains access through holes in the skirting. This hollow ventilating space serves to prevent the outer cold penetrating the rooms in the winter or the excessive heat in the summer. By connecting the air spaces between the walls with the smoke flues of the chimneys a most effective ventilation is obtained, the circulation having a velocity of about three feet a second. Air inlets with regulating devices are also provided for each room. The chimney-pieces are constructed also of metal plates, having the usual shape of marble chimneys. Mr. Davies, the senior member of Messrs. Davies, Codner and Company, has been giving special pains to an exhaustive examination of this invention, and, as a result, his firm has, as we have already intimated, made arrangements to begin the manufacture of the 'Danly' steel buildings in Great Britain, for which the plant is to be laid down as soon as possible."

THE experiment of growing ipecacuanha in the Neilgiris has succeeded. At the close of 1887, there were 5,000 plants in stock, and of 500 planted at Nellumpore, only three died.

THE Press Commissioner sends us the following communiqué:—

"The appointment which Captain F. Beauclerk, late R.E., has obtained in Hyderabad is that of Private Secretary to the Nawab Munir-ul-Mulk Bahadur. His services have been obtained in order to assist the Nawab in the management of his Estates. Captain Beauclerk has not been made Private Secretary to Sir Salar Jung."

We should think not. Is not Mr. Moreton Fiewen Private Secretary to Sir Salar Jung? He has done nothing to be superseded, beyond addressing some officious letters to certain quarters. As for ability, he is hump of it. Captain Beauclerk is also an accomplished penman and is very well connected. But Mr. Fiewen is a nephew of Lord Randolph Churchill and has already done Sir Salar yeoman's service. He wrote young Jung's articles for the Nineteenth Century. Above all, it was he who forced public attention to the late Hyderabad scandals. He had gone home on the same errand we believe, and is now back.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE high level railway through the Bolan Pass has been completed, thus connecting Quetta by two broad-gauge routes with the Indus Valley system.

REUTER'S Telegram dated Teheran 10th September stating that Sudar Ishak Khan is marching on Kabul and that the Ameer is lying ill, gives a false impression of the actual situation in Afghanistan. According to the latest intelligence, Ishak Khan was at Khanabad, and the troops which he had sent forward in the direction of Kabul had not crossed the confines of his own province. At Khamard on the northern slopes of the Hindu Kush they were confronted by the Ameer's troops and defeated. The Ameer in his latest report announces that the Fort of Khamard has been taken, that several officers have been taken prisoners, and that among the prisoners is Ishak Khan's father-in-law. With regard to the Ameer's health, His Highness has of late more than once suffered from gout, but he has written to say that his illness was not serious, and that he has now recovered.—Press Commissioner.

The Pioneer is in a position to add that a force of Ishak's—infantry regiments, 2 cavalry troops and 4 guns—retired on the capture of the fort. Since, there has been no fighting.

ACCORDING to a report which has reached the Times of India from London, the question of the Burmah Ruby Mines has at last been settled, Messrs. Rothschild and Messrs. Streeter having united their interests, and sold the lease of the mines to the syndicate, which is to work them, for a profit of £300,000 over and above what they are to pay the Government. That is too vague for comment. In fact, it strikes us as an unbusinesslike statement. Messrs. Streeter had originally offered to Government only four lacs.

THE system of money-order for revenue purposes, generally introduced in April 1887 in these provinces, has indeed been successful. The total revenue thus paid during the past year amounted to Rs. 2,07,156, by 47,248 orders. The Districts of Chittagong, Mozufferpore, Dacca and Furreedpore largely availed themselves of the convenience. From the current official year, the system has been made "applicable to all estates, irrespective of the amount of their land revenue, and to include remittances of Zemindari dak cess, as well as land revenue and road and public works cess. It has also been ruled that other public demands may be paid at the option of the payer by ordinary postal orders, provided the particulars given are sufficient for the department concerned."

Up to date, the payment of rent under the Tenancy Act, by money-order, has been sanctioned for only one village in Howrah.

Is the continuance of the Zemindari dak cess justified by present circumstances. Is there any separate establishment not covered by the great Post Office?

MR. JAMES MONRO, C. B., formerly of the Bengal Civil Service, has resigned his office of Assistant Commissioner of the London Police. He could not pull well with his Chief. Ziddees, to express in our Indian parlance, never do. Two self-willed, opinionative men on the same business can at best be but like parallels in asymptote never meeting in harmony though ever so much disposed to unite in the common object: sooner or later they fall out and are compelled to part. There was another cause perhaps, for the strained relations between the two. The Chief of the Metropolitan Force was apt to regard himself at the head of his regiment, and he had never had an Indian Civil Servant under him, while the Assistant could not forget that he had been a ruler of millions.

LONG lists of Oriental names are a sore trial to printers and even editors. Accordingly, notwithstanding our knowledge of the language and subject concerned and the care we took in publishing the complete Lists of the Life Pensions and of the Gratuities granted to the servants of the late King of Oudh, we were not without fear of having overlooked some errors. Considering the vital importance of the matter to those concerned—the mischief that might be caused to parties by the omission of names or misnaming of parties or mistake in the figures—we had cause for anxiety: our benevolent object in procuring and publishing the Lists would then have miscarried. We are relieved to find that our publication has stood the test. Garden Reach has found only literal fault with some of the names. Even that fault is not so much ours as that of the Government offices. But there has been no injury to any one because no difficulty in identifying the names. Substantially our Lists have been found correct. One mistake, such as it is, has been discovered, and we hasten to correct it. In our List, Munshi Ather Ali, English Assistant, Khas Dufar, stands for a pension of Rs. 15. He, in reality, is entitled to and has got a monthly pension of Rs. 15-5-4. We have seen the pension roll.

WE are glad to be able to announce that the orders of Government have at length been carried out and Moulvie Abdul Jubbar, Deputy Collector, Alipore, has received charge of the disbursement of the Oudh pensions.

WE have received the Report on education in the Central Provinces for 1887-88. It is the last report, after a quarter of a century's all but continuous connection with the province, by Mr. Browning now on the eve of his retirement from the service. Mr. Browning was appointed Inspector-General of education in the Central Provinces in 1863, and has been in charge of the Department since that year to the present date, with the exception of a short service as Director of Public Instruction in Oudh. The benefit of keeping an officer long in charge of one jurisdiction has been markedly conspicuous in the present case. Mr. Browning is personally beloved and esteemed by the people throughout the province, and the healthy influence exercised by him in advancing a cause which in the main must look to private effort for its expansion, must have been great. The progress of education, as disclosed by the Report, appears to be quite satisfactory. It is no small thing that a comparatively backward region like the Central Provinces should be at last competing at all the higher examinations of the University, with the single exception of the M. A. In 1887-88, for the first time, there were successful competitors at the examinations of L. C. E. (Engineering) and L. L. B. (Law). The number of Schools and Colleges, with that of students attending them, as well as the total expenditure from various funds, also bear testimony to the advance which education is making in the province.

IT is extraordinary that, at a time when so much sympathy is felt for the condition of women in this country and any case of oppression on an individual member of the fair sex is sure to rouse public indignation, there should be in our midst, within hailing distance of Police and Courts, a Hindu lady undergoing no end of petty annoyance and tyranny. Indeed, the peculiarity of her grievance—the despair of her situation—is that she is the victim of judicature and lawyers. We refer to Soorij Coomaree Beebee, whose name may be familiar to those who attend to the proceedings of the High Court. The other day she was disappointed in her latest pursuit of her right of precedence to the estate of her deceased husband's brother under the law of her sect—her disappointment scarcely tempered by the equivocal suggestion of the Court to her to launch, if she could or would, in another sea of litigation. Our object here, however, is not to criticise the action of the Court in the late case or others of the same kind that, always under advice of Pundits and lawyers, Eastern and Western, she had engaged herself in. The Court's will be done, whatever it be! We come not to arraign judges but to pity the woman. Whatever the law may be or the dictum of the courts thereon, surely men might be expected to treat the poor widow with some consideration. Ever since we heard of this unfortunate litigation, we heard that she was being kept in a sort of vile durance. We said nothing about it all the time, as we hoped the result of the litigation then going on must, whether she lost or won, free her. We regret to learn that it has proved otherwise. Her condition is not a whit improved. She is still virtually a prisoner in her house, where she is subjected to many annoyances and indignities. Her triumphant foes pursue to mean lengths their substantial advantage over a respectable lady unable to appear in public. Her adopted son Puddum Chand has been taken away from her, and she is not permitted to speak to her friends. And there is practically no help for her, unless the public come to the rescue. It is peculiarly a case in which independent men of influence might with propriety inquire and see whether such a wrong is passing under their nose.

Confinement within doors is so natural to ladies of her standing that Soorooj Coomari Beebee can, we suppose, scarcely feel the surveillance under which she is kept, except when the fact is forcibly brought to her notice by her inability to consult her friends or go to worship at the temple without leave or a good deal of harry. But she has other troubles. She is not allowed to forget her situation. Her enemies take every mean advantage of her position as a veiled lady within their power. And they are assisted by the lawyers. If nothing comes out of it, she is put to expenses—lawyers' costs and so forth. And now in view of the Festive season approaching and the Long Vacation already begun, they have withheld her maintenance. She receives under her husband's will Rs. 200 per mensem. This is not paid regularly month by month as it should be, but after much seeking, the amount due for some months is paid. And so from time to time. There was no denial, however. Thus it has been paid for these two years. Thus it was to have been paid now, too. The attorney for the parties promised to pay, but made some objections about costs. This difficulty was disposed of to his satisfaction, and he called for the Receipt before paying. The Receipt was given, but at the last hour, he has refused to pay. And why? Because Puddum Chand is not with the mother and they doubted whether she was entitled to maintenance at the rate of Rs. 200 under the circumstance! The attorney, of course, pleads, as attorneys always do, instructions, but the attorney is everything in the matter. And it is a great shame that the poor lady should be harassed in this way, at a time she has need of all the money she can scrape to support herself and when she cannot establish her right and get her dues within six months and without much expense.

A RANGOON correspondent of a contemporary thus writes of Mr. Moylan :—

"This barrister is a terror and scourge to the province, because as literary and official artist his touches are not always very true, and he has no fear of man before his eyes; consequently the ideas of the Home papers on Burmese subjects, persons, and politics, are a good deal distorted and untrue. As I write this I tremble, as most, if not all, officials here do, lest I should be detected in my real individuality and punished by some scathing information against my official character being sent to the Home papers which might lead to the rising of misguided ire in the bosom of Lord Cross and to my sudden suspension or retirement. Nevertheless, I cannot forbear telling you of the universal chuckling generally behind the hand, hat, or handkerchief, or in the sleeve, but hearty notwithstanding, at a snub lately administered to this gentleman by the Recorder on Monday last with reference to certain remarks he had made in Court. 'The remarks were a reflection on the Bench, and must be withdrawn and apologised for.' Our friend endeavoured to slip out of what he had said in a way he has, but the Recorder had notes taken at the time, and he would not allow them to be contradicted, and 'the words his Honor ruled he had used' were withdrawn and apologised for, not at all too soon. For years it has been known that Home opinions have been greatly influenced by the Times' telegrams from Burma. The power wielded by the Times' correspondent is naturally immense, and as this 'vehement and passionate advocate often does not weigh his words sufficiently, it is very well he should be taught that he must do so.'"

This official poltroon is scarcely an honour to the British race. But the frank avowal of his shame and the shame of his class is useful in showing how little chance Mr. Moylan had of justice from the officers in Burma, Civil or Military, judicial or executive. It discloses the true motive for the dead set against him. It is plain enough that the Mutual Accommodation and Admiration Society in that country have not yet forgiven the independent Times Correspondent's scathing exposure of how the British made war and how they governed in Burma. The Civil Administrative staff of the Province cannot afford to have light let in on the doings of its members, any more than could the Commanders in the field.

HER MAJESTY'S High Court of Bombay is tender towards the manly British sport of cricket. An appointment for a match has just been virtually admitted as a satisfactory reason for being spared attendance on a jury. At the Criminal Sessions, on the 10th instant, one of the G. I. P. Railway Cricket Club eleven champions, Mr. T. Rhenius, appeared to a summons but applied to be released as the match was to come off that very day :—

"This novel excuse occasioned no little laughter in court, and Mr. Justice Bayley, who was highly amused, said that in the whole course of his experience he never heard such an excuse put forward. He, however, told the ardent cricketer to stand aside, and promised that if a panel could be completed without him, he would be discharged for the day. Mr. Inverarity, however, solved the difficulty entirely by challenging Mr. Rhenius, who left the court in high spirits."

BEFORE Mr. Justice Bayley and a common jury, at the Bombay Criminal Sessions, Sakharan Dhonee, a Hindoo, aged 22, was charged with having, on the 23rd June last, voluntarily caused grievous hurt to his wife, by cutting off her nose. He pleaded guilty, under grave provocation. His case was that he had spent Rs. 500 in marrying the woman Krishna. She had been continually giving offence, notwithstanding all his exhortations. She would not stay with him, and had, to his certain knowledge, adulterous intercourse with other men. At last he punished her by cutting off her nose. He hoped for the mercy of the court.

In passing sentence on the prisoner, Mr. Justice Bayley said :—

"Succaram Dhonee, from the statement which you made before the committing magistrate, it appears that you considered you had reason to doubt your wife's fidelity, and that you inflicted on her a trial of ordeal by making her take a pice out of a pot of boiling oil. As a matter of course her fingers were scalded in so doing, and this you considered conclusive proof of her unchastity. You then proceeded in the presence of your relatives to tie her hands and feet with a dhotur, and then taking a razor from off a shelf, cut off her nose. This habit of nose cutting is unfortunately very prevalent, and it was only yesterday that a man was convicted and sent to jail for inflicting cuts on a woman's face by attempting to cut her nose off. This habit of mutilating their wives is one which the lower classes of this country are unfortunately greatly addicted to, and as far as the courts are concerned, every effort is made to stop it. You are liable for this offence to be transported for the term of your natural life. I trust that the sentence which you will now receive will deter people from mutilating their wives in the manner you have mutilated yours. The sentence of the court on you is that you be transported for ten years."

WE find we were hasty in announcing that Babu Saheb Jadon had been appointed to the Presidency pro tem at Gwalior. Our own information was that the matter was under consideration, though the public expectation in the State pointed to such an arrangement. But the Anrita Bazar Patrika's correspondent having since announced the officiating appointment as having been made by the Agent, Governor-General, before leaving, we thought we might accept it. But we have been deceived. There is no President yet, acting or permanent.

MR. HENVEY has returned from Simla, but the decision of Government as regards the Presidency in the Gwalior Regency is not yet announced. It has been vacant for sometime, and the silence of our Foreign Office is interpreted as boding no good to the State. The most natural thing would be to appoint the senior member, if he is not otherwise incapacitated. It would indeed be a dangerous thing for Gwalior and the other native States, if the Resident were made President. In the present instance, it will never do. The present members reject such an idea, and we shall not wonder if, in such an event, they gave up their respective places, and retired to their own estates.

WE have already mentioned Babu Saheb Jadon as the one man on whom all eyes in Gwalior, but those of candidates and partisans, are fixed as the fittest for the chief office. The history of the country points in the same direction. We give an extract from a vernacular letter :—

"When Jeyaji Rao Scindhia succeeded to the Guddee in 1844, at the age of 8 or 9 years, Ram Rao Baba Phalkah administered the Government. After him, Babu Saheb Jadon's father, Bhau Saheb Jadon, held charge for 4 or 5 years. The British Government was highly satisfied with his administration, and he died whilst holding the office of Prime Minister. He was esteemed both by the British Government and the Gwalior State. After his death, Bhau Fatah Navis succeeded. Next to him came Dinkar Rao, who was superseded by Balaji Chumnaji. After him, came Gunput Rao Khudkay. Bhau Saheb Jadon was the maternal uncle of Maharaja Jeyaji Rao Scindhia, besides being a very close relation of the late Maharaja on his father's side. The late Maharaja married the daughter of Babu Saheb Jadon. This lady is the mother of the present minor Maharaja. Up to the moment of his death, the late Maharaja was highly pleased with Babu Saheb Jadon, in fact, his late Highness was anxious that the administration of the State after his death should be entrusted to Babu Saheb Jadon; but as Raja Gunput was then in office, the wish of the Maharaja could not be carried out. After the Maharaja's death, the British Government, to partially give effect to those wishes and in appreciation of his high character and his antecedents and his position in the State, appointed Babu Saheb Jadon as the guardian of the Minor Maharaja and of his mother the Dowager Maharanee, as well as the first member in the Council of Regency. The education and bringing up of the minor Maharaja are entirely under the supervision of Babu Saheb Jadon, and he is almost always with the minor Maharaja. The Dowager Maharanee, the Resident, and Dr. Crofts are all satisfied with the manner of his looking after the young Maharaja's education and health. The young Maharaja too is much attached to Babu Saheb Jadon."

THE London Society journal Truth of the 30th August has the following paragraph :—

"Mr. Rider Haggard has been accused of plagiarism nearly as often as was Dumas, but the last 'coincidence' in his work, which has been discovered is a truly remarkable one and will require a good deal of explaining away. It is pointed out by Edinburgh and New York journals that in one of Mr. Haggard's latest stories there are many passages which have been 'conveyed,' to use Sir Walter Scott's phrase almost word for word from Charles Aubert, who also furnished the plot. The Edinburgh Despatch prints parallel passages which show that Mr. Haggard appropriated not merely Aubert's ideas, but also his language. I recommend Mr. Haggard to adopt as his motto the unabashed avowal of Moliere, 'Je prends tout bien ou je le trouve,' and he may console himself by reflecting that Virgil, Racine, Corneille, Voltaire, Shakespeare, Sheridan, Balzac, Sterne, Lord Beaconsfield, Lord Brougham and Lamartine were all plagiarists, to which distinguished list Mahtaulay's name may be added, for his 'New Zealander' was certainly taken from Horace Walpole's traveller from Lima."

Notwithstanding the staggering string of names of great masters of prose or verse, at home or abroad, the acquaintance of these smart London men of letters with their own grand literature is neither deep nor wide. We certainly did not expect that the veteran Labouchere's own paper, the brilliant Truth, should talk of "conveyed" as "Sir Walter Scott's phrase." It is not a phrase but a word, to begin with. And that word is not Scott's. It is Shakespeare's. Every schoolboy knows it. Even in this country, the Bengal Times has heard of it in the far interior.

It occurs in Merry Wives of Windsor :—

"Falstaff.—I am glad I am so acquit of this tinder-box: his thefts were too open; his filching was like an unskilful singer,—he kept not time.

Nym.—The good humour is to steal at a minim's rest.

Pistol.—"Convey" the wise it call. 'Steal!' foh! a fico for the phrase."—Act I, Sc. III.

APART from the strange blunder of not rendering unto (the) Cæsar (of Literature) what is due to Cæsar, the paragraph is far from creditable to the London press. The remark on plagiarism is not to the point. It is vain to recommend to the living novelist Moliere's avowal. Nor can Mr. Haggard derive much consolation from the example of the great writers who nearly always improved what they picked up. The names of the Latin poet and the French and English writers make a brave show, but they are taken at random and do not necessarily prove erudition. The list might be easily indefinitely increased. Some of the greatest masters of literature and worst "offenders" in the line are omitted. It is strange that the name of Milton should not have occurred to an English man of letters. It is inexcusable in an English writer who talks glibly of Racine, Corneille and Voltaire, not to remember Dryden and Pope, Byron and Shelley. By the bye, Voltaire is so voluminous an author in various departments of literature, that it is hard to understand which acts of literary larceny the writer in Truth refers to, or which department of the Frenchman's works he has specially in view. The passage raises other questions. If Lamartine, why not Victor Hugo? And, then, which Balzac is under indictment? If the reference is to the recent novelist, the prospect is indefinitely enlarged. It might afford Mr. Haggard truer consolation to remind him that after all, perhaps the majority of the caterers of sensation, whether as novelists or playwrights, are wont to crib without compunction from the Continentals, chiefly the French—not ideas or phrases but pages—not only plots but entire books. It is preposterous to justify the petty larceny and barefaced loot of a writer who will not be heard of in the next generation, by the legitimate transactions or occasional lapses of the Immortals.

AYUB and his family have been saved an accidental death. The Sirdar had been to dinner with the ladies of his house at a relative's, where, contrary to practice, they passed the whole night, returning home in the morning. During the night, however,

"the roof of the house, upon which he had been in the habit of sleeping ever since he came down to Pindi, had completely collapsed. Ayub's bed had been actually ready spread on the roof, and was smashed to atoms. Most fortunately for him, he was not in it; and the very women who occupied the rooms below were away with him, so that no one was hurt. Had the accident happened at any other hour of the day, or on any other day since the Sirdar has been at Pindi, there must have been a terrible disaster and loss of life. The whole thing is made the more curious, as the Sirdar as a rule, never sleeps out, and has not done so once in his memory more than seven years. The Afghans naturally look upon this escape as miraculous, and say that the Great God is preserving their master for some special purpose. If their hopes are ever realized, this odd chance will, no doubt, live in history."

On this, the all-believing Mirror seriously exclaims, "Sirdar Ayub Khan is destined probably to be the future ruler of Afghanistan. He has just had a narrow escape from death at Rawal Pindi."

A GREAT mystery is the death, on the last day of Vadro, of Kristomanini, aged 11 years, second wife of Sudhabodh, the second son, aged 18, of Jibbanunda Vidyasagar of Potuldanga. She was found dead in her bed where her husband had left her early in the morning on a visit to Kalighat. Her throat was almost cut right through. There was found a razor in her hand which rested on her chest. The fact was not known to the house till 2-30 P.M., and no information reached the Police till three in the afternoon. The story given out is that the girl wanted to go to her father's, but the month being unpropitious, she was not allowed to return to her paternal roof, and that being disgusted with herself on that account, she laid violent hands on her own self. The Young Bengal and correspondents in the Mirror describe the husband as a sort of wild boy of whom the father and the elder brother are in dread. He had once threatened the father and, to avoid rough usage at his hands, the elder brother had lived away for a time. It is also said that Sudhabodh had once punished the girl by "cutting one of the fingers of the deceased girl by a 'nut-cracker,' which act of valor was said to have been performed by the Pundit's son under the same roof, where the Pundit himself resides only a short time ago." The circumstances are suspicious, and Kristomanini must have been a heroic girl to wound herself to death in the way she is said to have done. The Police at first, as is their wont when no immediate victim is available, was of the same view with the family that it is a case of suicide. But too late, after the disposal of the body, they grew wiser and suspected foul deed. Baboos Okhoy Coomar Banerjee and Kristo Chandra Banerjee were specially deputed for the enquiry. It is significant that neither the Pundit nor his son would see to the proper disposal of the body of the deceased. The Police could only get out of them Rs. 4 for the last rites, and the body, we are told, received such burial as the money paid down could purchase—at Dhappa. The Pundit's is a happy family indeed!

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1888.

THE MUSSULMANS OF BENGAL.

THE miserable war of creeds, which has been for some months going on in Upper India, has been carried down-country. The unwisdom of the Hindu politicians is responsible for this civil feud between communities, which, if they could not for the moment agree in questions of administrative reform, should, as they certainly might, live in social harmony. The Hindus fired the first shot. Still the Mahomedans stirred not. They exhibited exemplary forbearance. But the offence was repeated. Some of our prominent papers in especial, have, of late, adopted a most irritating policy. The staid old Hindoo Patriot has been one of the worst offenders. And now the Amrita Bazar Patrika, conducted by men who, born and bred in the heart of a Mahomedan District, might be expected to understand the claims of our Mahomedan brethren, or at least to have some regard for their feelings, has opened a ferocious attack.

The Patrika has no reputation for a mealy mouth. For the most part, the abuse is showered on the British and their Government. The castigation is sometimes deserved and sometimes not, but it is laid on all the same with a willing hand, in season and out of it. There is a class of readers who relish such high-seasoned mental pabulum, and maybe the demand and supply react upon each other. Blisters have their uses in the treatment of the body politic, as of the body physical, provided they are applied at the proper time and place. That the operation is a painful one for the patients, cannot be denied, and it is natural that they should kick at it.

Between a reluctance to join the National Congress and the persistent demand advanced on their behalf, for better and more extensive employment in the public services, the Mussulmans of Bengal have excited the dire wrath of our contemporary, and, in a recent issue, the poor Faithful have received a full mouthful of the sweet nectar which is the speciality of that journal. In choice epithets, they are cursed as being most of them the descendants of unmentionable castes, including in the horrid category the tenderers and devourers of that unclean animal which is the special abomination of the followers of the Prophet. Why should the demand of the Mahomedans for a due share in the loaves and fishes of office, excite so much indignation in a journal professing to represent the ultra patriotic view of all questions? We are not ourselves blind followers of the arithmetic method—we believe in the principle of personal fitness, irrespective of considerations of race, color or creed, and would be content to place the claims of Hindus and Mahomedans alike upon that and no other ground. But there are surer means of creating conviction than those resorted to by our contemporary. We, for instance, would point out that the numerical method must first of all be applied to the Christians, and draw attention to the fact that in other parts of India the Mahomedans would lose by the application of that method. So that, on a broad view, it would be better for them to give up this ground which would not benefit them in the long run. Our mental attitude in this matter is in close accord with the views expressed by Sir Steuart Bayley, in his replies to the various Mahomedan deputations that waited upon him during his recent tours in the country.

We value the National Congress idea highly as a means for promoting the political and social union of the peoples of India, so much divided by the difference of language, creed and caste. It is with extreme regret, therefore, that we find that, owing to indiscretions on either side, the National Congress itself is becoming the cause of deep-seated disunion amongst our countrymen. That certainly would be a sad end for a fair beginning. If the Mahomedans declined to join the Congress, it was scarcely their fault; prudence and self-respect alike warned them off. If the Hindus and Parsees thought them wrong and wanted them still, they ought to have been persuaded to mend their way, by appeals to their understanding and their good feelings, and not by crying them down and imputing base motives. Sir Syad Ahmed Khan's lamentable incendiarism was indeed far in excess of the offence given, but that is no reason why the contagion should spread. The educated Hindus claim a higher culture, a deeper political insight, and they should have done better, by offering calm reason against the fire and fury of the Allygurh Pyrotechnic Exhibition.

In its wrath at the children of Islam, our contemporary does not stick at any weapon of offence, however offensive. It descends to pry into their ancestry and origin, and does not stop till it has made them out to be the basest of the base. Had there been any truth in its assertions, our contemporary would still have been guilty of a needless offence to those with whom we are so intimately bound by the ties of a common country and the same Government. But the insult is aggravated by the looseness of foundation of the statement. Speaking moderately, we think that there is very little reliable evidence to support the Patrika's sweeping generalisation as to the origin of the Bengali Mussalmans. On the contrary, there is much to be said on the other side of the question. A Mahomedan correspondent, whose communication is printed elsewhere, takes up the subject. For his violence, we must apologise—indeed, we had half a mind to suppress the correspondence, but decided on second thoughts to permit its publication, in order, amongst other reasons, to offer a safety valve to the ebullition of a very general feeling which, if pent up, might seek vent in other more mischievous directions—but he adduces specific instances in support of the respectability of our Mahomedan population. We have no doubt in our mind, from the results of researches and observations made in some of the most outlandish places of the Province as well as nearer home, that many Mahomedans, who now appear to the eyes of the casual and indifferent observer to be no better in origin than the low caste Hindus by whom they are surrounded, were really descended from a genuine Western Mahomedan stock. The Courts and encampments maintained by the Mahomedan Governors of Bengal, throughout various stages of political existence, must naturally have introduced thousands of Mahomedan soldiers, retainers and dependents into this Province, who were immigrants from Western Mahomedan countries or the Indian descendants of such. It must not be supposed that only males left on this Exodus. We have authentic notices of whole families, men, women and children, immigrating. The family of the Empress Noor Jehan, for one, will occur to any one in the least acquainted with history. Considering, indeed, the respectable uxorious habits of the Faithful, the colonist camp must have been accompanied by a female contingent, however inadequate. When these men settled down in different parts of Bengal, as many of them did, receiving offices or grants of land, they must, many of them, have sent for their families. Although the way was long, the Ganges and its tributaries afforded easy means of locomotion for a downward journey. The Province again was accessible from the sea, and a great portion of the maritime commerce was in the hands of the Arabs. Satgaon, Sonargaon and Chatgaon were great emporia of trade, contained a numerous Mussulman population, and were centres from which they spread through the adjoining districts. Serviceable females are freely exported and imported in Christendom, as our great cities know to their cost. They are a recognised article of commerce in all countries under Mahomedan sway. Girls must have been imported through these channels, for those who were inclined to matrimony of sorts. There has been some admixture with the native Hindu element. So much the more liberal they, and the better for the country! There was no economic pressure, however. The Vilayeti male and female immigrants multiplied fast enough and in numbers enough, for the wants of their community. It is only in the institutions of polygamy and divorce and other cognate institutions of Islam, allowing males a large range of sexual liberality, that there was room for sanguinous commingling. In point of fact, the cumulative action of these causes must have been very limited. As a rule, the new-comers married among themselves, chiefly in their own families.

Coming now to the question of conversions, it must be admitted that, often and again, the blind boy was responsible for changes of faith. A licentious soldiery would not be overscrupulous in annexing females in a conquered country. With more settled Government, love-affairs would arise now and then, in which the 'he' or the 'she' was a heathen, and as the follower of Islam could in no way be gathered to the fold of Hinduism, the follower of the latter religion, of whichever sex, would have to swell the number of the followers of Islam. It was a common practice with many Mahomedan rulers to reprieve an unbelieving felon condemned to death, if he offered to embrace the true faith, and the love of life is so strong in the human breast that many men might be expected to close with the offer. Other Hindus, again, occasionally embraced the faith of Islam, not from fear of death, but from motives of ambition, in order to rise in favor with the ruling authorities and to obtain posts which were not ordinarily open to non-Mahomedans. We do not believe in any wholesale conversions of the people at the point of the sword effected during the Mahomedan period, and we think that the grounds of actual conversion, which we have enumerated above, do not at all necessarily imply that the converted were all members of the lowest and most degraded castes. On the contrary, the causes are such as to lead to the inference that a good portion of them must have belonged to the superior castes.

The poorer classes were, as now, placed, by their very poverty, above the lax influences just mentioned. The present condition and appearance of many Mahomedan peasants may be accounted for, on the supposition of a gradual degeneracy, owing to the want of means and education, without abrogating their real origin. Place a number of families of pure European extraction in the kintals of Calcutta, expose them to the same privations and manner of life as the low classes of natives, by whom they are surrounded, and with whom they are compelled to mix, and in a few generations, without any cross-breeding, their issue will be, in manner and appearance, undistinguishable from their neighbours. As a fact within our own observation, the Mahomedan masses, though speaking the same vernacular and being of Bengal thoroughly Bengali, are yet distinguished by moral and physical characteristics from the same classes of the Hindu population. In spite of centuries of adverse circumstances and of grinding poverty, they still carry in them the proof of their nobler foreign extraction.

DEFECTIVE DRAINAGE AND SHOW SANITATION.

THE late rains have exposed the weakness of our drainage system. There is no proper drainage able to cope with, even a normal rainfall. A complete breakdown ensues whenever the weather is of an exceptional kind. Certainly, not for the first time, has this fact been driven home by the rains, the effects of which have not yet subsided. The liability of the country to inundation is chronic. The general flood which compelled the late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal to venture out on a Steamer excursion over large tracts of his territory, while in a critical state of health, taught the lesson in a more unmistakable manner. There is no year without its more or less general inundation, causing injury to crops, house property and even to life. All the harm, however, from the present inundation or of past years—all the popular excitement under the visitations, would not have been in vain, if they opened the eyes of those who are responsible for the protection of the country, to the necessity of overhauling existing arrangements. What account can the Sanitary Department give of work turned out by it, in return for the people's salt it has eaten so long? Has it shown any better preparedness than other authorities? For some latrines the sewer constructed in a municipality, it flies into a terrible passion and invokes the thunders of official Jupiter on the devoted heads of the Municipal Commissioners. But has it had a word of remonstrance with Railway Companies for often destroying the natural drainage of the country by their embankments? Has it taken District officers, who practically are the District Boards, to task, for neglecting drainage in their rage for road-making and tree-planting? Latrines and urinals may be all very well for "model" municipal towns, but cannot they wait till more really pressing wants have had attention? And then as to municipal drainage, has it not been all along a reproach to all concerned? It is mere mockery, which would be harmless were not the funds, wasted upon it, badly wanted for more useful things. Indeed, one can hardly have patience with the fashion of municipal drainage which is in vogue. There is a large establishment of dhangar coolies and overseers, paid from year's end to year's end for doing hardly any real work at all, or work of at best a fancy character. Small weeds and plants growing on the surface drains of main thoroughfares seem to be the veriest abominations to sensitive municipal eyes, and the so-called drainage staff is persistently engaged in a ceaseless war of extermination against this unruly race. The chief object is, the roads must have a neat and tidy appearance. The more retired parts of the town may be overgrown with rank vegetation—the drains in the interior may be full of foul stagnant water—the ponds choked with weeds and mere receptacles of black poisonous water. But these are none of its care. No Sanitary Commissioner—no district officer ever strays out of the line of the main roads into these vile recesses. The main roads then must look fine and elegant, and there must be no grass or calladiums allowed to grow on their sides for fear of offending the delicate sensual organs of official inquisitors, and bringing down a thundering reproof like the one administered to Dr. Mittra of Serampore. It is a perfect waste of money—municipal drainage is a misnomer. The money so spent would far more usefully open out the natural watercourses—khals, nullahs, and river-beds, which are invariably silted up everywhere, and nobody—municipal Committees or District Boards or the Sanitary Department—seems to regard their reclamation with any attention. This system of official drainage—of official sanitation—has now continued too long to be endured any longer. It may be fashionable to reproach the older generations with barbarous ignorance of sanitary science, but they, at any rate, kept the natural water-courses a-going, and saw that the artificial drainage which they built was not neglected, in the pursuit of objects of a dilettanti character. Who, now, we ask, are responsible for the present state of things?

Let the answer be given to the above query. There is a system of authorities rising on an ascending scale from the rural, through urban, departmental and provincial, to the Imperial. There is a like series of all manner of taxes and impositions. So far as organization is concerned, nothing could be more symmetrical. Taxation could not be more thorough and far-reaching. And now, as if this were not enough—as if it were any deficiency in organization or taxation that was responsible for the admitted failure of the system, there is a grave proposal for setting on foot Provincial Sanitary Boards and instituting some fresh sanitary imposts. We have no faith in a multiplicity of servants. The more your servants, are you not often the worse served? Nor is there any want of funds at the disposal of the different authorities. The want of funds so loudly complained of, is a creation of extravagance—of misdirected zeal for fancy schemes of ideal improvements, which, however good they may be, ought surely to wait till more real wants have been adequately supplied. It is a disgraceful state of unpreparedness everywhere which the late rains have brought to light. Even municipal towns in the Suburbs of Calcutta, like those of Baranagar, Rajpur, Joynuggur, Dum-Dum and Barrackpore, have remained for days together under water. The culverts in the Railway embankments showed grave structural defects and refused to work. The beds of the natural canals have been allowed to be encroached upon by whomsoever cared to do so, the chief delinquent being of course the great Railway system. But it represents European capital, and is a formidable power. The Sanitary Department, which can lash poor native Municipal Commissioners, is all tenderness in the presence of such a mighty institution. Who shall help us?

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

MILITARY MAGISTRACY.

BARRACKPORE.

The quiet subdivision of Barrackpore has been stirred to its depths, by the huge defalcations made by Shahadut Khan, Tax-collector of the Cantonment Fund and of the South Barrackpore Municipality. This man was a Duftry attached to the Dum-Dum Magistracy under Colonel Hopkinson, who took a fancy for him, and one fine morning the Khan Sahib awoke as the Tax-collector of the South Barrackpore Municipality under its official Chairman, the military huzoor of Barrackpore, on a salary of Rs. 25 a month. When a British official, and a military officer to boot, is bent upon doing a thing, good, bad or indifferent, he laughs at obstacles. In a few months more, the quondam office menial was appointed, in addition to his other fiscal post, Tax Darogah of the Cantonment Fund on an additional pay of Rs. 25 a month. All this time Grish Chunder Ganguly was the Tax-collector of the Cantonment Fund on a pittance of Rs. 15 a month! But Colonel Hopkinson with one stroke of his pen reduced the pay of the poor Brahman and placed him under the orders of the low Moslem. It happens that no disbursements by way of establishments can be made without the sanction of the Commander-in-Chief, and such sanction was withheld. Undeterred by this unforeseen difficulty, Colonel Hopkinson suffered the Tax collector to deduct his pay from the collections and to remit the balance to the Treasury. Consequently, the arrangement was unsuspected by the military authorities. Colonel Hopkinson got a lift and left Barrackpore, when Major Sterndale officiated for him, during which time he compelled Shahadut Khan to deposit Rs. 500 as his security for the faithful discharge of his duties. Colonel Hopkinson reverted to his former appointment at Barrackpore and returned Rs. 300 to Shahadut Khan, retaining only Rs. 200 in his hand as security. Colonel Hopkinson has now issued a warrant, for the arrest of the absconding Tax Darogah. The exact amount which the Darogah has run away with has not yet been ascertained, the gallant Colonel thinks that only Rs. 100 has been defalcated, but the rumour is that 4 to 5 thousand rupces has been robbed by Shahadut. It is to be borne in mind that the Cantonment Fund, unlike the local funds, is not audited by the local fund auditor as is provided for by the cantonment rules. The true extent of the defalcation cannot be ascertained without a thorough overhauling of the accounts by an expert. It is therefore desirable to scan the accounts.

Shahadut Khan was a sort of Hobson's choice to the timid and weak-kneed Commissioners. They passed votes of want of confidence, recorded resolutions, but alas! they could not get rid of Shahadut Khan. It is said that this man has also robbed nearly Rs. 700 from the South Barrackpore Municipality. From what has appeared above, Mr. Editor, I think I rightly interpret the feeling of the people here when I say that they will have no confidence whatever in the arrangement if the man Shahadut be tried by his patron Colonel Hopkinson.

JUSTITIA.

The 11th September, 1888.

THE AMRITA BAZAR PATRIKA'S ATTACK ON THE INDIAN MAHOMEDANS.

A VINDICATION OF THEIR ORIGIN.

STR,—English education is working wonders. It has rescued the Paramaniks and Gbothes from their low position in society. Their brethren the Chandals and even the uncivilized hill tribes are rapidly rising from their degraded position and following in the footsteps of the enlightened barbers, milkmen and others of the sort. The editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika, whose descent could be traced from his family name, seems to totally forget his own origin and assumes the garb of a high-born. Those who have seen the editor will scarcely require elaborate genealogic proof. Notwithstanding his high English attainments and presumptuousness, he has at last appeared to the public in his true colours. To hide his own questionable origin and shame, he has boldly played the part of the fox without a tail in finding faults with the origin of those in the veins of most of whom the Arab and Rajput blood runs. Your Bag-bazar contemporary seems to have had no opportunity to study the history of the country of which he prides to be called a patriot. It is true that there is no Indian history to be had written by one of his caste men, for they were too insignificant and barbarous creatures during the times of Hindu and Mahomedan supremacy to be able to write any history of those periods. But I hope that this will not stand in the way of the said editor's believing in the truth of the statements of the Indian historians of the time. Now, for the edification of your contemporary, I wish to mention that the Mahomedan rulers were not like the English rulers. The former made this country their home, whereas the latter are averse to stay here. It must be perceptible to the dullest minds that when the Mahomedan rulers made this country their home, thousands of Arabs, Persians, Tartars, Afghans and Beloochis came down to this country and settled themselves here. Most of these warriors and learned men married the daughters of the respectable high-caste Rajputs, and many of the Rajput families embraced the faith of Islam. If it is possible for the Christians, within only one hundred years of the British rule when the Europeans are not to reside here permanently, to have hundreds of thousands of the followers of the Cross in India, would it be impossible then to count the number of Indian Mahomedans by millions and millions during the long period of the Mahomedan supremacy in this country? And were it to be doubted that there had been some millions of respectable Mahomedan families settled in India? Besides the Syuds who are the descendants of the Prophet, there are the Siddiqi, Ormani, Farooqi, Alawvi, Abbassi, Khalidi and other Arabian Sbaikb families in abundance in India. There are also the descendants of the numberless Mahomedan emigrants referred to above, who now owing to their poverty form the bulk of the middle and low class Mahomedans of the present time. Moreover, what has the Patrika to say regarding the descendants of the converted Rajputs? The Bazaree editor of the Amrita Patrika says, "The higher castes resisted with life. The lower castes (meaning the chamars, domes &c.) yielded." Let the Bazaree now understand that the converted Rajputs belonged to a caste far superior to the one he himself belongs to, nay, even to the one his spiritual leader has the honor of belonging to. I fear the above will not suffice to make him perceive the error, he has so shamelessly committed by insinuating that the Mahomedans are of "low origin," for he confesses himself that, "a chamar will remain a chamar for centuries before it will be possible to make him understand the analysis of La Place." Just as all the labours of the Indian historians failed to make him understand the truth or prevent him basely and falsely traducing the respectable. The Mahomedans might, indeed, desist from taking the trouble of pointing out the absurdity of his statement, for he is himself playing the part of his own chamar. However, as a last attempt, I would like to draw his perverse attention to the following facts which will no doubt remind him of his own origin and make him desist in future from vituperating his betters in the unjournalistic manner as he has recently done.

Are not the descendants of the daughters of the Mahomedans of Jodhpur and Jaipur, who embraced the faith of Islam, still in existence? Were they the daughters of the "domes" and "chamars" as hinted as by the Patrika? Is it not a historical fact that, during the wars between the Mahomedans and the Hindus, innumerable beautiful ladies of the respectable Hindu families were captured and married by the conquerors? Where are the descendants of these beauties of Hind? Can any one deny that the forefathers of Nawab Faiz Ali Khan, the Minister of the Maharajah of Jaipur, were not high-caste Rajputs? As the Bazaree himself is an inhabitant of Bengal, it will be beneficial to him to remember some instances of the nature in Bengal itself. Formerly, there were Bara Bhoosians, in Eastern Bengal. One of them was Isa Khan Bhoosian, who was a Rajput at first, but subsequently became Mahomedan and fought unsuccessfully against the army of the Emperor Akbar. After the complete subjugation of Bengal, the Emperor made Isa Khan the chief of all the Bhoosians and conferred on him the title of "Dewan." This Bhoosian was the Zemindar of Hybutnager in Mymensingh. His descendants are still alive. But the Hybutnager branch of the family has no male members at present. The last male member of this Branch was Dewan Allah Nawaz Khan. The Junglebari Branch of it has Dewan Rahman Dad Khan as its principal member. The famous Zemindars of Sarail were Dewan Noor Ali, Dewan Zahoor Ali and others, who were the descendants of a Rajput family, but after embracing the faith of Islam they received the title of "Dewan." When Nawab Saadut Ali Khan of Lucknow was at Dacca, he went to Sarail to see them. Their descendants are still alive. In Sylhet, there were the Zemindars of Baniachoong who were Rajputs and called themselves Rajahs. When they embraced the faith of Islam, they received the title of "Dewan" and retained the title of Rajah in the form of "Ruza." The last important member of the family was Dewan Nusrut Ruza. In the town of Sylhet itself, there is Haji Hamid Bukht Mujmooadar, Khan Bahadoor, the extra-Assistant Commissioner of Sylhet. For the last eleven generations, the members of his family have been Mahomedans. His Hindu forefathers held the respectable post of "Mujmooadar" from the Emperor of Delhi. The post being a hereditary one, it descended to his family. Besides this Branch, there is in Sylhet another Hindu Branch of the original family, which is known under the designation of "Dustcedar." In this manner, there are many respectable families in Sylhet whose members are Mahomedans as well as Hindus. Within the jurisdiction of the Madaripore Sub-Division, there was formerly the Rajah family of Oojeen. A branch of this family embraced the faith of Islam and one of its members was the well known Zemindar Maniruddin Khan, the owner of the Telechutty Pergunnah in Furreedpore. His daughter was married to the son of Azim Chowdhary of Pubna. In almost all the districts in the North-Western and Eastern Bengal, there are good many families of the above description. In Benares, Kakaram Shastari and Jagunnath Shastari were great Pundits of their time. The grandson of the former, named Ishari Pershad Shastari, has inherited the intrinsic merits of his grandsire and has few equals in the theological knowledge of the Hindus. He is now a Mahomedan and is daily preaching at the Wellington Square. He goes under the name of Pandit Gholam Mahomed. The Bazarre ought to keep this in mind that intellectual culture is essentially required to understand the dogmas and tenets of the Faithful. Therefore, his "chamar," "dome" and other lower caste Hindus were not and are not fit individuals to believe in the unseen God and the miracles of the long departed Prophet. I can show many instances of Brabmins and Kayastas having embraced the faith of Islam. The few that I have already narrated will, I think, not easily be digested by the Pat, without doing injury to his health. For further information, I would refer the Bazarre to the Urdu book called Tohfatul Hind and others of the kind.

SHARAFUT.

MONGHYR.

Jamalpore, Sep. 17.

Cholera has abated in the European quarter but assumed an epidemic form in the native portion of the town (Mongroorah), several fatal cases having occurred among the Bcharies (both male and female.) The Overseer attached to the local Municipality was in trouble a few days ago, having been prosecuted under Section 371 of the Penal Code. The case has been dismissed. Mr. Paulit (junior) Barrister-at-law defended the Overseer.

There is great dissatisfaction amongst the native rate-payers of Jamalpore Municipality, owing to the peremptory notice given by beat of drum to the effect, that the rate-payers will have to call at the Municipal Office and pay six months' vat tax within a week, otherwise warrants will be issued. When the Municipality undertook the charge of the latrines in the 1887, i. e., say from October last, it was fixed there and then that an additional tax of three-half per cent. for vat and three-half per cent for latrine in addition to the house tax, making a total of 14 per cent in all, would be levied. The rate-payers agreed to the terms and have been paying the same without grumble or grudge. The additional vat tax is certainly an extortion. As I understand, it is levied on measurement only, i. e., first 2 feet at 2 annas each foot and the subsequent additional foot at 1 anna. The present exorbitant taxation appears to the ratepayers in general, to be an innovation, seeing that it does not exist in the metropolis of Calcutta, its suburbs or in other important towns, such as Howrah, Hooghly, Burdwan, Moorshedabad, &c. A number of applications have been submitted to the chairman, protesting against it. Let us see how the matter ends. The people are in a fix. They constructed vats both of large and small sizes not knowing that fresh taxation would be levied. If sanitary improvement of the town be aimed at, can no means be devised by which the water from the dwelling houses be removed freely? Will not a pucca drainage system remedy the evil complained of? Is it not hard to compel persons to pay by measurement in addition to what they are now paying?

The recent floods which caused the surrounding lands on the bank of the river in Monghyr to be submerged, are gradually receding.

The prospects of the crops are very bad and much alarm is felt.

The prices of food grains have considerably risen and show a tendency to further rise.

The new Box system of payment to E. I. R. Company's workmen, &c., has, of late, been introduced, as a tentative measure, both in the Locomotive works here, as well as in the Company's Colliery at Giridih, after the example of London works. The process appears to be a satisfactory one as regards shortening the time taken in payment.

A RECENT TRAVELLER ON THE Chinese Coast found that District remarkably FREE FROM TYPHOID FEVER and CHOLERA. He soon discovered the cause. The people there do not drink cold water from tanks or wells, often extremely impure, but keep a pan of water constantly boiling, into which from time to time they drop a little Tea, and when thirsty THEY DRINK HOT TEA! If the weak and adulterated Teas of China can do this, what may not the pure and strong Teas of India be expected to effect?

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a represen-

ation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full need of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "He serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Anrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by
SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINI DASSY
(Author of Kabitar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohini's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

LETTERS OF THE DEAD.

TO LIVIA.

I.

How few the moons since last, immersed
In thoughts of fev'rish, worldly care,
My casket's heap'd contents reversed,
I sought some scroll I wanted there ;
How died at once abstraction's air—
How fix'd my frame, as by a spell,
When on thy lines, so slight, so fair,
My hurrying glance arrested fell !

II.

My soul that instant saw thee far
Sit in thy crown of bridal flowers,
And with Another watch the star
We watch'd, in vanish'd vesper hours.
And as I paced the lonely room,
I wonder'd how that holy ray
Could with its light a world illumine
So fill'd with falsehood and decay.

III.

Once more—above those slender lines
I bend me with suspended breath—
The hand that traced them now reclines
Clasp'd in th' unclosing hand of Death.
The worm hath made that brow its own
Where Love his wreath so lately set ;
And in this heart survive alone
Forgiveness—pity—and regret.

IV.

'T was 'mid the theatre's gay throng—
Life's loveliest colors round me spread—
That mid the pauses of a song,
I caught the careless "She is dead!"
The gaudy crowd—thy sudden grave—
I shrank in that contrasting shock,
Like midnight listener by the wave,
When splits some bark upon the rock.

V.

This Early Death—within its pale
Sad air each angry feeling fades—
An evening haze, whose tender veil
The landscape's harsher features shades.
Ah, Scornful One—thy bier's white hue
Stole every earth-stain from thy cheek,
And left thee all to Memory's view
That Hope once dared in thee to seek.

THE MONASTERY.

To some hath God his words addressed
'Mid symbols of his ire ;
And made his presence manifest
In whirlwind, storm and fire ;
Tracing with burning lines of flame
On trembling hearts His holy name.

By some the awful tones are heard
In bowers where roses blow ;
And where the heart's sweet thoughts are stirred
With music's magic flow ;
Young bosoms there in joy's full hour
Have turned to God and owned his power.

To some the solemn voice has spoken
In life's serene retreat ;
Where on the still heart sounds have broken
As from the Mercy-Seat,
Swelling in the soft harmonies
Which float on evening's tranquil breeze.
But chiefest when the heart is crushed
By sin or sorrow's power ;
And each sweet voice of comfort hushed
Which soothed in happier hour :
Oh ! chiefest to the sufferer's ear
That still, small voice is ever near.

For human tears, like spring's soft shower,
To human heart are given
To quicken with their balmy power
The blessed seeds of Heaven ;
And flowers of bright, immortal bloom
Burst from the darkness of the tomb.

TRANSLATIONS.

TO MY LADY'S EYES.

MADRIGAL.

(From the Spanish of Gutierrez de Cetina.)

"Ojos claros serenos," &c.

O Eyes, serene and clear,
That are to me so dear,
Whose sweet aspect so wins the general praise,
Why, only when on mine
You turn your gaze divine,
Should anger and disdain seem flashing in your rays ?
When best soft tenderness
Their beauty doth express,
Why should for me alone your look be pitiless ?
Yet, Eyes, serene and clear,
That are to mine so dear,
If in your glance for me,
Nothing but scorn must be,
This only boon I pray,
Look scornful on me still, rather than look away !

EPIGRAM.

(From the Spanish of Bartolome de Argensola)

"Quatro dientes te quedaron," &c.

Ella, you had, a month ago,
Just four teeth left, or I misreckoned :—
One fit of coughing shook out two,
And t'other pair a second.

Cough boldly now, when you've a mind,
To fear results there's no more reason ;
For a third fit can never find Another tusk to seize on.

THE SWAN AND THE EAGLE.*

[From the German of Schlegel.]

THE SWAN.

My tranquil life is passed the waves among,
Light ripples tracing as I glide along ;
And the scarce ruffled wave, as in a glass,
Reflects my form unaltered, as I pass.

THE EAGLE.

In the clefts of the rock my wild dwelling I form,
I sail through the air on the wings of the storm ;
'Mid dangers and combats I dart on my prey,
'And trust the bold pinion that bears me away.

THE SWAN.

Won by the charm of Phoebus, in the wave
Of heavenly harmony I love to lave ;
Couched at his feet I listen to the lays
In Tempe's vale that echo to his praise.

THE EAGLE.

I perch at the right hand of Jove on his throne,
And the thunderbolt launch when his signal is shown ;
And my heavy wings droop, when in slumber I lie,
O'er the sceptre that sways the wide earth from on high

THE SWAN.

Me charms the heaven's blue arch serene and bland,
And odorous flow'rs attract me to the land ;
While, basking in the sun's departing beam,
I stretch my white wings o'er the purple stream.

THE EAGLE.

I exult in the tempest triumphant and bold,
When the oaks of the forest it rends from their hold.
I demand of the thunder—the spheres when it shakes—
If, like me, a wild joy in destruction it takes !

THE SWAN.

Oft in the glassy tide the stars I view,
And that calm heav'n the waves give back anew,
And dim regret recalls me to the home
In happier spheres, reluctant whence I roam.

THE EAGLE.

With joy, from the hour that my young life begun,
I have soared to the sky—I have gazed on the sun ;
I cannot stoop down to the dust of the earth ;
Allied to the gods, I exult in my birth.

THE SWAN.

When a calm death succeeds to tranquil life,
Its links detaching without pain or strife,
And to my voice restores its primal pow'r,
Its dying tones shall hail the solemn hour.

THE EAGLE.

The soul at its parting springs forth from the pyre,
All free and unveil'd to the skies to a spire,
'To hail the bright vision that bursts on its view,
And its youth at the dark torch of death to renew !

* The eagle, in these lines, represents an aspiring, and the swan a contemplative genius.

And we are told India pays no tribute to England !

THERE is to be an electric railway in London—from the City side of London Bridge to the Swan at Stockwell.

BULLETS from the Lebel rifle do not lodge in the body but pass through it, bone and all, even when fired at a distance of 2,200 yards.

A HUMAN skeleton six feet long has been unearthed in a chalk pit on Portsdown Hill. It is said to be as old as the second century of the Christian era. The bones are in a good state of preservation and the teeth intact. In the left hand are twenty-two Roman coins. If this skeleton represented the average of humanity at the period, there has been a lamentable deterioration in physique in the British Islands.

AZAMGARH and the surrounding country for miles were flooded for days. The makai crop has been completely destroyed.

IN America, they have manufactured

"sham children, that will cry mechanically, and deter unwelcome passengers from mounting into the railway carriage which one wishes to keep to oneself. The advertisement mentions that these useful automations can be bought at the following scale of prices: 'Number One cries violently, with five gradations of sound, ten dollars. Number Two, prolonged doleful sobs, five dollars. Number Three gives sudden piercing screams, and is small enough to be put in the coat pocket, two dollars!'"

The makers of sham children will easily make sham patriots and "orating" platitudinarians. It would be an acquisition to many honest souls to have patent barrels having the human form producing set speeches and sermons. Such an invention would be a practical multiplication of popular preachers and stumpers of all kinds. The gouty or indolent might, by a moderate outlay, listen at home to the voice of their charmers and derive what edification is possible from such sources. The proCongress and antiCongress wire-pullers might see the advantage of ordering a large supply.

A CORRESPONDENT sends to the People's Friend the following extraordinary report:

"Alatur is a sub-division of the Taluk of Palghaud. The place is about 14 miles from the Palghaut city. Towards the south of this suburb is a hill, or ridge of hills known generally by the name of 'Viyu Malays.' It is believed that it is a branch of the Western-Ghats. In the month of July 1888 the country was blessed with such an abundance of rain from heaven that the whole country was inundated. At about 4 P. M. on a certain day, when there was a shower, noise like thunder was heard on the top of one of the hillocks in the above said ridge. The noise being continuous for a time, attracted a great number of people to the foot of the peak. There was seen a large column of fiery splendour surrounded with smoke, or what appeared to be smoke. The natives who witnessed it say that it was like a mass of fireworks set on fire and kept burning for a time. This vanished after a time and the rain ceasing to pour down in the meanwhile, there was leisure for the people to go to the top and examine the spot where the fiery column was perceived. They then observed the following changes in the physical aspect of the place.

1. A very large and massive teak tree that was growing firmly fixed by its strong roots to the ground, was removed from its place and placed against another tree in a living posture.

2. Two blocks of a great rock equal in size to 5 or 6 big elephants put together were removed from the spot occupied by them, and placed on both sides of a pathway that was cut right down from the top to the foot of the hill.

3. The pathway, the largest one, is now visible as a white macadamized road about 2 furlongs in length. There are two other similar pathways, but not so long and broad as this. These pathways did not exist there before.

4. The extremities of these paths is characterised by a pit about 2 feet deep and 8 feet in diameter.

5. After the phenomenon ceased, the weeds that have been removed from the fields in the valley below, and kept on the banks, were seen on the sides of the hill."

These freaks of Nature are enough to make the boldest hold their breath and the most careless to be anxious. Otherwise, it were not undesirable, in these days of financial tightness and distress, if kind Nature performed a miracle or two in our favour, purifying our atmosphere and making half a dozen really passable and useful Giants' Causeways and a score or two of Devil's Bridges. Sir Henry Harrison may take the hint; Father Lafont might be able to direct where to make the application. What a relief would it be to all concerned, to awake one morning and find that, during the rains overnight, Nature had made a clean sweep of Bara Bazaar and redistributed the streets, after widening them, on a geometrical plan!

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

AFTER a rather lengthy investigation, occasioned by the acceptance at first of the theory of suicide suggested by the family of the deceased, the Coroner's Jury returned yesterday a unanimous verdict of murder against the husband Soodhabode Bhuttacharjee, son of Jibananda Vidyasagar, for the death of Kristomanini, aged 11 years. Soodhabode, who was in Court when the verdict was pronounced, was arrested under a warrant of the Coroner and taken to the Deputy Commissioner for orders.

Mr. Lambert deserves credit for the zeal with which he had the case investigated by the Police, superseding one officer by another.

THE verdict of the Court on the death of Englebregt only confirms the popular horror of our hospitals. In runs in these words:—

"That the deceased died from the inhalation of chloroform, through insufficient care being taken in the mode of its administration, and we consider that the question should have been put to the deceased by the medical officer as to his ever having suffered from any affection of the heart before the chloroform was given. We think that this presentment should be forwarded to Government, for such action as may be considered necessary to prevent any future accidents occurring."

Englebregt would have been wiser to exhaust all available means before rushing to the Government hospital. There were many Indian nostrums, some of which might be tried with safety. For some time, a medicine is being advertised in our pages called Kamini Moni Davi's Mixture which is favorably spoken of. It is reported to have been successfully tried at the Campbell Hospital. Even the Madras Pile Doctors in the tiled huts, in the neighbourhood of Medical College and Hospital, were less to be feared than the regular professionals installed in the august medical palace. These Sammy Surgeons are sharp and decisive in their method. In one instance at least that we heard of—the patient being a clerk in the Asiatic Society—the result was as brilliant as in any case in the College itself, the end of the disease and all the ills that flesh is heir to following quick upon the conclusion of the operation. As a rule, however, these unrecognised practitioners are timid enough, acting under the fear of the people and the law. But for virtual chirological irresponsibility and a free hand, commend us to the endowed State sawbones!

MR. MOYLAN has appealed to the High Court from the order of the Recorder withdrawing his certificate to plead in the Rangoon Courts. The Recorder laid much stress on the misconduct of Mr. Moylan while at Grenada, the Supreme Court whereof disbarred him. There, in his capacity of solicitor, he appropriated to his own use costs he had recovered on behalf of the Grenada Government from the owners of the Kathleen.

ON the last Eed festival, at Dhubri, two Mahomedans having slaughtered a cow in the back-yard of their shop, in the bazaar, a Hindoo set up a cry of horrors. A great mob of Hindoos collected and rushing into the shop, seized the two outraging Moslems, belabouring them. The case is now before the Deputy Commissioner, Captain Gray, the Hindoos having been charged with criminal trespass, rioting, &c. The Daily News, from which we take the facts, says that the local Bar, which is composed entirely of Hindoos, refused to accept a brief on behalf of the Mahomedans, so that the latter were obliged to get up a Mahomedan Pleader of the Calcutta High Court to conduct their case. This conspiracy of lawyers is becoming a rather common complaint. Sometimes, it is, of course, a mere pretence, a pettifogging dodge to prejudice the opposite side. Thus, there was no sufficient foundation for Kallonas, when hauled up in court for belabouring the boy Satish, to say that he could get no legal assistance when Raja Surjikant, the friend of his family, was in town purposely to help him, when all the Raja's lawyers were at his service and were acting for him, and when the Government pleader himself, hearing of his complaint, offered him his services. But there are other cases in which such indecent combinations do take place. The High Court bar itself is not above such pettiness. We remember a case in which the leaders all declined to act. How is the country bar to be taught their duties if their superiors fail in theirs?

THE new municipal Act (II of 1888) comes into operation from the first of April 1889, but any election may be held under it in the meantime, taking effect with the commencement of the Act. For purposes of the Act, the boundaries of Calcutta have been extended to include the suburbs falling within "A line drawn along the southern and western bank of the Circular Canal from the river Hooghly to the south of Ballighatta, till it meets the Pagladanga Road. Thence along the eastern edge of the Pagladanga Road to a point where it meets the Chingrahatta Road. Thence along the southern edge of the Chingrahatta Road to a point where it meets the South Tangor Road. Thence along the eastern edge of the South Tangor Road to a point where it meets the Topsea Road. Thence along the eastern edge of the Topsea Road to its junction with the Tiljullah Road. Thence westward to the South-Eastern Railway, then southward along the western edge of the line of the Railway, and westward along the south of the New Embankment to the Russapuglah Road, thence along the eastern edge of the Russapuglah Road to its junction with the Road leading to the Tollygunge Bridge, thence along the southern edge of this road and its continuations, the Sharpore Road, the Goragachee Road, and the Taratollah Road to Nimuck Mehal Ghât, where it joins the Hooghly. And thence along the left bank of the Hooghly to its junction with the Circular Canal.

But from this area there shall be excluded—

- (1) Fort William.
- (2) The Esplanade.
- (3) That part of Hastings north of the south edge of Clyde Row, which has hitherto been excluded from the Municipality of the Town of Calcutta."

The local Government, however, reserves to itself power to exclude any portion or to add to the area of the new municipal town.

VICTORY to Sir Henry Harrison with whom are the Lords—of Earth! All's well that ends well, and the final, if tardy, ratification of his Municipal Bill at Simla is an event—a triumph—to him.

After four months' close scrutiny and deliberation by the Government of India, the Viceroy and Governor-General assented to the new municipal law for the town of Calcutta, on the 12th September last. As a result of that scrutiny also, the Hon'ble the Law member introduced on the 20th September in the Supreme Council a Bill to validate the Bengal law. The first section of the Bill, treating of the new municipal law passed for Bombay and Calcutta by the respective local legislatures, and the only section relating to our town, thus protects the excess powers the local council had assumed in its zeal for sanitary reform of the town :

"The City of Bombay Municipal Act, 1888, and the Calcutta Municipal Consolidation Act, 1889, shall, so far as regards—

- (a) the jurisdiction thereby conferred upon Appellate Benches of Municipal Authorities and upon Presidency and other Magistrates and Courts of Small Causes or any Judge of such a Court, and
 - (b) the decisions, orders and other proceedings of those Benches, Magistrates and Courts or of any such Judge,
- be as valid as if they had been passed by the Governor-General of India in Council at a meeting for the purpose of making Laws and Regulations."

Such is the sovereign doom and such the will of Jove!

But will the British Indian Association accept this ending of all their labors and struggles and hopes? And is this the reply of Olympus to the Surbadhicare Mission?

Now that the constitutional objection is admitted, we confess to a lurking doubt whether the difficulty will be effectually met in this way. The defect is radical. The fiat ultra vires altering the boundaries of the capital can scarcely be protected by an erratum—an enactment corrective by another Chamber. It is of the nature of a word pronounced which cannot be withdrawn—Et semel emissum volat irrevocabile verbum.

The spectacle of such legislation cannot redound to the credit of those concerned. But India is a land of anomalies!

Meanwhile, they are busy preparing to work, without a moment's delay, as soon as the date comes, a law scarcely in being—being still in the womb awaiting a Cæsarian operation to make its debut in the world as a living child.

MR. KIRKPATRICK has opportunely published an "Index" to the new law. Elaborately drawn up, it cannot fail to be a help to the Municipal Commissioners and their officers and of great use to others who may have occasion to consult the law. The Commissioners have signified their appreciation of their Reporter's labors by ordering 250 copies of the book. When might we expect the Collector Mr. Dutt's edition of the Act?

It will not do to depend entirely on books and Gazettes, which are accessible to the few. We hope the Corporation will take early steps to make the residents and ratepayers acquainted betimes with the new powers entrusted to the municipality. The chief and important clauses ought to be freely circulated in the vernaculars, preparing persons for the revolutionary régime.

BABOO KALLY CHURN GHOSE, the Deputy Collector, has grown grey in the service of Government and is not without a reputation of a kind. He claims special experience in acquisition of land for his masters, and rests more on his own experience than the law under which it is to be acquired. Recently he has brought himself into special prominence in connection with the Kidderpore Docks and Calcutta town improvements and survey. There is scarcely a morning in which we do not find the Baboo's name in the papers. The native papers freely talk of his exceptional proceedings based on exceptional knowledge, in depriving owners of lands and houses for the new Docks. The English dailies have now taken up the cry and cry for and against the Deputy. The Statesman published several cases in which the Baboo's offer of compensation has been doubled and trebled by the award of the Judge. The Indian Daily News has now come to his rescue. It says "The duty of the Deputy Collector here has been to arrive at a fair and conscientious estimate of what would constitute reasonable compensation to the property owners for compulsory deprivation of their lands for a public purpose." We have no mind to plunge into the discussion without full information. But the following from the proceedings of the Town Council of the Calcutta Corporation of the 18th August requires explanation.

"Proposed Sale of Surplus Land.—The Chairman submitted memo. by the Surveyor on the sale of the surplus land at No. 65-1 Mirzapore Street and No. 2 Potuatolah Lane. He explained that the Deputy Collector had acquired this surplus land in the interests of the Corporation, in order to have a straight road and to avoid payment of severance compensation, and offered to purchase it at the cost price of Rs. 6,600 which he had deposited. The owner of No. 2 Potuatolah Lane also offered to purchase the northern portion of the land fronting his house.

Baboo Soorendro Nath Banerjee would, according to the usual practice, sell to each of the parties the land in front of his house.

Baboo Durgagutty Banerjee was strongly of opinion that there had been grave irregularity in this matter: he did not think it right to accept the Collector's own award and sell the land to him at the price. It should either be resold to the owner, Baboo Dwarkanath Chuckerbutty, or be put up to public auction. He moved that the land be sold by public auction.

Baboo Omrita Nath Mitter remarked that the usual practice had not been followed on this occasion, inasmuch as land had been acquired by the Deputy Collector at his own instance without reference to the Commissioners.

Baboo Preonath Dutt also thought there had been great irregularity in these proceedings.

The Chairman on further consideration agreed that, as the value of the land had been fixed by the Collector, it would perhaps not be proper to sell it to him at his own valuation.

Baboo Jyogobind Law was also in favor of selling the land by public auction.

Baboo Durgagutty Banerjee's motion that the land be sold by public auction was put to the vote and carried."

The Surveyor's memo referred to runs thus—

"In reference to an application received from Baboo Kally Churn Ghose, our Collector under Act X of 1870, regarding purchase of the surplus land on the east of his house No. 65-1 Mirzapore Street and No. 2 Potuatolah Lane owned by Baboo Dwarka Nath Chuckerbutty, I beg to submit the following report.

In the plan prepared by the Engineer for connecting Potuatolah Lane with Mirzapore Street premises No. 65 Mirzapore Street were cut off almost diagonally. While preparing the estimate for submission to Government, I proposed the purchase of this surplus land to avoid payment of heavy damages for severance and prepared alternative plans and estimates.

The matter was again referred to the Engineer, and the plan was modified as shown by hatched lines. Baboo Kally Churn Ghose was in the mean time negotiating for the purchase of this very plot of land and he proposed to the Chairman to take up the additional land at cost price, to obviate the necessity for payment of any severance compensation. This proposal was approved of by you, and the acquisition has now been completed.

The land facing Mirzapore Street has been purchased at Rs. 1,300 per cottah, and that facing Potuatolah Lane at Rs. 1,000 per cottah.

The area of the surplus land is 4 cottahs and 2 chittacks, and Baboo Kally Churn Ghose has advanced Rs. 6,600 for payment of compensation for this land.

The owner of No. 2 Potuatolah Lane is now prepared to make an offer for the northern bit of the land, but considering the foregoing circumstances, the advantage the Corporation, and more specially the public, has gained in the straight road, mainly through Baboo Kally Churn, and furthermore the free use of his house, as land acquisition officer, is allowed, thus effecting a saving of Rs. 30 per month paid to his predecessor for office rent, I beg to recommend that the whole of the surplus land be sold to him at cost price, viz., Rs. 6,600 calculating at Rs. 1,300 per cottah plus 15 per cent compensation plus cost of removal of huts and redemption fee."

The land was thus acquired under the Act not for the Municipality out of the Municipal Fund, but for the acquiring Collector out of his private purse. Baboo Doorgagutty Banerjee showed his usual independence and sense of justice in the matter. It was a trial for him—an occasion of great delicacy; but he acquitted himself honorably. His brave resistance, supported by Baboos Omrita Nath Mitter and Preo Nath Dutt, prevented a scandalous job.

To give ample room and verge enough, to all races and creeds, the Indian Patriotic Association of Sir Ahmed, in opposition to the National Congress, has been re-christened the United Indian Patriotic Association. Is there so much virtue in a single word? Or, is "United" a Cabalistic term with which the great Wizard of the North hopes to conjure? A good name, like good looks, is an advantage to start with, to be sure. But then, a good-namer is as rare as a poet. "One word proves a poet," Christopher North used to say, So does a name. It is genius that takes in all the conditions of each case and hits on the fittest designation. No such superior faculty is discernible in the present case. The former name was much too long without being expressive enough. The latter, though gaining in the two-fold suggestiveness of object—union—and locality—United Provinces—is still more trailing and straggling—not by any means with many a winding bout

Of linked sweetness long drawn out.

That word Association is simply a nuisance, suited, if at all, to the hissing Briton. Even educated Englishmen, when they are obliged to utter it too often and in too quick succession, in the course of a speech on the proceedings of a body so-called, are sorely tried and sometimes reduced to a fix. And yet such is our barrenness that, without relegating it to the list of the disused vocables, that formidable anti-buccal word is continually put in requisition in the nomenclature of co-operative organizations. It is the most respectable as well as popular designating term. No doubt, the poverty of the language accounts for this. It is this poverty that makes appeal to genius all the more necessary in such dilemmas. All allowances made, however, there is still an unaccountable partiality for the word. Perhaps, the vulgar respect for sounding phrase accounts for its use. Our chief objection to it is the difficulty of sounding it. "Patriotic" is only less of a stumbling block than "Association." And now they have put the last stick on the camel's back. The unpronounceability is complete. How many of the supporters of the movement, drawn as they will be chiefly from the classes who do not know English, will give its name correctly?

WE are glad to learn that Mr. J. Pratt, who did his duty so manfully in the Tangail case, in Mymensingh, is winning golden opinions in the district of Midnapore, where he has been posted. An intelligent, painstaking officer, he possesses, in an eminent degree, the energy and downright straightforwardness which characterize the best men of his race. He is also, to a very great extent, what the Greeks call "anthropologous," watching with sympathetic interest the affairs, and rejoicing in the progress, of the people among whom he lives and moves. The inhabitants would have been very glad, had it been possible for him to exchange places with the Magistrate of the District,

THE medical appointments threaten to be a blot on the escutcheon of the present Administration. There is little justice in the disposal of the minor patronage and an appearance of carelessness—to use no harsher word—in the changes in the higher offices. The other day, a meritorious officer of unblemished reputation was huddled out of Patna to fill a similar post at Dacca, at not only the sacrifice of well-established private practice but also a diminution of actual allowances. He left under protest, and we have not heard of the fate of his appeal to the Bengal Government. Nearer home, at the very capital, we have just had emphasised in the verdict of a Coroner's Jury the lesson of putting in the place of Dr. Macleod, gone on leave to Darjeeling, a raw officer. Dr. Jameson may be an able man, but skill in surgery comes of long experience, and the post of First Surgeon to the chief College should be reserved for approved experts. Nor is Dr. Walsh's appointment regarded as a happier one. And now we are not a little surprised to find that Dr. Gregg, and not Dr. K. P. Gupta, has been Gazetted to officiate for the Sanitary Commissioner Dr. R. Lidderdale, who is now on sick leave. Dr. K. P. Gupta had acted in this post for three months, when the latter took furlough in March last. He is not only senior to Dr. Gregg, but is the most experienced officer in the Sanitary Department, having served therein since June 1872. We may also observe that he is a most painstaking man, his inspection-returns shewing that he does every year as much as the work of three of his brother-officers. His liberal views in regard to Local Self-Government would have recommended him as l'homme nécessaire at this time. As an Indian, he is, of course, precluded from being Somebody's somebody.

ONE cannot help being amused at the derangement of relationships which results from alliances and counter alliances between different families.

The marriage of the Duke d'Aoste with the Princess Lactitia comes to create this curious situation.

In espousing her uncle, the Princess became the step-mother of her cousins, and aunt of the Prince of Naples, her cousin in the first degree. From niece, she became sister-in-law of the King and Queen of Portugal and aunt of the Duke and Duchess of Braganza. She became sister-in-law of her mother in marrying her brother.

The Duke d'Aoste became the son-in-law of his sister and of his brother-in-law, brother-in-law of his nephews, and nephew of his brother and of his sister.

This is frightful, is it not? But the members of the European royal caste need not hang down their heads so long as they have the Indian kings of men, the Kulin Brahmans of Bengal to keep them in countenance.

THE City of Charnock (whose name it bears) and home of Orator Surrender Not, is not famed for wisdom. Therefore, it is with all the more surprise, we have read a well-written and well-reasoned representation from that quarter to the Lieutenant-Governor, not disfigured by extravagance of thought or language. The document begins, awkwardly enough, with the prayer. But this and other defects of form may be passed over in a Bengalee state-paper, in generous recognition of its substantial good sense. Barrackpore proper is an old cantonment of the Bengal Army, under a Cantonment Magistrate, who is usually a military officer. But the neighbouring townships and villages also constitute a sub-division in the civil administration of the Province. There is, however, no separate civil officer over it. The two jurisdictions are lumped together, and placed under the same officer, that officer being the Cantonment Magistrate. Thus the sub-division is joined to, or practically merged in, the Cantonment Magistracy. This is doubtless an anomaly. Such an arrangement cannot but be faulty. The only thing that can be urged in its favor is that it arose naturally out of circumstances. The town of Barrackpore has a history. It was one of the earliest settlements of the British, having been founded by the founder of Calcutta and about the time. At the very beginning of the century, Wellesley the Magnificent established his country seat and park there. Then the Ishapore Powder Mills were fixed in its neighbourhood. These facts constitute cumulatively a strong presumption in favour of European British rule at such a place. And so the presumption was acted upon. But since then, on a changé tout cela, and the presumption scarcely holds good now. New interests have arisen, the population has vastly increased in number and even more in education and self-respect. A military rule over a civil population is always an anomaly; over an unmartial people, it must be even more intolerable. In Barrackpore Sub-Division at this time of day, it is an anachronism. On the other hand, it is to be borne in mind that the military rule is more in name than in reality. The population is under the law of the land, that is, civil law not military. The administrator is for the time being a military officer. His acts are under the supervision of the District courts and the High Court, besides the Executive Government, though, of course, in summary cases his decision, like that of other Magistrates, is final. The present incumbent has been at his post for many years and has presumably acquired some judicial experience and more local knowledge, with possibly some local bias, and we do not wonder at the sympathy felt for him by many of the inhabitants. In justice to them, we publish in another column an authenticated letter. This is, however, not a question in which local sympathy is not necessarily a paramount factor, and we are sure the Bengal Secretariat will decide it on its true merits.

In this connection, we fear Colonel Hopkinson has been unfortunate in his favorites. We are sure he will not try to shield the Tax Daroga who stands charged with embezzlement. If he do, Government will not permit him. We trust the District Magistrate has his eye on the matter.

BAPU SAHIB JADON has been placed in charge of the office of President of the Council of Regency, under the orders of the Agent, Governor-General in Central India.

WE are glad to be informed that there is no danger of an English succession to the place of the late Sir Ganput Rao.

THE ills that life is heir to! how true is the language of the poet! And who of us is permitted to forget the fact? A good doctor is, therefore, a boon we can all appreciate. Our advertisement columns announce the addition of such a one to the army of alleviators of suffering from sickness, and of possible rescuers from death. We give him a cordial welcome. He has set up in our immediate neighbourhood, in fact next door to us—all the merrier! Mr. J. N. Mitra, to whom we refer, is a gentleman of ability and experience. A brilliant graduate of the Calcutta Medical College, he won the gold medals in Medicine and Hygiene and certificate of General Proficiency. Having obtained his diploma, he went and took his finishing in Europe. In 1881, he passed as Licentiate of the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons of Glasgow, and as Licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries of London, returning in the following year with the degree of M.R.C.P. This membership of the Royal College of Physicians of London, is no nominal compliment given for fees paid, like so many medical titles or other distinctions, but an honor awarded after a searching and difficult examination. Accordingly, the list of members is not crowded like those of other Societies chartered to grant titles. The year in which Dr. Mitra passed, 1882, only another Indian passed. In all, there are up to date only five Indian M. R. C. P.s, London. The distinction is highly prized in Great Britain. The status of the examination may be estimated from the fact that Dr. McConell, the Indian pathologist, went home and obtained the membership in 1883. Dr. Birch, the veteran physician and surgeon in charge of the General Hospital, passed in 1886 only. We enter into these details in order to afford a clue to the proper position of the newcomer, as the letters at the end of the names of these gentlemen are apt to confound the general public.

Dr. Mitra has had a fair experience in practice. He has been Superintendent of a Quarantine station. In Bengal, he has been in charge of the Maisadal Hospital, which he left with the highest credit. Year after year, the District and Divisional officers gave the most satisfactory reports of the institution, and of the appreciation of the doctor's services.

Such a medical man is, we take it, a distinct acquisition to the neighbourhood, we may say to the town generally.

A BOY picked up a shining pebble in the hills near Kandy, in Ceylon. A knowing Cingalese wheedled it out of the boy for a few dollars. It was a prize—a godsend. For the pebble proved to be a prodigious cats-eye. He showed it to a jeweller who offered to take it off his hands at a profit, and try his luck. The first purchaser was tempted with Rs. 100, afterwards Rs. 150, then Rs. 200, next Rs. 300, until the offer was raised to Rs. 500. That was indeed a fabulous bait for an article for which the owner had paid a few shillings. But the man had had some inkling of the value of his possession. It was not till he had received Rs. 750 that he parted with it. The new purchaser next sold it for Rs. 4,500. The present owner will, it is said, get between Rs. 9,000 and Rs. 10,000, but not before he has had it cut. There is some risk in the process, however.

Some fifty years ago, a poor peasant in the Dacca district, in ploughing his field, turned up a rare diamond which passed through several hands and finally sold for Rs. 70,000, and then became the subject of a protracted litigation. The original finder claimed restitution or the full value, on the ground that he had been induced to part with it on fraudulent misrepresentation. In the course of appeal, the case was compromised.

THE RISKS OF SOCIAL REFORM!

THE LAST BERHAMPORE SCANDAL.

A MORNING contemporary gives publicity to the following:—

"The native papers of Bengal publish a very sensational statement to the effect that Mr. Allen, the Assistant District Superintendent of Police, Berhampore, on the night of the 27th ultimo, trespassed into the house of Mr. N. G. Mookerjee, agricultural officer of the place, in his absence, with a criminal intention, that is, to outrage the modesty of Mrs. Mookerjee. The other male members of the house being apprised of the impending calamity vehemently opposed Mr. Allen's attempts to entering forcibly into the chamber in which Mrs. Mookerjee slept, and after great difficulty, they succeeded in saving her from the hand of the police Pongo, by removing her, with her babes, into the house of the Sub Judge of the place. The matter being reported to the Magistrate of the District, he, after communicating with the Government, transferred Mr. Allen to another district."

The matter is a month old, and yet no contradiction has appeared to the "sensational statement of the Native papers of Bengal." It is time enough for non-Native papers to speak, is it not? Perhaps it is reserved for the bolder organs of Indo-Saxony to come to the rescue of national honor and represent the European Police official as the victim of Native mendacity and of the Lieutenant-Governor's weakness in listening to Native complaints. The Indian Daily News, from which we quote the paragraph, is not British and bumptious enough, however much he may, at any time, have been tempted to give himself the airs of "manifest destiny," or indulge in tall talk of the rights of Magna Charta, to the ends of the earth. In the present case, indeed, there is no trace of sympathetic leaning towards the hero of the adventure. If anything, our contemporary's alliterative characterisation of the amorous Police Superintendent rather points the other way. But why call him "the Police Pongo" rather than the Police parallelogram? In the Medæival Legend of St. George, the Pongo is an amphibious monster of Sicily, a sort of sea-tiger, who devoured all the inhabitants within an area of twenty miles, until he was destroyed by the saintly warrior's three sons. Surely, there is nothing in common between the horrible man-eater and the unknighly knight of the Bengal Constabulary. It is rather difficult to think of an analogue, at once dignified and sufficiently true. The Police is a great institution everywhere—in this country, the Police is a formidable power. Nevertheless, the imagination of the poet would be staggered to invest an Assistant Superintendent of Police with dignity. Had it been the great Inspector-General or even his Vice of the Railway, we might recall the Olympian Indra sneaking under a cloud into the bed-room of Danaë. We have never seen Mr. Allen, and have no idea of what sort of thing he is, but the Junior District Superintendence is usually reserved as the stepping-stone into the service for beardless scapegraces, or else we might call this amorous Ass in presence of the District Police a Blue-beard.

Berhampore, we see, is becoming rather a notorious civil station for the morals of its official residents. In former times, when it was a military cantonment to watch the Mahomedan Court in the neighbourhood, its life was enlivened by the usual scandals—loves and hates, drunken brawls and bloody duels. Fifty years ago, the freak of a drunken Prince, a prodigal Rajaling and a brilliant Political and the intrigues of their entourage brought the reputation of the place to its lowest ebb. Then came a change. Latterly, indeed, the riders and drivers in the streets of the European town were occasionally arrested by the spectacle of a grave dignitary of the bench in his shirt only, running about in his garden, behind the low front wall, brandishing a naked sword, with his poor wife screeching after him and the terrified native servants fleeing before. His career was, however, soon cut short by a new Lieutenant-Governor. Since then, all had been quiet, until the year before last, when the orgies of a couple of natives in the Judicial Service, culminating in the outrage of one of them on the wife and daughter of the other, his host, and his deserved punishment at the hands of the servants and neighbours, caused the greatest sensation throughout the country. We have hardly had time to forget that scandal, before all the evil memories of the town are revived by a European officer, specially charged with the duty of detecting and prosecuting offenders, being caught trespassing, at dead of night, into the apartment of a native lady, sleeping with her infants in her own house, during the absence of her husband away on duty in the country.

The incident affords a fine handle to the Native Press for painting the British monster, armed with the prodigious irresponsible powers and backed by the prodigious prestige of the Police, coming down on the fold, at dead of night, and seizing the female lambs for prey, and sacrificing to his lust the honor of the miserable meek subjects of the Crown. The new ventures in illustrated journalism, may indeed welcome it as an opportunity for affording their readers, jaded with pictorial representations of the man-eating and woman-seizing Planter and the horrors of Tea cultivation, a variety in the shape of cartoons of the Police Saheb in the character of the thief of native honor—the invader of Hindu homes—the outrager of the modesty and destroyer of the innocence of the women of India. But great as may be the temptation, we do earnestly trust our contemporaries will resist it. In fact, it is to prevent any such result, that we have recalled the native scandals in the same station. But the case is not without its lesson for us, and we wish our people would find it and lay it to heart. About the case itself, we know nothing, beyond what we find in the papers or given in the above extract. But, believing that the injured husband is the same who figured as a witness, in the notorious Pigott-Hastie case, under the name of Nitu Mookerjee, we think the Hindu community has little reason to make common cause of his grievance. It is not strictly a Hindu affair on any side, considering that Mr. Mookerjee is a convert and his wife the daughter of another convert. The gentleman has been to Europe into the bargain, where he went for professional education. Of course, they live much like Europeans, man and wife. Not but what they live volens volens much after their kind and previous habits. But in several respects, the Native Christian community of Bengal have departed from their Hindu and Mahomedan brethren, and in none more so than in their domestic arrangements and the social intercourse of the sexes. This is a cardinal difference. It constitutes a structural variation of one society from another. These customs colour the whole existence of man. Such changes ought not to be lightly made. It is not at all necessary because a man turns Christian, that he should abandon the customs regulating home and mutual intercourse in which he was born and bred, any more than he need dress and eat like his Christian instructors of other lands. There are numerous Christian communities in different conditions which retain their old customs. Even in Europe, different notions and arrangements prevail. The freedom of British manners shocks most peoples on the Continent. We do not blame the Native Christians or Brahmos of Bengal for aspiring after the British model, for we have no doubt that that is the final goal of human progress. But there is risk in rushing on finality. We are afraid many enthusiasts do not calculate the danger of anticipating the years: others are simply frivolous, making of reform a fine dissipation. We think we are justified in taking the Berhampore case as a fair illustration of the evils of being unco-English before time. It is a delicate subject, and we, without pursuing it further, make a present of it to our contemporaries, European and Native, and our own countrymen at large in particular.

SIGNOR CRISPI.

A FRENCH PORTRAIT.

SIGNOR Crispi was born in Sicily, of Sicilian parents. A humourist of antiquity said:—Omnes insulares mali, Siculi autem pessimi. Without taking to the very letter this sally of wit, we can say of the Sicilians that they are energetic, passionate and specially vindictive. Signor Crispi is a Sicilian from head to foot.

He is about seventy years old, yet he has all the ardour and the impetuosity of youth. He is old, but he has not yet given up his youthful follies.

His stature is middling,—rather meagre,—and we know that he is still vigorous. His hair is become white; this is the only sign of decrepitude; the eye is bright, the look appears ardent.

At first sight, he is peevish, and abrupt; gradually his physiognomy softens, and if his conversation takes a friendly turn, he appears almost a good fellow.

He has a character; he wishes specially to have one. He possesses energy; that energy—which is the natural and requisite part—is the principal reason of his influence over Parliament. That body fear him. In an assembly, where talent is rare, and capacity still more so, a man who knows what he wishes and who wishes strongly, and never falters, is the person who easily gets the mastery over it. With that and with little or no scruples, he has proved it on several occasions in his political as well as in his private life.

As an orator, his eloquence is disagreeable—even painful to hear. The sentence is laboured, the diction abrupt, yet it is effective. In a country of high-sounding periods, where the Ciceronian method is cultivated, and where the art of speaking has arrived at perfection, Signor Crispi presents a contrast. His discourses are not long, but they are incisive. If he does not persuade, he inspires fear. He dominates over Parliament, specially since he is minister or rather dictator.

As a minister, he is a policier of the first order;—having passed his life in hatching conspiracies, he knows best what is needful to baffle them; and as he is by nature resolute, he never hesitates. Such is the man. Whatever we may think of him, he is surely not an ordinary man.

In 1848, he was deputy from Palermo to the Revolutionary Parliament. When the reaction came, he took refuge in England and afterwards in France. They say that while in France he experienced some vexations, and that it was then that he took against us the oath of Hannibal,—an oath which he has kept and still keeps.

Here is perhaps the true explanation of a policy often so inexplicable.

In 1859, Signor Crispi, not formally expelled, was invited by Signor Piétri to come from France. Accordingly, he came to Turin, affiliated himself with all the secret societies, and opened a correspondence with Cavour, who had the custody of his sons.

It was after the peace of Villafranca and while the annexation of Nice was under discussion, that the Sicilian enterprise was contrived. Signor Crispi returned to the island to prepare everything in agreement with Cavour, who supplied him with money. He was accompanied by his wife, whom he has since repudiated, and who was on that account decorated with the medal of Mille de Marsala.

During that long campaign or rather conspiracy which lasted several months, Crispi risked his life. If he had been taken, he would have been hanged, and Napoleon III, who was in the secret, would have allowed him to be taken, not perhaps without secret satisfaction.

This is not the place to recount how Garibaldi came to take the military direction of the enterprise, and how he triumphed without rendering to himself an account of the proceedings to which he owed his success.

What is certain is that he reaped all the glory of the undertaking. Signor Crispi remained in obscurity, whence Cavour, who feared him, brought him out as soon as he could. He entered Parliament and took his place in the Left and always supported Rattazzi, whose rôle consisted in directing the opposition for his advantage and in the interests of the king.

For ten years, Signor Crispi was the soul of all undertakings, a little dark and often unfortunate, which have prepared the Italian unity with Rome as capital.

Thus, in 1862, he was one of the principal organisers of the affair which ended at Aspremonte, and in 1867, of that which had its catastrophe at Mentana. Thus in Sicily, Garibaldi was the arm and Crispi the head.

Nevertheless, he was not chosen a minister. Rattazzi, though he wished it, could not bring him in his Cabinet in 1862 or in 1867. It was the Emperor who excluded him as they sometimes keep out some cardinals from a conclave. The official reason of the exclusion was that Crispi professed democratic ideas. The true reason remains and will ever remain a mystery. The injury, however, was not forgotten.

In 1866, when Napoleon III had the fatal idea of making Italy an ally of Prussia, Signor Crispi divined where would henceforth be the power. He made himself an agent of Bismarck and commenced those relations which have never completely ceased in spite of some moments of coldness. In August 1870, when Victor Emmanuel expressed his wish to come to the succour of France, Crispi was one of those who violently opposed him.

Towards the end of 1870, the ambition of this old conspirator was no longer barred by a superior will. He had to follow only the parliamentary way and to wait for the triumph of the Left to which he belonged.

That triumph came by a natural evolution in 1876. Signor Rattazzi having died, Signor Depretis, who was the chief of the Left, became Prime Minister. He made Crispi at first President of the Chamber and then minister of the Interior (Home Secretary.)

In this latter capacity he had to preside once at a change of reign and at the conclave which elected Leo XIII. It is just to acknowledge that, in those circumstances of singular gravity, the conduct of the minister was resolute, correct and wise.

It is to be noted that hardly had he become President of the Chamber, when his first want was to go to Berlin. There he was not well received by the Emperor to whom he had addressed a despatch direct; hence arose some coldness, which, however, did not last long. The breach of etiquette was pardoned on his proving himself a submissive subject and a faithful ally.

We know how, after three months' ministry, Signor Crispi was compelled to retire in consequence of matrimonial adventures, on which it is not necessary to dwell, as they are the affairs of his private life; nevertheless, ten years were necessary to efface their traces.

Finally, on the death of Depretis, Signor Crispi was able to seize the power after which he ran in vain for 30 years. But he never despaired of his fortune.

He is President of the Council and Minister of the Interior and of Foreign Affairs. He rules the King as well as the Parliament. He is de facto dictator. One of the strange things of our times is to see this man govern despotically a Parliament, which, in the main, execrate him, and to domineer over a Court which certainly does not love him.

Here is the secret of this phenomenon. Signor Crispi knows to incarnate in himself the double passions of the House of Savoy and of the liberal Italian party, who have placed themselves under the ægis of that dynasty.

The first of these passions is to make Italy a power superior to France.

What does it matter whether England takes possession of the whole of the Mediterranean Sea? What does it signify if Germany re-establish the Empire of Charlemagne for her own advantage?

His chief object is to humble France,—and to trample upon her.

The second passion is to compel the Pope to submit to the House of Savoy and to become its subject.

They have taken from the Pope first his provinces, then his capital. They keep him morally a prisoner in the Vatican. As long as he protests, the Pope is not conquered; the more he is attacked, the stronger he becomes.

Signor Crispi hopes to put an end to this importunate protestation. This is the object of the campaign which he has undertaken and which he pursues with tenacity.

Such is the secret of his power and popularity. He has at his back the ambitious plans of the monarchy and the anti-religious passions of the sects.

How well soever he pursues his anti-French policy, Signor Crispi has for France an involuntary regard. He knows that he owes to her those ideas by which he rose to power, for he often says:—"In spite of all, the French are a great nation." The opinion of Paris pre-occupies him. Whatever he affects to say, he is irritated to be represented there as a scarecrow. Thus, victorious Alexander pre-occupied himself with what was said of him at Athens.

This minister is not a man to be satisfied, like Signor Depretis, with governing peacefully for ten years and dying as a President of the Council.

He wishes to achieve grand things; his long struggle for power has sharpened his ambition without satisfying it. At seventy, he has the ardour of youth with the experience of maturity. He is certainly not an ordinary man—it would be a mistake not to recognize him.

Will he be a Richelieu or an Alberoni? Will he obtain in history the renown of a great man or of an Erostratus?

God knows it, and we shall probably know before the end of 1889.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE BENGAL MUSSULMANS.

SIR,—Your able and powerful leader, in your issue of the 22nd instant, on "the Mussulmans of Bengal," has met with universal encomium from the members of our community, and we cannot be sufficiently thankful to you for the great service which you have rendered us in this way. It was indeed a most delicate and difficult task, especially for a Hindoo editor of Bengal, but throughout you have acquitted yourself most honorably, independently and fearlessly. Your old acquaintance with the Mahomedan community, your perfect knowledge of their history and character, your great powers of observation and your experience of the Mahomedan Courts, have certainly excited your sincere sympathy for us, and you have therefore so feelingly expressed your own feelings and views on the subject. I believe the feelings of all respectable Bengalee gentlemen are more or less the same towards their Mahomedan brethren. You have done right by publishing the letter of Sbarafut, and your leader and his letter combined have much soothed the injured feelings of my co-religionists and appeased their indignation, which if left unchecked might have run to other outlets and channels and caused serious mischief. Our traducer has already made a fool of himself and betrayed a want of historical knowledge, general information and common sense, of which every respectable and high-minded journalist ought to be ashamed. He, I believe, has never come out of his den, and he boasts of his so-called high origin sitting there. It is very dangerous to write in the press on sentimental impulses, without knowing what a man writes and without considering its consequences. This jungli editor has never been in respectable Mahomedan society; he has no idea of a respectable and high-born Mussulman of Bengal. His own associates having been all the unmentionable men, he looks everything from his lone Chamari point of view. If he had seen the great centres of Mahomedans of Bengal, Dacca, Moorshedabad and other places and mixed with Mussulman gentlemen and nobles there, he would have surely seen the pure blood of Arabs, Mughuls and Tartars running through their veins with the same force as the tide of the Ganges runs at present. There are Mahomedan families in Bengal who defy recognition even by the Patrika as natives of Bengal, and who easily pass for Persians, Arabs and frontier men before keen observers. The English Government has given us the freedom of speech, but if it should be abused in the manner as is being done at present, by a class of unthoughtful, silly and inexperienced writers in the Besigali press, it must be withdrawn, else its political consequences may some day or other bring a great disaster upon Bengal, and present an opportunity to the jungli editor to test his high origin and valour by practical means with us and prove to the Government that he has all the qualities to make a good volunteer. Such writings are indirect applications for a Gagging Act which was once passed. The Mahomedans of Bengal are not yet so weak and timid as to be abused publicly without any reason whatever and without the least provocation. We are a polite race and we respect all our neighbours who are respectable, and in return we expect to be respected by them. If the editor of the Patrika is a reasonable person, he ought to apologise to my community for insulting them, and let the other writers of the same class take a lesson from this incident to use the dangerous weapon of the pen more carefully in future. It is simply foolish to think that, by using such dishonorable and mischievous means, the Congress-wallahs will force us to join that agitation. If you want our co-operation, you ought to appeal to our wisdom and understanding, but you have no right whatever to abuse us in the press.

I will here cite two instances in support of Sbarafut's long list of the high class Hindoos having been converted to Islam. There are in the district of Mozufferpore the families of the late Karban Ali Khan (in town) and the Raja of Parsonni at Parsonni (sub-division Sitamarhee) whose forefathers were high caste Hindoos (such as Rajputs and Babbans). Their kinsmen and Hindoo relatives are still in that district, and I know of certain social ceremonies which are still being observed between the convert family of Karban Ali Khan and their Hindoo kinsmen. These two families are most respectable Mahomedan families, and the Head of the Raja family received the title of Khan Bahadur from Government. The Hindoo kinsmen of the two families are such high caste and rigid Hindoos that they would not drink water touched by the editor of the Patrika or his class of high born Hindoos. I can give other instances from Behar but what we have cited is enough to convince every just and reasonable person of the falsity of Patrika's allegations.

NAJAHAT.

BARRACKPORE SUB-DIVISION.

A short time ago, a memorial praying for the separation of the Barrackpore Sub-division from the jurisdiction of the Cantonment Magistrate, Barrackpore, signed by a few only of the residents, under the leadership, it is presumed, of Baboo Surendra Nath Banerjee, the editor of the Bengalee, was submitted to His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, for reasons best known to him. Baboo Banerjee is not on good terms with the present Sub-divisional Magistrate, Lieutenant-Colonel W. Hopkinson, as is fully evidenced by his too frequent attacks in his journal on that officer. Thus the memorial has its origin in malice. That Baboo Surendranath Banerjee is not popular with the people amongst whom he lives, is fully borne out by the fact that he twice failed to get himself returned as Chairman of the North Barrackpore Municipality—the Commissioners thereof having had bitter experience for a period of 3 years of his administration while at the head of the Municipality. Further, that most of the residents were ignorant of the submission of such a memorial, is quite evident from the fact of its being followed by two numerous signed counter-memorials, one by most of the respectable residents of the South Barrackpore Municipality and its neighbouring tracts, and the other by those of the North Barrackpore Municipality and its adjoining villages, strongly protesting against the proposed change as soon as they became aware of the fact of the submission of the memorial in question. Hence you and your readers can easily infer that the memorial was got up at the mere dictate of Mr. Surendranath Banerjee and his clique, and that the general public has no sympathy whatever with it. I can also make bold to assert that the opinion held by Mr. Surendranath of the administration of the sub-division by Lieutenant-Colonel W. Hopkinson is shared only by his blind admirers, and not by most of the residents of the sub-division. Baboo Surendranath has, of late, given up discussing in his journal on the general bearing of the question and is gradually descending to personalities—urging simply for the transfer of Lieutenant-Colonel W. Hopkinson “in the interest of the sub-division,” thereby leaving beyond doubt the fact that the memorial in question is an outcome of unadulterated personal grudge. If I remember aright, the memorialists urged in their memorial to the Local Government that as the tenure of office of the Cantonment Magistrate is limited to 5 years, they apprehend that the officers will be withdrawn when they are up in their work. The natural inference that can be drawn therefrom, is that in the opinion of the memorialists the longer a Cantonment Magistrate is retained in charge of a sub-division, the better it is for the administration of such sub-division. The further retention of Lieutenant-Colonel W. Hopkinson in charge of the sub-division, is thus indirectly hinted at by the memorialists as necessary in the interests of the sub-division.

The evil example of the Bengalee has, it pains me to notice, been followed by the other journals, such as the National Guardian, the Indian Mirror, and the Hindoo Patriot, which, instead of discussing the merits of the memorial point by point, are fully indulging in pure personal invectives. That these journalists have been biased against the present sub-divisional officer by some evil genius, is quite apparent from the very tone of their writing.

VOX POPULI.

State Paper.

No. 16, dated Calcutta the 5th January, 1888.

From—Lieutenant-Colonel W. F. Prideaux, Agent to the Governor-General in Council for the Affairs of the late King of Oudh.
To—W. J. Cunningham Esq., Officiating Secretary to the Government of India, Foreign Department.

Sir,—In compliance with the orders conveyed in paragraph 6 of your letter No. 47821, dated the 7th November 1887, I have the honor to submit, for the consideration of the Governor-General in Council, the following proposals in regard to pensions for the sons, daughters and nikah wives of his late Majesty the King of Oudh.

2. The circumstances of the family of the late King of Oudh are, to a certain extent, analogous to those of the family of Tippoo Sultan of Mysore, which more than eighty years ago was placed under the Superintendence of this Office. Both families, in consequence of events in the conduct of which they had no share, and whose issue was beyond their own control, forfeited the brilliant advantages to which at one time they seemed to have a birthright, and were reduced to a position of dependence on the Government of India. It was in their relations with that Government that the chief point of difference between the Houses of Mysore and Oudh is observable. While Tippoo and his father, Hyder Ali, were bitter and implacable enemies of the British Crown, and were the cause of an immense expenditure of blood and treasure, the successive Rulers of Oudh vied with each other in loyalty to the Paramount Power, and, at more than one critical period in the history of British rule in India, furnished assistance in money and appliances of war which were of material importance to the success of the British arms. The traditional loyalty of the family was not lost in its last representative, for whatever faults the late King may have had, my long acquaintance with him enables me to attest to the fact that, beyond a natural feeling of discontent at his reverse of fortune, his mind from first to last was free from the slightest wish to countenance, far less to instigate, any action which might tend to the subversion of British authority in India. His conduct in regard to his rebellious wife and son met with the approval of the Government of India, and the tenor of his life was in accordance with the views he held upon that question.

3. I have thought it right to make these preliminary remarks, because it seems to me that in proposing the grant of pensions to the wives and descendants of the late King of Oudh, the procedure followed in the case of the Mysore family might serve as a useful guide, and while noting the points of similarity which existed in the position of the two families, I have adverted to one important fact which does not weigh to the disadvantage of the family of Oudh. So far as I am aware, the only principle which the Government of India has hitherto laid down with respect to the grant of pensions to this family, is the assurance conveyed to the late King in Lord Canning's Kharita to his address that, in the event of his demise, his family would be liberally provided for, though of course on a lower scale than that which was considered suitable in the case of the King himself.

4. The general principles on which pensionary allowances were made to the Mysore family are contained in a minute by Lord Minto, dated 19th October 1807, and as they seem to me to be equally applicable to the case of the Oudh family, I venture to quote an extract from that document for facility of reference:—

“My first proposition then is, that, subject to modifications and exceptions which I shall notice hereafter, a fixed allowance be settled on each of the Princes, which is to defray all their expenses of every description under their own management, and in any residence approved by Government which they may choose to provide for themselves in Calcutta, or its immediate vicinity.

“That they should be made clearly to understand that the allowance is never to be increased; but is to continue the same, notwithstanding any addition to the number of their families, or any unforeseen changes that may fall upon them.

“That the allowance is to be considered as their estate, for the deficiencies of which Government will not provide any more than it does in the case of other individuals, and which will not be diminished, except in case of misconduct or abuse.

“It must be expressed also very explicitly that the settlement is made only for the lives of the present Princes respectively, and that on their decease Government reserves to itself the right of considering anew the nature and amount of the provision to be made for their descendants and families.”

5. These principles, shortly summed up, amount to this:—That life pensions, which shall not be susceptible of increase or decrease, except in case of misconduct or abuse, should be conferred upon the Princes, on the understanding that they shall defray all their expenses of every description whatever. The stipulation with regard to residence is one which it may perhaps be proper to maintain, with such modifications in respect to locality as Government may, on consideration of the question, determine to be necessary. The application of these principles will also require that the separate stipends which have hitherto been drawn by children whose parents are still alive shall hereafter be included in the pensions allotted to the parents.

6. There is, however, an important point on which it is necessary to touch, before I proceed to make specific recommendations in regard to the several members of the family. In 1860 the Officiating Secretary to the Chief Commissioner of Oudh forwarded to the Government of India, (To Secretary to Government of India, Foreign Department, No. 1468 dated 7th April 1860, with enclosures) twenty-nine cases of Jagirs claimed by members of the Holloway's Pills.—Liver, Lungs, and Kidneys.—Most diseases of these depurative organs arise from obstructions, over the removal of which these celebrated Pills exercise the most perfect control. A course of them is strongly recommended as a remedy for such chronic affections as liver enlargements, congestion of the lungs, torpidity of the kidneys, and other functional disorders which cause much present suffering, and if neglected lay the foundation of organic diseases. Holloway's Pills are specially adapted for the young and delicate; their gentle and purifying action ranks them above all other medicines. In indigestion, nervous affections, gout, and rheumatism these Pills have achieved for themselves universal fame. They expel all impurities from the blood, and thus restore cheerfulness and vigour.

royal family of Oudh with full particulars regarding them. A large number of these Jagirs were claimed by persons who were not immediately supported by the King from the stipend granted to him by Government, but with regard to those members of his family who were in that position and who therefore fall within the scope of this report, the Government of India (To Chief Commissioner of Oudh No. 173, dated 12th January 1861) held the principle "that although the King has been told that he must provide for the immediate members of his family out of his pension, still if there be property to which they are fairly entitled they must be allowed to enjoy it." In accordance with this principle, the Chief Commissioner of Oudh was authorised to continue eight of the Jagirs which were granted to the King's Begams, or other sons, or their mothers so long as there were lineal heirs, children of the King. Sanction was also given in identical terms to the continuance of sixteen other Jagirs which had been granted to the King's Begams and daughters who remained in Lucknow, but some of whom afterwards came to Calcutta.

7. The principle on which the Government of India acted on this occasion was taken exception to by the Secretary of State in Council, who, in his despatch No. 69 Pol. of the 23rd August 1862 para 7, observed that "to continue a Jagir to, or, in other words, to settle the most highly-esteemed form of pension upon a person, whose provision it was the intention of the British Government to include in the liberal allowance granted to the ex-King, is twice to provide for that person," and orders were consequently given that the resolution of the Government of India should be reconsidered. As the further correspondence on this subject is not recorded in this office, I am unable to trace the steps from which it resulted that the Jagirs remained in the possession of the grantees, while no corresponding reduction was made from the stipend of the King.

Important News for India,

WHERE FEVERS AND CHOLERA
REIGN SUPREME.

A RECENT TRAVELLER ON THE
Chinese Coast found that District remarkably FREE FROM TYPHOID FEVER and CHOLERA. He soon discovered the cause. The people there do not drink cold water from tanks or wells, often extremely impure, but keep a pan of water constantly boiling, into which from time to time they drop a little Tea, and when thirsty THEY DRINK HOT TEA! If the weak and adulterated Teas of China can do this, what may not the pure and strong Teas of India be expected to effect?

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a represen-

ation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "It serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by
SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINI DASSY
(Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohini's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE AUTUMN LEAF.

LONE trembling one !

Last of a summer's race, withered and sear,
And shivering—wherefore art thou lingering here ?
Thy work is done !

Thou hast seen all
The summer's flowers reposing in their tomb ;
And the green leaves that knew thee in their bloom,
Wither and fall !

Why dost thou cling
Fondly to the rosette's leaves ?
Has then existence aught like charm for thee,
Thou faded thing ?

The voice of spring,
Which woke thee into being, ne'er again
Will greet thee, nor the gentle summer rain
New verdure bring.

The zephyr's breath
No more will wake thee for its melody ;
But the lone sighing of the blast shall be
The hymn of death.

Yet a few days,
A few faint struggles with the autumn storm,
And the strained eye, to catch thy trembling form,
In vain may gaze.

Pale autumn leaf !
Thou art an emblem of man's mortality :
The broken heart, once young and fresh like thee,
Withered by grief :

Whose hopes are fled,
Whose loved ones all have dropped and died away,
Still clings to life—and lingering, loves to stay
About the dead !

But list !—e'en now
I hear the gathering of the autumn blast :
It comes—thy frail form trembles—it's past !
And thou art low !

THE PRAIRIE ON FIRE !

BY GEORGE P. MORRIS.

The shades of evening closed around
The boundless prairies of the west,
As, grouped in sadness on the ground,
A band of pilgrims leaned to rest.
Upon the tangled weeds were laid
The mother and her youngest born,
Who slept, while others watch'd and pray'd,
And thus the weary night went on.

Thick darkness shrouded earth and sky,
When on the whispering winds there came
The Teton's wild and thrilling cry,
And heaven was pierced with shafts of flame !
The sun seem'd rising through the haze,
But with an aspect dread and dire !
The very air appear'd a blaze !—

Oh God ! the prairie was on fire !
Around the centre of the plain
A belt of flame retreat denied,
And like a furnace glow'd the train
That wall'd them in on every side !
And onward roll'd the torrent wild !
Wreaths of dense smoke obscured the sky !
The mother knelt and pressed her child,
And all—save one !—shrieked out "we die !"

"Not so !" he cried—"help—clear the sedge—Strip bare a circle to the land !"
That done, he hastened to its edge,
And grasped a rifle in his hand :
Dried weeds he held beside the pan,
Which kindled, at a flash, the mass !
"Now fire fight fire !" he said, as ran
The forked flames among the grass !

On three sides now the torrent flew,
But on the fourth no more it raved ;
Then large and broad the circle grew,
And thus the pilgrim band were saved.
The flames receded far and wide—
The mother had not pray'd in vain—
God had the Teton's arts defied !
His scythe of fire had swept the plain !

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—These world-renowned remedies are confidently recommended to miners, navvies, and all who have to work underground, or where noxious atmospheres exist. The minute particles of coal or metal which permeate the air in such places tend to block up the lungs and air-tubes, giving rise to bronchitis, asthma and palpitation of the heart. In Holloway's remedies will be found a safe and easily used medicant, for the penetrating properties of the Ointment relieve the local congestions and the mildly laxative effects of the Pills cause the liver to act freely, and the breath to become unembarrassed. By early resort to these remedies many a serious illness may be averted, and soundness of health maintained.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

DURING the late vacation, the following official communiqué was left at our office :—

"Her Majesty the Queen-Empress of India has been pleased to confer upon His Excellency the Viceroy the honor of a Marquisate and an Earldom with the title of Marquis of Dufferin and Ava and Earl of Ava in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, which latter titles His Excellency has assumed by Her Majesty's express command."

This is very high honour, but it has been earned. May Lord Dufferin be spared long to enjoy it !

THE Civil and Military Gazette, which may well boast after the eminent firm of tailors in London we keeps a Poet, seeing that it monopolises between it and the Pioneer the lucubrations of Mr. Kipling, has unaccountably given itself up to the dissipation of punning. The unfortunate men who are doomed to remain for ever on the qui vive, on every occasion and no occasion, for a verbal conceit, were at work torturing their brains to make capital of the grand shower of titles which has fallen on the Viceroy. Their produce is welcome to the Lahore paper.

Most of the wags seem to hail from the land of Cockayne. Thus—

"'Not Ava bad title!' they say. . . 'Wondered what he'd get Avaterwards!'"

Again :—

"'More titles! Ava!—avast! an Avalanche of honours! Don't stop at six, but Av' another.'"

Here is another effort at waggery :—

"'A title. . . thanks! the Burmese Ava—tar!'"

"'Tell it to the marines!'" will probably be the Viceroy's exclamation. What a pity for the full success of this gentleman that Lord Dufferin is a landsman, though in early life he voyaged to the Arctic seas !

THE Cabool mission has been abandoned. Here is the official announcement :—

Telegraphic news received from Peshawar states that the Amir finds it necessary to go to Turkestan to arrange for the government of the Province ; proposed mission to Kabul will therefore not start.

A SECOND attempt on the life of the Czar has been averted. A Cossack with explosives was arrested at Kutais among the crowd awaiting the Emperor's arrival.

WE congratulate the Maharaja of Cooh Behar on his having got a career at last, ephemeral though it be. Colonel Nripendra Naryan Bhoop Novembers at Lucknow where his regiment now is. The Maharaja will be attached to the 17th Lancers for duty this month. If the Maharaja finds the superintendence of, say, stables in a British regiment a more pleasant and dignified occupation than governing a Principality, it is scarcely for us to complain. Each to his taste.

LORD LANSDOWNE comes out with the following party :—

"The Marchioness of Lansdowne ; the Ladies Evelyn and Beatrice Fitzmaurice ; Lady Maud Anson ; Captain Streatfeild, A.-D.-C. ; Lady Florence Streatfeild and one child ; Captain the Hon'ble C. Harbord and Lieutenant H. A. Pakenham, A.-D.-C.'s ; and Dr. and Mrs. Fenn."

FAMINE seems inevitable in Ganjam. Great distress already prevails. A serious looting is reported from Aska, where at the Serugada Zemin-dari, property valued at Rs. 10,000 has been despoiled. They have formed a Safety Committee and have called upon the Collector for more police and for reopening the Rushikulya project and other relief works. As a counter demonstration, at Govindapuram—the seat of the looters—a number of disaffected persons and had characters of the district have banded together preaching that looting is lawful. A correspondent thus writes of the Kamine Works of those parts in the Pioneer—

"The Rooshookulla project, intended to ward off famine, has been barely commenced, although planned now twenty years ago. The Chilka Canal, which would enable grain to be brought to and from the coast, is no nearer to the coast than twenty years ago. The pier which it was hoped would enable rice to be landed in spite of the surf—which in 1866 kept cargoes of rice in the roads for days from want of means of crossing it—is found to be inside the surf and is useless even in ordinary weather, when the boats can ply with no difficulty. Should rain not fall and the stocks fail, grain must be speedily imported as a reserve for the poor, otherwise Government must be prepared to hear of a heavy mortality ; even with rain now distress must be severe."

The Pioneer prefers a railway from the Central Provinces to Gopal-pore—a distance of 200 miles—to the costly Rooshookalia project.

THERE is famine in Kathiawar and Gujerat too. Thousands of persons have, it is said, during the past few days come over to Bombay from the distressed districts.

THE Viceroy descends from the Himalayan capital on the 13th instant and moves on to Lahore, where he halts on the 16th, and next day arrives at Patiala. After a halt of two days there for the festivities, he comes over to Aligarh on the 20th and visiting Sir Ahmed's College, arrives at Etawah the same evening. The next day sees the Viceroy at Raghunathpore, on the 22nd the Viceregal party leave on board Rhotas and sail for Dacca. They are timed for Naraingunge on the 26th. The next place programmed is Dacca which the Viceroy reaches by train the same day. After a stay of one day at the old capital, the party leave on the 28th, arrive at Goalundo on the 29th at 8 A.M., and returns to the metropolis at 4-30 P.M.

NAWAB MEHDI ALI has returned to India. Mehdi Hassan still continues in England to make up the difference between the Hyderabad Government and Messrs. Watson, in connection with the Deccan Mining scandals.

NEXT January, there will be an examination for filling up vacancies in the clerical establishments of the Secretariat offices of the Government of India and attached offices, at Calcutta, Allahabad and Lahore. Only 10 vacancies are expected in the Lower Division, 5 of which will be reserved for Calcutta candidates, the remaining 5 being divided between the other two capitals. There will be no examination for the Upper Division. Applications with Rs. 10 fee and other prescribed enclosures must be made early in December.

THE Eastern Herald delivers the following message :—

"The Conservatives, Liberals and Radicals, all alike love truth and worship justice, there is not a shadow of doubt that they would put their shoulders to the wheel for the sake of their fellow brethren, the subjects of Her Majesty the Queen."

THE Home remittances from the 1st April to 27th October 1888 amounted to £7,252,100.

THE choice of a third Native Judge for the Calcutta High Court has fallen on the Hon'ble Dr. Gooroo Das Banerjee.

MR. K. J. BADSHAH, Postmaster-General, N. W. P. and Oudh, has obtained 3 months' leave, Mr. A. G. Faichnie, Deputy Postmaster-General, 2nd Grade, acting for Mr. Badshah during the period.

THE Officiating Chief Magistrate Mr. Handley has fined one Goshto Behary Chuckerbutty Rs. 25 for contempt of Court for failing to deposit Rs. 40, two months' maintenance allowance for his wife ordered. The fine imposed was ordered to be paid to the wife as compensation. The pleader for the defence contended that the law allowed no compensation in such cases, but Mr. Handley thought that "as long as there was contempt, the law empowered him to impose a fine."

THE Army and Navy Gazette writes :—

"We hear from Burmah that the disease surra, always worst during the rains, has been again playing havoc among the cavalry horses in that country. E Troop, 1st Madras Lancers, has lately marched in dismounted to Meiktila from its former post, Shamayne, leading one horse, the sole surviving animal of 2 officers' chargers, 61 troop-horses, and 32 grass-cutters' ponies, which were present with the troop on May 12 last, the date on which the disease broke out. F troop has also been very unlucky in this respect, having already lost 16 troop-horses and 3 ponies from the same disease, and having 13 cases of surra now lingering on. The disease is absolutely incurable, so these, too, must eventually swell the death-roll. In other words, in one squadron, out of 110 horses, 89 have died within the last three months. Since the arrival of the 1st Madras Lancers in Burmah, just two years ago, the regiment has lost in all 371 horses. Considering that the average price of the Government remounts of the Madras Cavalry is 750 rs. for Walers (in Madras), and nearly that amount for Arabs and Persians, it will be seen how great the loss is."

Our London contemporary attributes the extent of mortality to the penny wise and pound folly of the Government of India in starving the veterinary department.

HERE is a recipe for rendering brick-walls damp-proof. Having got the wall clean and dry, treat it with a strong solution of soap and water as hot as possible, followed by a bath of 4oz. of alum dissolved in a pint of water, at the temperature of 70° Fahr. Repeat the process several times at intervals of twenty-four hours.

WHEN Europeans expatiate on the follies of Oriental Princes, they forget that there is really vastly little to choose between the East and the West. At any rate, the following does not present our future sovereign in the most amiable light :—

"It is unlikely that Colonel Maude will succeed Lord Alfred Paget as Clerk Marshall. Colonel Maude has at present a more lucrative and pleasant post. As Crown Equerry he enjoys a salary of £2,000 a-year, has a capital town residence at the back of the Royal stables; and a delightful house in Bushey Park. Moreover, he holds his position for life, and is the only Court official that cannot be dismissed at the pleasure of the Crown. The Prince of Wales, too, would certainly object to the Colonel obtaining the Clerk Marshalship, for he is not a favourite at Marlborough House. The reason of this I believe that at one time the Prince of Wales was accustomed to send to the Royal stables for whatever extra carriages and horses he might require, until the Queen, hearing of this, gave orders that none of the Royal carriages or horses were to be used without permission from Buckingham Palace. Consequently, on the next occasion that the Prince's equerry came hurrying down for more carriages, Colonel Maude declined to send them, and the Prince was very angry about it, and has never quite forgiven the Colonel."

NEW Zealand is luckier than any other part of Greater Britain. She has got a domiciled peer to leaven her population. He is no prodigy, of course, but a lord for a' that. He is, besides, rich as a lord—a distinct advantage to the Colony. Here is the latest account :—

"The Earl of Seafield, who recently succeeded to the family estates and title, after leading a chequered and erratic life in the Colonies, in which he is credited with having acted by turns as a stock-raiser, an auctioneer, a bailiff, and even a day labourer, intends to remain in New Zealand for good and all. His Lordship is expected home for a short time to take formal possession of his estates in Scotland, and to transact other business in connection with his succession to the family honours, but apparently the title has no great attractions for one so inured to Colonial life, for it is said he will take no steps to sign the roll of Scotch peers, or otherwise to actively assume it. The Earl is building a large mansion-house in North Otago for the future residence of his family."

A COMMITTEE, formed of Mr. R. G. Macdonald, Deputy Accountant-General, P. W. D., and two First grade Executive Engineers—Lieutenant-Colonel E. Harvey, R. E., Punjab, and Mr. R. A. Corder, N. W. P. and Oudh, have been appointed to shorten the Account work in the offices of Executive Engineers. They meet at once, for the report is wanted by the first March next. The enquiry will be limited to the Buildings, Roads and Irrigation Branches of the Public Works Department. Is the present Account work a clog on the free distribution of patronage? Or, is it comparatively more expensive than the expenditure it is intended to record?

MR. EARDLEY NORTON has addressed a powerful letter to the Madras Mail, in vindication of the selection of Mr. Bradlaugh as the Parliamentary mouthpiece of the National Indian Congress, and in explanation of the circumstances under which the choice was made.

THE loss of the Ostrich in the Hooghly in collision with the Port Commissioners' floating crane, is being enquired into in the Marine Court.

KAZI SYUD REZA KHAN BAHADOOR, of the Patna Division, has enhanced his educational endowment, of an estate of the annual value of Rs. 1,200 for Mahomedan youths in the Patna College and the Aligarh Oriental College, by the foundation of a scholarship of Rs. 4 a month, tenable for one year, by the best student of the Entrance class of the Patna Anglo-Arabic School. He has rightly deserved the thanks of Government "for his public spirit and liberality."

DURING October—23 days—35,541 male and 10,389 female Natives and 748 male and 257 female Europeans—in all 46,935 persons—visited the Indian Museum.

THE Patna Pleader Khodabux, aged 60, has taken to wife the ward, numbering only 13 summers, of Moulvi Kabirudeen Ahmed of Taltolla. The Pleader had brought down from Patna two bestmen with him, namely, his two sons, aged 12 and 11 respectively. This union may bring Khodabux some money but will it raise him in society or to Council? Perhaps he knows better. Was the gracious Mr. O'Kinealy the ghatak of such an appropriate union?

THE Crawford Commission opened at Poona on the 23rd October. Mr. Latham, Advocate-General, and Mr. Jardine appeared for Government to prosecute. Mr. Inverarity defends Mr. Crawford. The charges are thirty-three in number. The first thirty-two deal with bribes received in 32 sums of various amounts, amounting in all to Rs. 47,000, including a sum of Rs. 10,000 paid out of the Chief of Bhor's treasury. The last takes him to task for contracting debts in his own division while Revenue Commissioner of the Central Division. Mr. Crawford pleaded not guilty to all the charges except the last to which he partially pleaded guilty. The sittings of the Commission continue from day to day.

A WRITER in Temple Bar contributes a smart paper brimful of knowledge on the prominent members of the British diplomatic Service. Here are some of the sketches of men who mould the foreign relations of Great Britain and who have the making of peace and war in their hands :—

BERLIN.—SIR EDWARD MALET.

It was said of Lord Amthill—but this was an exaggeration—that he was the only diplomatist who could manage Prince Bismarck. No one would say as much of Sir Edward Malet; but neither would anybody assert that Prince Bismarck could manage Sir Edward. The secret of the latter's power lies in his impenetrability. A trim, thin-faced man of slight build, with dark hair and sparse beard turning grey, he might be taken in any public place for a solicitor or doctor in good practice. He has not the advantage of a commanding stature and figure; and there is nothing striking in his attire; but look at him closely, and his intellect becomes revealed in his clear, square-cut forehead and the depth of his large eyes. As regards the externals of his character, everybody proclaims him a bon camarade. When he walks out with one of his secretaries he talks with an incessant flow of animal spirits. He is frolicsome as a boy, and has a laugh ringing and cheerful as a spring breeze. But in business he is as unapproachable as an octopus. He might have a despatch announcing a declaration of war in his pocket and no body who questioned him about the chances of war would be any the wiser.

ST. PETERSBURG.—SIR ROBERT MORIER.

Sir Robert Morier's strength lies in knowledge. He stands upon his information as upon a hard pavement which he raps with a stick. With considerable vivacity of character, derived perhaps from a French ancestry, he darts rapidly to the knot of a question, guesses intuitively at the motives for human action; and brings the double acumen of an Oxford don and of a German savant to bear upon his analyses. The Germans found that he knew rather too much about themselves, and were piqued to see that he was never carried away by enthusiasm for German ideas. A professional dispassionateness, Liberal opinions of the old Whig type, and a sturdy English patriotism, render a man proof against the glamour which Teutonic successes and Bismarckian Caesarism have exercised over certain English minds. It is said that the Russians have pleased him better than the Germans; and this is not surprising. In the highest circles of Russian society, where culture prevails, there is much more open-mindedness than at Berlin. The Russian delights in polite disputations, and will discuss any new theory in politics or religion with the ardour of a man who feels that he belongs to a new country whose future is one of limitless possibilities.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—SIR WILLIAM WHITE.

He is a man of leonine aspect, tall, stalwart, with a massive forehead, a flowing white beard, and a voice like a roar: "Ah, my dear Sirr!" these words, ringing like an Irish accent, may be heard through the thickest doors of fifty paces off in a street, while Sir William with exuberant gesticulations is ramming some fact into a hard head, or some indignant remonstrance into a quivering soul. Sir William quotes forgotten protocols more readily than most men could cite the dates of their children's birthdays. His mind is an extraordinary store-house of well-classified facts, and he is continually adding to its contents. He is never for a moment idle. When at Belgrade and Bucharest he used to turn out at early morning, attend mass at the nearest Roman Catholic Church, and then mix with market-folk or other small people, to whom he would speak in their own language. His individuality is so strong that he might be called influence incarnate.

That last portrait reminds us of the late Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, and of Mr. Kinglake's elaborate and striking character of the "Great Elchee." It is a great consolation to know that Great Britain continues to produce a succession of such men, and that her relations with Turkey are still in such firm and wise hands.

THE Oojein Correspondent of the Eastern Herald gives a satisfactory account of affairs in the dominions of the Maharaja Scindhia. With a purer administration of justice, with schools primary and secondary, opened in almost all important towns and villages, with Public Works of sanitation and convenience undertaken in every direction, the country has evidently entered a new era. This seems specially the case in Malwa under the government of Sir Michael Filose. And now under Sir Suba has arisen in the classic city which is his capital—the seat of the Provincial administration—a most important institution. Sir Michael and his officers and friends have established a Library. It is under the management of a committee embracing all the talent and position of the place, as follows—Sir Michael Filose, President; Chintaman Rao Vidya, Vice President; Members:

Bapu Sahib Dhakne, the Subba Sahib, the Deputy Inspector-General Vinayak Rao Bhawe, Mr. Nazarali, Mr. Rajaji Viyas, Nana Sahib Astekar Raghunathrao Potnis Esquire, V. G. Lele Esq., Isan-ul-huq Esq., Mr. Widnel, Mr. Sewaram, Munshi Jwala Sahai, Mr. Issbhai, Mr. Ramrao Dongre Daji Nalesh and Pandit Anandilalji.

Sukharam Bapu Esquire, Secretary. Balkrishna Rao Patkar, Asst. Secretary, Raymutji, Treasurer, Messrs. Bhawe and Khat, Accountants.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

WE received late last evening the following telegram from Dacca:—

A meeting of large number of officials and reises held here to-day (2nd Nov.) to concert measures to receive Lord Dufferin. The Divisional Commissioner presided, reception committee formed for making preparations. The Nawabs and the Raja of Bhawal contribute liberally.

WE are gratified to learn that the Government of India have selected Bapu Saheb Jadon, the Senior Member of the Council of Regency at Gwalior and guardian of His Highness the Minor Maharajah, to succeed the late Sir Gunput Rao Khurkey as President of that Council. Although official intimation of the same has not yet been received at Gwalior, the news has been hailed with satisfaction by the subjects of that big territory as well as all the wellwishers of that State. Another very gratifying piece of news has also been received that Her Highness the Dowager Maharanee Saheba has been selected, by His Excellency the Viceroy, to assume the important position of the Regent of the State, during the minority of her son, His Highness the Maharaja.

This lady, who is less than 30 years of age, is highly intelligent and was given a good education by her late husband. We are told that she has acquired a very fair knowledge of Hindee, Sanskrit, Urdu and Persian, and is fully competent to transact state business. It is earnestly hoped that the administration of this large State will be carried on most satisfactorily by the Maharanee Regent, with the assistance of her father, the President of Council, as well as of the other great officers of the State. The unselfish arrangement made by the Marquis of Dufferin's Government, for the administration of Gwalior, will, we are quite sure, be a source of the greatest felicitation among the entire body of the Native Princes, as most conclusively shewing that it is not the intention of the Government of India to place such States under the superintendence of British Officials, and secondly, as proving that the Government are anxious to consult the feelings of the nearest relations of the Princes.

THE principles for the administration of Indian jails, as regards economy, sanitation and discipline, were settled after three successive Commissions—of 1834, 1864 and 1877—appointed by Government, had reported on them. But the principles followed have not been uniform. The departure in certain instances has been so great that the attention of Government has been drawn to the fact. An analysis of the statistics of various jails and prisons shews a variation in the death rate ranging from 11 to 72 per mille of average strength, a variation in the cost of maintenance of prisoners per head ranging from Rs. 44-11-7 to Rs. 91-2-10 and a variation in the ratios per cent. of punishment for offences against jail discipline ranging from 33 to 328. From these wide disparities the Governor-General in Council rightly suspects grave defects in our jail and prison discipline and has deputed Dr. W. Walker, Officiating Surgeon-General and Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India, and Surgeon Major A. S. Lethbridge, Inspector-General of Jails, Bengal, to inspect and report, among others, fully on

“(1) Jail discipline and the registration of punishments, with particular reference to the point whether the execution of sentences has grown less rigorous and deterrent than it was in former years;

(2) economy of management, including the system of purchasing rations and the dieting of prisoners with reference to the ordinary food persons of their class usually consume;

(3) sanitation and water-supply; and

(4) the financial aspects of the employment of convicts in jail, jail labour and the allotment of task work.”

in the jails of the Madras and Bombay Presidencies, Bengal, the North-Western Provinces and Oudh, and the Punjab. We think the object would have been better served by the appointment of a third person—an outsider altogether—a Jack of all trades and master of none but with some notion of affairs or at least of how the world goes. Your experts are usually too clever by half.

THE Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, with the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council, has proposed the following rule in the Gazette, to ensure the correct counting of passengers carried by steamers plying between Chandbally and Calcutta:

“Passengers going by steamer to Chandbally must be provided with a ticket; but it is left to the owners of the steamers to decide whether the tickets will be issued on the steamer or on shore.

“The tickets issued on shore must bear serial numbers, and those on board are to be taken from a book with counterfoils. Before the steamer starts, the agent shall report to the Commander the number of tickets issued on shore, and on arrival the Commander shall send this report to the police officer, together with a statement showing the number of tickets issued by himself. He must show his ticket book to any police officer desiring to see it.”

The rule is not sufficiently comprehensive. There will be no knowing how many passengers were on board before the Commander made his report to the police officer. We think the rules should be so framed that Government might at once know before the starting of any vessel or before her arrival, the number of souls on her—passengers, paid or unpaid, and all hands on board. It is not enough to know that so many paying passengers were carried. What of the unpaid ones? What of the intermediate passengers, taken on the voyage? The Commander, we think, should be made to report before the vessel left or whenever new passengers were taken in in any intermediate station, and not to leave any passenger without information to the Police or a record of the fact. Facilities should also be provided for counting the persons when landed.

THE Hon'ble Syud Amir Hossein has committed Sudhabode Bhattacharjee on a charge of murder of his infant wife Kristomanini. More criminal evidence was offered at the Magistracy than was forthcoming at the Inquest. We must be prepared for any amount of perjury in the case. To begin with, Pundit Jibananda Bhattacharjee, the father-in-law of the girl, deposed before the Magistrate that the cook and the maid-servant of the house had left him and were non est. The Police, however, traced them to the Pundit's house.

THE Vacation Bench has acquitted Head Constable Dutta Doyal and Constable Abdul Karim in the Alipore Police Torture case. The Judges hold that the District Judge was seriously wrong in impeaching the Inspector's diary, that he was strongly impressed against the prisoners and to prejudicial extent—in his charge to the Jury, and moreover that the evidence can not justify any conviction.

The case was committed on insufficient evidence, and it is almost folly to expect enough evidence against the Police.

THE Board of Revenue, Lower Provinces, has discountenanced the practice, hitherto obtaining in the Calcutta Collectorate, of granting excise passes beyond its jurisdiction—to Assam, for instance. We may now look for a change in the law.

THERE is a vacancy in the Cingalese seat in the Ceylon Legislature, by the death of the Honourable Mr. Alwis. There is great excitement in the Cingalese section of the native community on the question of filling it up. Meetings are being held to memorialise Government to press forward the claims of different aspirants, and the press is discussing their respective merits. The most prominent names are those of Messrs. Sinnevaratne, Obeyesekere and W. de Saram, who were sent for by the Governor Sir Arthur Gordon, for the purpose of testing their qualifications, doubtless. Notwithstanding such readiness, we remark that a correspondent of the insular Press characterises Sir Arthur as the most illiberal Governor that ever came to Ceylon. There is not much to choose, we fear, as regards the extreme section of the Press, between the Continent and the Island. It would be more satisfactory if our Governors took a leaf out of their Ceylon brother's book. For one thing, it might discourage the mischievous habit of an irresponsible and uninstructed Press to recommend men at random to all sorts of offices, if our rulers, by themselves or through their Secretaries, made the acquaintance of persons so indicated.

The Bombay Legislature is the only Indian Chamber filled by representative men of all communities. And this because the present Governor makes it a point to mix with the flower of all classes and to select the best men without fear or favour. Such a practice is more valuable than the concession of the principle of election. No other ruler brings such conscience to bear upon the selection of Senators.

THERE was some intimidation by the Police in Ahmedabad on Congress meetings and on the friends of the Congress. It was even said that the Police had received a circular adverse to the Congress. What was still worse it was given out by the enemies of the movement that the head of the Presidential Administration himself was opposed to the institution which was hatched and started at his capital. Accordingly, a gentleman of Ahmedabad addressed Lord Reay a note of inquiry and His Excellency has given the reply that might be expected of a responsible statesman:—

"His Excellency expresses his astonishment that after 3½ years, his principles and views should be so little known as to render it possible for any one to give credence to injurious rumours such as we have referred to. In regard to the Police Circular, he says he has never seen it, that he has never dreamt of enquiring who did and who did not belong to the Congress, and that he will never tolerate any sort of intimidation of would-be Congressists, direct or indirect; that the Congress criticises the administration, and that the administration must welcome such criticism as tending to improvement and the eradication of abuses; that his one duty and desire is to improve and strengthen the administration; and that it is, therefore, impossible for him to look with disfavour on a movement which promises so materially to assist in this work. On the contrary, his position towards the Congress is that of stage critic; in other words, that while not feeling himself bound to accept all the Congress says, he feels bound to give his most careful consideration to all it puts forward, and draw thence very possible hint for the improvement of the performance which he directs. He then goes on to refer to the absurd rumour of his having declined to distribute the prizes to the Anjuman-i-Islam School, because Mr. Budruddin has been President of the last Congress, and points out that so far from having any prejudice against Mr. Budruddin or the Anjuman on account of their participation in the Congress movement they have his full sympathy, and he has only this week directed the acceleration of the arrangements for their school for which his Government has granted a noble site and Rs. 38,000. His Excellency adds that he should have thought that such absurd stories would not have needed contradiction and, truly, to wise men they never did need it."

Just so.

Notwithstanding all that, the Education Department was caught in the act of distributing among the schools, Raja Sivaprasad-Maharaja of Benares's speech against the Congress. Mr. K. M. Chatfield, Director of Public Instruction, was asked whether he had circulated any pamphlets for the Maharaja of Benares, and in order to clinch the point, pamphlets in favour of the Congress were forwarded with a request that they might be distributed by the Department. The Director was in a fix. At last, he wriggled himself out of it by saying in answer that the only communication that he had received from the Maharaja of Benares was a letter from his Private-Secretary requesting him to distribute 200 copies of the Maharaja's pamphlet. The only communication! To this he replied that he could not distribute political pamphlets to schoolboys. But before his answer reached its destination, the 200 political pamphlets against the Congress came by post, and the consistent Director of Public Instruction distributed them to all the schools, as if he had never raised the slightest objection to such a circulation. Now that he had been caught flagrante delicti, and the inexorable Congressists would not let him out of their grip, there was no help for him but to submit to their bullying. He offered to do likewise for the Congress as he had before done against it. He would distribute at the cost of the State 200 pamphlets in favor of the Congress as he had distributed 200 copies of the Benares Maharaja's speech denouncing the Congress. He could scarcely do less after having quietly helped the enemies of the movement. But does he make the offer with a good face and a light heart? Why not more than 200 copies? Surely, he would have as readily circulated 500 or 1,000 of the Maharaja's speech if so many had been sent him, as 200. He makes a desperate effort at preserving countenance by drily pointing out the advantage the Congressists had over their opponents, in that their publications were in English which would be better understood in the Western Presidency than the Shivaprasad's Hindi. We hope Lord Reay will knock some proper notions into his Director's head. The Education Department is the last place for the Cynic.

THE Bombay correspondent of the Evening News writes—

"Certain Arabs have been doing a little swindling here of late, presenting forged letters to Nawabs and other high personages, professing to bear the seal of the Consulate. These frauds were perpetrated with a view to obtaining from the person deceived pecuniary assistance.—The Turkish Consul-General here has, I believe, reported the matter to the Government of India. He states that his private seal has been forged and affixed to a letter presented to the Nawab of Rampore. The forgery was detected, but Abdoola Bin Mahomed Maner, the culprit, very knowingly made himself scarce, and has ever since kept out of the way. The Consul also informed the Government that there are in India certain persons who pass themselves off as relatives of well-known Turkish Pashas; they dress in the uniform of the Sultan's body-guard, call themselves Rum-i-Sabihs. (rum fellows it means, I suppose) visit Rajahs and Nawabs and obtain money from them."

There are some so-called Roomee physicians about in Calcutta and other parts of India. One of them was for some months in our neighbourhood in Wellington Square, but has now disappeared. He was in the pay of a Pasha of Constantinople from whom he used to receive regularly several thousand Rupees a month, but latterly he had dispensed with this aid from home and was supporting himself by his wits—we mean the practice of medicine. He was a great Saint, of course, all Indian Mussulmans, specially in the West and the Arabian Sea coast, being disciples of his family. He was a friend of the Indian Mirror, had travelled long in Europe and knew all tongues and volunteered to teach us the Vedas and the Hindu religion. He, of course, said the other Hakeem whom Mr. Justice Romesh Chunder has given a certificate is an imposter. If the one is six, the other is half a dozen, we fear. Mr. Lambert had better keep an eye on both.

A few years ago, another Roomee Saheb, who had attempted swindling in Jodhpore, bullied the Deputy Commissioner in his own room.

WITH the impartial Anglo-Indian Press, it is the unenviable peculiarity of the natives of India in all matters to lean on the Government—so different from the sturdy and honourable self-reliance of the British! But the British are not, after all, so punctilious as they are represented. They have no over-delicate stomach for jobs, and they have rather a weakness for appointments of all kinds even to sinecures. They are, of course, too superior a people to be abashed. No extravagance deters them. The most notable example is furnished by the new number of the National Review. In that serial, Mr. F. J. Crowest deploras the condition of the English opera and concludes with proposing a state aided Theatre. Is Crowest a Baboo in disguise? A Chatterjee could not have gone beyond him.

THE Tyrolese seem the most addicted to conjugality of all peoples. In the teeth of political economy, against all common prudence, notwithstanding positive law, they plunge into it, and go on breeding swarms of drones and no end of beggars. Prohibited from marrying, unless he can show that he has laid in a sum of money sufficient to support a family, he would beg, borrow, or steal, rather than go without a wife. Sometimes a dozen or more engaged young-men, despairing of ever getting money enough to secure the permission, go on a pilgrimage to Rome, begging their way on foot, accompanied by their sweet-hearts. There, under the protection of another law, and with the blessing of the Church they perform the mystic sacrament and are united, for better for worse, for life and eternity; but, on return to their native village, they are fined by the Commune for breaking the law. We of the improvident conjugal East can sympathise with such an honest penchant. But, then, what of the demon of Cicisbeism? We hope it is the vice only of the great cities, and does not at any rate penetrate the picturesque mountains in the North.

ON the last day of the Durga Pooja, the sub-division of Narail, in the Jessore District, was clouded by the loss of its leading inhabitant. On that day Baboo Chunder Kumar Roy, the head of the Narail family, died. A pious Hindu of a fast vanishing type of orthodoxy, there was a peculiar fitness in the time and other attending circumstances of his death. At the seat of his family and the home of his birth, among his dear and near ones, surrounded by friends especially invited—as if from a presentiment of his fate—from Baranagar and Cossipore (the Calcutta seat of the Narail Baboos) and elsewhere in Calcutta and the Suburbs, to share with him the worship and festivities of the Bengali Christmas, he took his leave. No more auspicious day could be imagined for the departure of the good Hindoo on the Great Journey. It was the Maha Navami—the Ninth of the Moon—on which the national worship of the embodied Principle of Energy culminates and determines, when the spirit of the goddess takes its flight from the clay tenement into which it had descended, in answer to invocation and by the efficacy of mystic rites. On that day, the soul of Chunder Kumar the Good left in the wake of the goddess.

The deceased was a most amiable and altogether estimable man. If he was without his father's force of character, he brimmed over with graces to which that father had no pretensions. If the genius of the great Ramratan Roy did not descend to any of his line, there was no trace of his sternness in his son. He was a thorough Bengali gentleman of the old type but with adaptiveness to modern needs.

To Baboo Chunder Kumar, his family seat of Narail was not a little indebted for all the progress which it has made. It was greatly due to his liberality and progressive sympathies, that the town grew up into a model of a Zemindari township and lordly residence. The Narail School had for years maintained its position as a first class higher class English School in the province, when it was converted into a College. At no inconsiderable expense, too, has the Narail family kept up, in the best appointed style, a Native and an English Dispensary. Dr. J. G. Anderson, now a medical practitioner in our neighbourhood, was for years in charge of the Narail Hospital, on a salary of Rupees five hundred a month. Under Baboo Chunder Kumar's influence, the Narail Zemindars have never stinted any expense in providing their educational and medical institutions with the best staff that could be secured. Their munificence to Sanskrit learning used to be princely. With all his public beneficence, the deceased gentleman was remarkably free from ambition. In these days of cheap titles, he firmly resisted the pressure of well-meaning officious friends who would have him cultivate official favour towards the recognition of his public services, and it is a significant commentary on the wisdom with which honors are distributed, that an extensive benefactor of the district of Jessore dies a plain Baboo Chunder Kumar Roy, while hundreds with far inferior claims have been raised to the official peerage. Will it be believed that one of his tenants—not one of his biggest either—was by a British Magistrate kicked into a Roy Bahadur to spite his liege-lords? We offer our sincere condolence to Baboo Chunder Kumar's two surviving sons and the other members of the family.

A MUNICIPAL bye-election lately took place for filling up a vacant Commissionership for the Shibpur Ward of the Howrah Municipality. There were two opposing candidates in the field, and we hear that not less than Rs. 1,200 has been spent between them in canvassing. This may be an indication of the interest taken in municipal affairs, but cui bono? say we. What, after all, is the value of the position of a municipal Commissioner? Under the law, as it is, the ultimate control of the expenditure rests with the official authorities, and these, in their turn, are by no means indisposed to stretch their authority to the utmost limits allowed by the law. In some of the municipalities in the neighbourhood of Calcutta, the Commissioners have been deprived of the power of regulating their expenditure in even the pettiest details, and this, with every circumstance of insult and humiliation into the bargain. In the South Barrackpore Municipality, the budget prepared by the Commissioners and submitted for the sanction of the Divisional Commissioner, has been rejected in toto, and an altogether different scale of expenditure has been framed at the Commissioner's office, in the face of the most earnest remonstrances of the local authorities, and imposed on them for implicit submission. In other municipalities, the Commissioners are not at liberty to appoint an additional peon, or to give the slightest increment of pay to any of their servants. The Presidency Commissioner's raid is chiefly directed against municipal grants to English schools, but his interference extends to the pettiest details. The South-Barrackpore Municipal Commissioners talk of resigning en bloc, and if they should do so, it would no doubt be a pretty situation.

LORD DUFFERIN has again laid the Empire under obligation by an act of large liberality. He has added another native to the body of Judges of the Bengal High Court. Three Native dignitaries of the highest bench in the country at one and the same time! Surely, the "Red" orators and silly writers who see nothing but wrong in Government, and see the impersonation of Governmental fatuity and frivolity and baseness in the Viceroy, ought in mere decency, if not honesty, to pause for the nonce!

The manner of the boon has enhanced the gift. The principle of the appointment is unexceptionable, but it might have been abused in the choice of the appointee. We can rejoice with unmixed satisfaction that it has not been so. It is true that the choice was limited to two, as we showed in a leading article of the 8th September. Indeed, practically Dr. Rashbehari Ghosh was not in the running. He is at once far too brilliant and far too independent for the Court of Chief Justice Petheram. But then in these days there was great danger of an incompetent Mahomedan being pitchforked into the Bench. The gods on earth and Heaven are to be thanked for preventing such a calamity.

The Mahomedans have especial reason to be grateful. The integrity of their law could not be promoted except by a profound Arabic doctor, and none such exists who has the other qualifications necessary to a High Court Judge, or even the initial qualification of a tolerable knowledge of the language of the Court; while their manners and institutions and even their faith might be easily compromised from the influence of a nominal Mussulman elevated to the judgment seat of the highest Court. No wonder there is visible a sense of relief as from an impending disaster. We need scarcely say that it would have given us real pleasure, instead of another Hindu, to have a Mahomedan.

WE are glad to notice that there exists at Mhow a Native Music Club, established in October 1886 by the exertions or under the patronage of Sirdar Gurdatt Singh, Rai Bahadur Pandit Bala Pershad, and last not least Khan Bahadur N. M. Khory, foremost in every good work. On Sunday the 30th September, the second anniversary was held at the Sirdar's house, under the presidency of Babu Radha Nath Banerjee, the President. Besides the gentlemen named, there were four Srimant Rao Sahebs, Chief Justice Baij Nath, Pandit Hurnarain, Mr. Somerje Parpia, Babu Gurudas Bose, several respectable Parsee residents and about fifty others. There were not only no Europeans but no Mussulmans either, apparently, except one Kasim Khan. The Chairman opened the proceedings with the reading of a short address. We are told "the Secretary Mr. Muncher Shah B. Raji then sang a song composed for the occasion the Master playing what Harmonium." The closing clause of that sentence is a riddle. That "what" is a formidable stumbling-block. It is unparseable. Supposing it to be an intruder introduced by the imps of Pandemonium, "the Master" still remains in all his mysterious glory. Who the—imp is he? The Secretary's song to the Master's harmonium "was followed by Babu Poorna Chunder Seal one of the leading members of the club playing at guitar when he finished Mr. Harry Bhow played different times on the same instrument." "Times" we suppose is a misprint for tunes, for the guitar is no drum to play the different combinations of tune upon, unless by guitar the Pathan Rabab is meant, which is a stringed instrument upon a drum giving the musician a double advantage, to some extent. Next "The renowned Pakhoji or Drummer Nana Sahib Phanse and a Beenkar (player on a double end guitar) played at their favourite instruments to the great joy of the audience. Rai Bahadur Pandit Bala Pershad also amused the audience by playing a Flute Harmonium. Mr. Kasim Khan played wonderfully on the same instrument and charmed the audience."

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1888.

THE NATIONAL INDIAN CONGRESS.

A FEW PLAIN HINTS OF SOBER TRUTH TO THOSE WHO CARE FOR IT.

THE National Indian Congress is in danger—from the unwisdom of its leaders. An institution fraught with momentous effects on the future welfare of the people, it must be keenly regretted if the indiscretions of its own friends should threaten to despoil it of its just destiny. So far, the moderation of its proceedings was its most hopeful feature. Without too closely enquiring into the constitution and organization of the first meeting of the Congress at Bombay, its subsequent Sessions at Calcutta and Madras went far to reassure the wavering and even inspire confidence in the mind of Government. Some of the highest officials came to regard it with more favor, and it is still an open secret that the present Government of India are disposed to make a substantial concession to its demands. Barring the unfortunate split with the Mahomedan community, all this augured a happy progress of events. Towards this position of things, the contributing agent was chiefly the character of sobriety and moderation in the proceedings of the Congress. The very pretence of this has now been abandoned, and, at the present moment, we have the strange spectacle of the Congress posing before the British public at home as a most uncompromising Liberal propaganda.

We call it a strange spectacle, because this is the first signal instance of an Indian party going clean over to any English political camp. In the best days of the British Indian Association—when the staid influence of sober counsellors like Kristo Das Pal directed the course of Indian politics—or in all the subsequent political activity of Bombay and Madras, our leading men always avoided the vortex of English political controversy. They never made the mistake of identifying themselves with any English party. They relied on the fact that the destinies of India were in the hands of the English Government, and they went no farther. They realized the fact that, apart from the chances and changes of their own political affairs, it was the substantive justice and liberality of the British nation that must, in the long run, influence the affairs of this country.

This has been the procedure of Indian politicians so far. In all their representations to the British Government, they scrupulously steered clear of burning questions of British politics. And very naturally. What could be the influence of their feeble voice upon the course of English party Government? On the other hand, the evil of exasperating one camp, by throwing in their lot with another, must have been real, sooner or later. We are not a little surprised, therefore, at the attitude assumed by some representatives of the Indian Congress of late, in disregard of all precedent—all our traditions. Our surprise is the more to find a man like our eminent countryman Mr. W. C. Bonnerjee laying himself out in the way he has now been doing, for the purposes of an ill-judged political agitation in the Radical interest. In our friend Mr. Bonnerjee's case, it is almost a falling off. Having hitherto kept himself from politics, one is at a loss to account for his sudden bursting forth into an out and out stumping Radical. Mr. Bonnerjee was filling with ability the office of Standing Counsel to Government in the Calcutta High Court, and we fairly looked forward to his one day being our Advocate-General. That would have been a greater gain in our present circumstances than the appointment of a dozen Native Judges to the several High Courts. His very official position naturally imposed on him restraints which might well dictate a more cautious and delicate dabbling, if at all, with politics. Fired with a zeal for the Congress, he might yet eschew the temptations of party. He might be guided by the example of moderation set by his countrymen in past years. It would seem, however, that the whole Congress is under foreign influences—that its lines are fixed by the hands of foreigners, and our countrymen are not the leaders themselves, but under the fascination of other leaders.

The Mahomedan defection—who again is responsible for the sorry spectacle of a house divided against itself? Not, for aught we know, the Mahomedan seceders. No proper and sufficiently cordial effort was made to secure their adhesion. The Bombay Congress met at the instance of a handful of men—the recognized leaders of Indian public opinion having had no place in it. Even the best of them had not been consulted. This mistake was to some extent rectified in the more constitutional procedure of the Calcutta Congress, and also of the last sitting at Madras, but the defect and practical evils of the original irregularity are incurable. The Mahomedans might well say they had not been thought of at first. This was a slight, and they might well bargain for guarantees against future slights. They might well apprehend the fate of being left in a miserable minority in the public or confidential deliberations of the body. The cut and dried plan of campaign incontinently affected by the leaders, left little hope of fair play. For the rest, Sir Ahmed's opposition is a turn in things which the leaders of the Congress have to thank themselves for. It is the very indiscretions of the Congress men that have provoked that rejoinder. Who, for instance, could be really taken in by the sham agitation concocted from Calcutta by the foolish extravagance of Surrender Nots and No Renders—by their sham telegrams of sham meetings, with exaggerated accounts of attendance, and of proceedings all cast in the same mould? The foreign training of some of our educated countrymen seems to have made them apt imitators of British forms and ways, but did they expect to keep their skill to themselves? The light they set up on the hill has illumined the valley, and, armed with their own weapons, Sir Ahmed has paid them back in their own coin. We never spared Sir Ahmed, but, in justice to him, it must be confessed that his propaganda is a legitimate retort to the Congress. There is about as much reality in the exuberant exhibitions of the one as of the other.

THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA AND THE LOYAL OFFER OF THE NATIVE STATES.

THE Government seem at length to have decided upon some plan for utilising the military offers of the Native States. To begin with, the Durbars of Patiala, Jheend and Nabha and Kappoorthala have been invited to send their delegates to a conference at Simla to hear the imperial views and say how best they could carry them out in their respective States. The Government plan has the merit of simplicity, whatever the cost to the Princes. We hope they will submit with grace, unless the burden be excessive. With what face can they complain? They have themselves invited the yoke and there is no help for it but to bend the neck. They have opened the embankment, what wonder if they are swept away by the flood? If they commenced lightly, following a fashion of the hour, without counting the responsibility, they will be rightly served for their culpable neglect of the difficult art of kingcraft or at least for their sin of not securing and trusting wise companions and able, enlightened and strong ministers. Even now, it is not too late. They should begin to put their houses in order instanter, or the consequences will be truly disastrous. Without the Government of India intending it, the present call will prove the beginning of their end. They must reform their administrations, if only to provide the ways and means for the additional drain without the ordinary Indian grace—not the increased cost simply, but the cash payment thereof at due dates. That is a horror yet un contemplated by Raja or Nawab and for which primitive races are unprepared.

The main question is no longer an open one. In fact, there has never been any question about the contemplated object. Whatever our disgust at the discreditable and foolish, because unnecessary, intrigue which was practised on the Nizam in the connection, and our contempt for its authors, the importance of the interest in which the trick was played is obvious. With a little patience and tact, and the proper exercise of legitimate influence, that interest would have been subserved all the same, and it is no small regret that the honor of a great policy should have been so causelessly sullied in the carrying out thereof at the very start. The Empire must be maintained, and it goes without saying that the native states, which are its natural buttresses and pillars, must support it. They preserved it once, in 1857, in gratitude and enlightened self-interest. For the same reasons, they must continue to do so hereafter whenever the need might arise. It is their duty—a task of honor and a necessity of self-preservation.

Since the above was in type we learn that Ulwar has asked for the services of a European officer to put her military establishments on an efficient footing, so as to be in a position to serve the Empire, and Major Melliss has been deputed from Simla on a mission to Cashmere to consult the Maharaja personally on the state of his troops. This consultation with a native Chief personally is usually a blind. In the present state of Cashmere affairs, it must be more than ever unreal. What can the Maharaja say? What does he know? The first step should be to allow him a capable minister. How long will this jealousy of constitutional rule in Native India continue?

[This article has been lying in type for some months until its facts are somewhat out of date, perhaps. Our views are our own, however, and they have not been anticipated during all this time.]

ITALIAN ATTITUDE TOWARDS FRANCE.

NATIONS, like individuals, have their virtues as well as vices. Even so have they their rewards and penalties. Some have been famous for their teachery as others for their generosity. Some are esteemed for remembering their benefactors, while others are execrated for ignoring services in critical times. A notable instance of national ingratitude is afforded by the Italians in their present attitude towards France. It is a miserable case of kicking the ladder when you have gained your height. If there is any one nation more than another, to whom Italy is indebted for her unification and independence, it is unquestionably the French people. Other countries may have lent her their moral influence in her struggles to free herself from foreign domination and home misrule, it was France that shed her blood and lavished her treasures to secure her the desired boon. Italy could not, within so short a time, have attained, as she did, her present position and influence, without the material assistance of France.

Italy, as every reader of European history knows, was divided into a number of petty states, each of which considered its interests distinct from or even hostile to those of the others. The policy pursued by the States of the Church was shaped more for the promotion of the Pontifical interests than for the welfare of the people. The same was the case with the other states. The interests of the people were subordinated to those of the reigning Houses, and not unfrequently sacrificed for individual advancement. Nor was Austrian domination less galling in Italy. Indeed, domestic misrule and foreign oppression crushed the Italian people, so that they became a byword and a reproach among nations.

It was the French, who, by conquering Italy in their Revolutionary Wars, first awakened in the Italian mind a foretaste for political homogeneity. That conquest proved the possibility of a United Italy. The vision of United Italy with Rome for its capital, dimly seen by Dante and sadly sung by Petrarch and others, was verified by the French, and, although many an attempt for its realization proved abortive, it never died out of the Italian mind. As the great English Bard who so loved, and long lived in, Italy, and died for her sister peninsula of Greece, truly teaches—

For Freedom's battle once begun,
Bequeath'd by bleeding Sire to Son,
Though baffled oft is ever won.

The history of Italy for the last 60 years, is emphatically the history of struggles of the Italian people to make that vision a reality. It is true that the facile pen of Mazzini, the puissant arm of Garibaldi, and the farseeing sagacity of Cavour, did much to bring about the final result, but their contributions would have been far less effective, had they not been actively seconded by French co-operation. Patriotism without powder and shot is a cry in the desert. Diplomacy has no locus standi where there are no battalions, in esse or in posse, in the background. And guerillaism of even Heaven-born generals goes but a small way against Quadrilaterals and regular armies. Were it not for the substantial patronage of a Great Power, Italy would, in all human probability, be still only "a geographical expression." It was France that not only helped Italy to expel her foreign oppressors and her home tyrants, but also to retain her advantage. Montebello and Magenta and Salferino will remain the lasting witnesses of what France had done for Italy. And yet, for all this, how shabbily she has been treated by the Italians! They have abandoned her alliance and transferred their allegiance and friendship to her enemy. The present isolation of France is to be attributed, in a great measure, to their attitude towards that country. They do not even scruple to insult her!

Italy's ingratitude to France has not passed without comment or rebuke. It was only the other day, that one of the Generals in the Italian War of Independence directed his sons, by his will, to migrate into France and become naturalized subjects there. Italy, said the hero, was no longer worthy of his sons.

How unlike the treatment France has received from the people of the Great Republic of the West, whom she aided in their struggles for independence! What reception the citizens of the United States accorded to the French General who fought their battles with all a Frenchman's chivalry and devotion, is now matter of history. In that Greater Britain, France is respected, her interests are cared for, her reverses are sympathized with; and if their constitution permitted it, the Americans would have repaid their debt by giving her material assistance in the time of her need. If ingratitude in individuals is reprehensible, it is equally so in nations, which are but bodies of individuals in political union geographically distributed.

"Ingratitude! thou marble-hearted fiend,
More hideous, when thou show'st thee in a race,
Than the sea-monster!"

THE PERSONAL HAPPINESS OF MAGISTRATES.

THE sensation which a few years back was caused in India by Mr. Justice Field's prosecution of her Indian nurse, must be still fresh in the mind of the reader. It now appears that the great dignity of the Bench was not more fortunate in his choice of a wife than his employment of an Ayah—Indian nurse. It is certain that the retired Judge Charles Dickenson Field of our High Court was not happy in his English home. He seems to have long struggled manfully—Mrs. Field bore Mr. Field six children—but to no purpose, until he utterly grew sick of his wife, and separated. In March last, she presented a petition to the Divorce Court for restitution of conjugal rights. He met the application by charging her with cruelty. That charge was subsequently withdrawn and the decree went against him by default. Still he refused to receive her as wife. There was a fresh petition to Court by the wife, and Sir James Hannen has pronounced a decree of judicial separation with costs, and the custody of the children.

The charge of cruelty is not uncommon in such cases, but it is usually preferred by the woman against the man. Here the usual order is reversed. The stronger vessel complains of the weaker—the pewter pot dreads the propinquity of the clay handi—or, as the Indian vessel of unglazed earth may do an injustice to the fine White lady, let us say, Dresden China. As a Judge, Mr. Field was not a success, but he was a man of undoubted ability, and has enriched Indian juridical and state literature. Even though his temper is not of the best, such a man is not likely to rush to the public thoroughfare to wash his dirtiest domestic linen. And Mr. Field did not do so. When he could not get on with his formidable spouse any longer, he simply separated from her. It is the wife that would force herself upon her routed and retreating husband. It was then, under compulsion, when she claimed her conjugal right to bed and board in the society of her husband, that the poor man was out with his secret—that she was intolerable for cruelty. And the experienced matrimonial British Kadi-in-chief was convinced of the justice of his allegation, and took pity on him so far as to release him from the fetters of a most disagreeable connection.

The world with mistaken chivalry too often blames men in such quarrels. Here at least the man is the true object of pity. Here the grey mare is the—worse horse; it would scarcely be unfair to call her the tigress. As we have hinted before, Mr. Field was far from a paragon of good temper himself. It must be a tigress that could get the better of the bear—in the little domestic passages at arms that must have occurred in their common den, before the Judge could decently escape to the fastness of the court-house, or after he was driven back from the latter at the end of the day's judicial work. As we remember him in office, Mr. Field was of a Saturnine aspect and a morose disposition, which not unoften broke out in curt little speeches to practitioners before him, occasionally in savage insults, as when at Moorshedabad he came down on Baboo Gooroodas Banerjee, just elevated to the bench of the High Court from which the other has retired, for a failure of English on one occasion, with the remark in Indian vernacular, that the Pleader should address the court in his mother tongue (the Bengali). Who could have thought that the poor British Judge was haunted by a skeleton in his heart?

This revelation is far from pleasant in any aspect. A Gooroodas Banerjee may afford to smile at a desolate Field. Such men are not snuffed out by an individual monster on the bench. But inferior Vakeels and practitioners—and the world abounds in inferior men—must suffer in silence. Above all, what an amount of injustice is not perpetrated by administrators who are unhappy at home! How many of those who lost their cases before Judge Field owed their misfortune to Mrs. Field! For this reason, at all events, the domestic affairs of our rulers—judges, criminal and civil, in especial—are worth inquiring into by the public.

Are there no desolate Fields still remaining—to the misfortune of the Queen's lieges?

State Paper.

No. 16, dated Calcutta the 5th January, 1888.

From—Lieutenant-Colonel W. F. Prideaux, Agent to the Governor-General in Council for the Affairs of the late King of Oudh.

To—W. J. Cunningham Esq., Officiating Secretary to the Government of India, Foreign Department.

22. In addition to these sons, there are two children who were recognized by the late King as his own offspring and who each received from him an allowance of Rs. 90 per mensem. The names of these children are (1) Khadim-ul-Aima Mirza Muhammad Ijaz Hossain Bahadur, and (2) Kisra Bakht Mirza Muhammad Abbas Hossain Bahadur, and their age is seven years. Under the orders conveyed in your office letter No. 581-P., dated 4th January 1881, to the Secretary to the Government of Bengal (Political Department), these children have not yet been officially recognized, nor have I deemed it advisable to pay them since the death of the King the allowances which they formerly received. Looking to the purport of these orders, I do not think it necessary to discuss the question of the legitimacy of these children, but in consideration of the fact that they have hitherto been treated within the precincts of the palace as the offspring of the King, and have no means of support beyond what they may receive from the bounty of Government, I would venture to suggest, for consideration, that they should each be granted as dependants of the late King the sum of Rs. (90) ninety per mensem as a pension terminable on their death.

23. There are seventeen surviving daughters of the late King, each of whom draws, under the scheme of the Committee, the sum of Rs. 110 per mensem. Of these ladies, the eldest, Nawab Sarir Ara Zainab Begam Sahiba, is married to a son of the late King's nephew Jehan Kadr Mirza; the next in point of age is married to a son of the late King's younger brother, Sulaiman Kadr Mirza; eleven are the wives of gentlemen of good family at Lucknow, and four are residing unmarried at Garden Reach. Only one of these, Nawab Badshah Ara Kaniz Hadi Begam Sahiba, is motherless. I have received several memorials from these ladies, of whom the majority are in indifferent circumstances, and would venture to recommend that they each, with the exception of the eldest, be granted a pension of Rs. (150) one hundred and fifty per mensem which is slightly in excess of the allowance which they have hitherto drawn from the King, namely, Rs. 110 per mensem. The position of the eldest daughter merits, I think, exceptional treatment. The following allowances were drawn by her and her husband:—

Nawab Sarir Ara Zainab Begam Sahiba	...	110	per mensem.
Jahan Kadr Mirza (husband)	...	90	„
Mustafa Begum Sahiba (daughter)	...	45	„
Mooteza Begam Sahiba (daughter)	...	45	„
Sarar Jigar Begam Sahiba (daughter)	...	25	„

Total Rs. ... 315 per mensem.

On attaining the age of fifteen, the daughters under the Committee's scheme (paragraph 20 of Report,) as modified by Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal (No. 1850, dated 31st August 1880, paragraph 10,) would draw Rs. 70 per mensem each, which would raise the total emoluments drawn by the family to Rs. 410 per mensem. The Mirza was also many years ago granted the use of a house within the precincts of the Sultan Khana, or royal residence, the value of which can not be estimated at less than Rs. 100 per mensem, and which he will probably be called upon to vacate when landed property belonging to the estate is in course of realization. In order therefore to compensate the family for the losses they have incurred by the King's death, I would propose, for consideration, that the eldest daughter, Nawab Sarir Ara Zainab Begam Sahiba, be granted a pension of Rs. 500 per mensem, together with an allowance for house rent of Rs. 100 per mensem, it being understood that the allowances hitherto drawn by Jehan Kadr Mirza and his children shall lapse in accordance with the principle which I venture to think should be followed in the bestowal of these pensions. As the Mirza draws a pension of Rs. 1,500 per mensem as a collateral relative of His late Majesty and also possesses other small sources of income, I consider that the additional sum of Rs. 600 per mensem should be sufficient to maintain the family in a manner befitting their rank. If the Begam were to predecease her husband, the question of the continuance of her pension could be considered by Government upon its merits.

24. My proposals for pensionary allowances to the grandsons of the late King will of course have reference only to those whose fathers are no longer living. These are five in number—

1. Kara Shappar Mirza Muhammad Jah Ali Bahadur; and
2. Mirza Kurrat-ul-Ain Bahadur, the children of the late Wali Ahd, Prince Mirza Muhammad Hamid Ali Bahadur.
3. Maimanat Mirza Gholam Ahid Bahadur, son of the late Kara Hussein Mirza Bahadur.
4. Mirza Faridoon Jah Bahadur; and
5. Mirza Humayun Kadr Bahadur; the sons of the late eldest son Prince Faridoon Kadr Mirza Huzbar Ali Bahadur.

The last three of these grandsons of His late Majesty are below 15 years of age, and therefore under the Committee's scheme would only draw Rs. 80 per mensem, while the two elder ones draw Rs. 120 per mensem, and would be entitled to an additional grant of Rs. 50 per mensem on marriage, or an aggregate of Rs. 170 per mensem each. In modification of this arrangement I would, after full consideration of the subject, recommend that the grandsons over the age of 18 years be allotted pensions of Rs. 300 per mensem, while the three others should draw Rs. 120 per mensem, to be raised to Rs. 300 on reaching the age of 18. It is proper to mention that the two sons of the late Wali Ahd are the legal heirs of the Nawab Khas Mehal Sahiba, who is a lady of considerable property, but she is so much under the influence of a distant relative, who is known by the name of Pearsa Sahib, that it is doubtful if they will succeed to more than a small portion of the inheritance. The two youngest boys are also co-sharers in the estate of their late father, the Prince Faridoon Kadr Mirza, which is in the hands of the Administrator-General, and is in course of administration by a suit in the High Court, but after the costs of litigation have been met, it is doubtful if there will be a large balance in favour of the heirs. I do not think therefore that these contingencies should affect the scale on which pensions may be granted to the grandsons.

25. Under the principle upon which these proposals are based, there is only one surviving granddaughter of His Majesty who has a claim to pension under the Committee's scheme (paragraph 29 of Committee's Report). This is Kishwar Ara Begam Sahiba, the infant daughter of the late Prince Faridoon Kadr Mirza, who was granted by the King, not long before his death, an allowance of Rs. 70 per mensem. I would propose that this young lady, who is now only 7 years of age, be granted a pension of Rs. (45) forty-five per mensem until she reaches the age of 18 or is married, when the pension should be raised to Rs. (90) ninety per mensem for life.

26. There is however a granddaughter of His late Majesty who no longer draws an allowance, but is I venture to think entitled to the favorable consideration of His Excellency in Council. This is Nawab Dilbund Begam Sahiba, the daughter of the late Wali Ahd, Prince Hamid Ali Bahadoor. About two years ago she married a young nobleman of Lucknow, who unfortunately died, leaving her completely penniless. Under the Committee's arrangements (paragraph 29 of Report) the allowances made by His late Majesty to granddaughters differed from those made to daughters in the fact of their being only payable "up to marriage." On this young lady's marriage, therefore, her allowance ceased, and she returned to Calcutta, where she has since been supported by her grand-mother, the Nawab Khas Mahal, and her brother, Mirza Kurrat-ul-Ain. She has suffered severely from illness during her stay in Calcutta, and being entirely destitute of means, her situation is extremely precarious. In view of the exceptional circumstances of her case and the fact that with the exception of Kishwar Ara Begam, she is the only fatherless granddaughter of His late Majesty, I would strongly recommend, for the favorable consideration of the Governor-General in Council, that Nawab Dilbund Begam Sahiba be granted a life pension of Rs. (90) ninety per mensem, which would be sufficient to meet her wants.

27. The following are the names of the widowed daughters-in-law of His late Majesty who have been granted allowances from his treasury :—

1. Nawab Shahryar Bahoo Sahiba ; and
2. Nawab Begam alias Keykob Mahal Sahiba, widow of the late Wali Ahd, Prince Hamid Ali Bahadur.
3. Mahrjehan Begam Sahiba, a widow of the late Prince Khosh Bakht Bahadur.
4. Hoozoor Mahal Sahiba, a widow of the late Prince Faridoon Kadr Mirza Bahadur.

28. The case of Nawab Shahryar Bahoo Sahiba was discussed in paragraph 31 of the Committee's Report, and an allowance of Rs. 350 per mensem was, in consideration of the position she formerly occupied, recommended, but reduced to Rs. 200 per mensem by orders of Government. I would venture to propose that this sum be granted to her as a pension for the remainder of her life.

29. The Nawab Begam alias Nawab Keykob Mahal Sahiba also draws an allowance of Rs. 200 per mensem under the circumstances detailed in paragraph 32 of the Committee's Report. She is the mother of Mirza Kurrat-ul-Ain and Dilbund Begam Sahiba, who have been mentioned in preceding paragraphs. She has no other means of support than her allowance, and I would therefore recommend that she receive an equivalent sum as a pension henceforward.

30. In the case of Mahrjehan Begam Sahiba, the Committee (paragraph 33 of Report) accepted the King's proposal that she should be allowed Rs. 50 per mensem on the ground that she lived with her mother-in-law Nawab Akhtar Mahal Sahiba, who was wealthy and that she had therefore no expenses of her own. I have already pointed out that the statement regarding the Nawab Akhtar Mahal's wealth is no longer in consonance with facts, and as she was married to the King while His Majesty was still on the throne at Lucknow and is advanced in years, her daughter-in-law cannot expect to enjoy for a great length of time the advantage of living with her. The Begam belongs to a respectable but not wealthy Moghul family of Calcutta and on the death of her mother-in-law will be left without any means of support beyond her pension. She is a lady of exemplary character, and is fully deserving of the consideration of Government. I therefore venture to recommend that she be granted a life pension of Rs. 100 per mensem, which would be sufficient to ensure her comfort if she resided with her family.

31. Hoozoor Mehal Sahiba is the mother of Kishwar Ara Begam (see paragraph 15) and was granted by the King an allowance of Rs. 30 per mensem upon her husband's death. This allowance she has hitherto refused to accept, on the ground that it is totally inadequate to her position and requirements. I consider there is much force in her objections and I am not aware of any reason why she should be placed on such a different footing from the widows of Prince Hamid Ali Bahadur. I would therefore recommend that, as the principal surviving widow of the late eldest son of His Majesty, she be granted a life pension of Rs. 100 per mensem.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a represen-

ation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence, of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY-DASSY (Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem.—The Calcutta Review.

Important News for India,
WHERE FEVERS AND CHOLERA REIGN SUPREME.

A RECENT TRAVELLER ON THE Chinese Coast found that District remarkably FREE FROM TYPHOID FEVER and CHOLERA. He soon discovered the cause. The people there do not drink cold water from tanks or wells, often extremely impure, but keep a pan of water constantly boiling, into which from time to time they drop a little Tea, and when thirsty THEY DRINK HOT TEA! If the weak and adulterated Teas of China can do this, what may not the pure and strong Teas of India be expected to effect?

Also in tins ½ lb to 10 lbs of various qualities to suit all tastes.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE STEPMOTHER.

BY DR. JOHN B. M'CAHE.

THEY tell me I am motherless ! they say my mother died
When I was but an infant child, and that I sobbed and cried.
They tell me too, that she who sets me often on her knee,
Is not my mother—yet she is a mother kind to me.
Her face is very saintly calm, her eye is very mild—
She kisses me full oft, and says, I am "her pretty child !"
And often, when she thinks I sleep, her soft hand pale and fair,
Is laid upon my infant brow, and then she breathes a prayer.
When sickness o'er my frame has spent its very weakening powers
She pulls for me, and brings them in, spring's earliest, sweetest flowers—
And when my racking fevers rise, and soothing draughts I'd sip,
She gently raises up my head, and cools my parching lip.
And when she sees that slumber's veil is gathering o'er my eye,
She pats my cheek, and sings to me the soothing lullaby.
And O ! I dream so sweetly then, of angels' visits here,
And wake and find it true—for she, sweet one, is hovering near.
And when I get my little books, she teaches me to spell,
Till words so difficult to call I learn so very well—
And then she sweetly kisses me, and smooths each straggling curl ;
And makes me love her when she says, " You are my own sweet girl."
Mother, I love her ! from thy home 'mid heaven's eternal rest,
Where tears of anguish never fall, nor sorrows heave the breast,
I know thou'lt smile to see thy child hath found a mother's love,
In one whose dove-like spirit shall mingle with thine above.

YEARNING FOR WONDERLAND.

From the German of Schiller.

Ah ! that I could wing my way
Through earth's valley—deep and dreary
Ah ! that I could float all day,
Pinions never tired or weary,
O'er the everlasting hills,
And the ever gushing rills,
Where come blight and sorrow never,
Ever green and youthful ever !
Where heaven's harmonies resound,
Holy Peace forever singing ;
Where light Zephyr sports around,
Odors from the flower-buds wringing ;
Through the trees' dark foliage dancing—
O'er the fruit all golden glancing—
By no wintry blast affrighted—
Kissing the soft flowers delighted :
Flowers that never lose the sun ;
Never close the laughing eye ;
With existence never done ;
Know not what it is to die !

Woe is me ! what rolls between ?

'T is a rapid river rushing—
'T is the stream of death, I ween,
Wildly tossing, hoarsely gushing ;
While my very heart-strings quiver
At the roar of that dread river !

But I see a little boat

The rough waters gently riding ;
How can she so fearless float ?
For I see no pilot guiding,
Courage !—on ! there's no retreating ;
Sails are spread in friendly greeting.
On, then, on !—in love we trust !
The white-armed sails a message bear :
" There are wonders everywhere :
The wondrous faith wherein you stand
Must bear you to the Wonderland ! "

THE LONGING.

From out this dim and gloomy hollow,
Where hang the cold clouds heavily,
Could I but gain the clue to follow,
How blessed would the journey be !
Aloft I see a fair dominion,
Through time and change all vernal still :
But where the power, and what the pinion,
To gain the ever-blooming hill ?

Afar I hear the music ringing,
The lulling sounds of heaven repose,
And the light gales are downward bringing
The sweets of flowers the mountain knows.
I see the fruit all golden glowing,
Beckon the glossy leaves between ;
And o'er the blooms that there are blowing,
Nor blight, nor winter's wrath hath been.

To suns that shine forever yonder,
O'er fields that fade not, sweet to flee :
The very winds that there may wander,
How healing must their breathing be !
But lo ! between us rolls a river,
A death in every billow raves ;
I feel the soul within me shiver,
To gaze upon the gloomy waves.

A rocking boat mine eyes discover,
But, woe is me ! the pilot fails !
In, boldly in ! undaunted rover !
And trust the life that swells the sails.
Thou must believe, and thou must venture,
In fearless faith thy safety dwells :
By miracles, alone, men enter
The glorious land of miracles !

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

THEY are doing the word sanitarium to death. Nothing but a sanitarium now! It is stated the Maharaja of Cashmere has presented a plot of ground to the Parsees of Jummoo for a sanitarium for themselves. For a Parsee settlement, we suppose. All Cashmere is a sanitarium, like all Darjeeling.

THE capital sentence on Chuttoo Mehter for murder of his sister-in-law, has been commuted to transportation for life. The reason alleged for this act of mercy is that he was suffering from temporary insanity when he committed the deed. This is being just by half. On the ground stated, the prisoner should have been pardoned and set free.

YET another invention—to swamp the telegraph and the telephone. Professor Elisha Gray of America is said to have come upon an instrument by which the sender of a message can, by writing it at one end, instantly reproduce it in his own autograph to authenticate it, at the other end.

THE Whitechapel murders have driven more than one Englishwoman mad. One has died and another has been committed to a lunatic asylum.

H. H. Mir Ali Murad Sahrab Khan Talpuria of Khairpur, Sind, and Raja Muhammad Amir Hossein Khan Bahadoor of Mahmudabad, Sitapur District, Oudh, have been made Life Councillors of the National Association for supplying female medical aid to the women of India. They have subscribed Rs. 5,000 each to the Countess of Dufferin's Fund.

LORD LANSDOWNE has chosen as his Private Secretary Colonel J. C. Ardagh. He will not, however, be due in India till after 3 months of his Lordship's arrival.

THE Viceroy, as we announced last week, leaves Simla on Tuesday, the 13th, and, after visiting Lahore, Patiala and Dacca, arrives at Calcutta on Thursday the 29th. The Marquis of Dufferin and Ava will be accompanied in his tour by Her Excellency the Marchioness, Lady Helen Blackwood, Lady Hermione Blackwood, by the Private, Military and Foreign Secretaries, the Viceroy's Surgeon, by four A. D. C.'s, and by another gentleman, Mr. J. McFerran.

THE Lieutenant-Governor returns to the capital on Monday the 12th, but not to stay. Next Wednesday the 14th, he starts on his Orissa tour, arriving at Chandbally on the 15th and at Cuttack the next day. After a halt there of three days, on the 20th he moves on to Khoorda, to Pooree on the 22nd, and to False Point on the 24th, reaching Balasore on the 25th. He stops here for 2 days. On the 28th, to Nilgiri and back. Leaving Balasore on the 29th, Sir Steuart Bayley comes back to Calcutta on Friday the 30th, that is, one day later than Lord Dufferin. Who then receives the Viceroy?

WE note with gratification the Gazette announcement that Mr. R. C. Dutt, Officiating Magistrate and Collector of Mymensingh, is confirmed in that appointment. Mymensingh is a most heavy and difficult District, and it speaks not a little for the confidence of Government in this gentleman that it should be entrusted to a native officer. We may mention in this connection that Mr. Dutt is not the only "Baboo" in it. He has for Lieutenant in charge of a litigious Subdivision—Jamalpur of evil notoriety—a Hindu officer of great promise, Mr. Barada Charan Mitra, the Champion Statutory Civilian, whose masterly essay has already turned the tide of public opinion in favour of his branch of the Service, against the doom pronounced on it, at the instance of irresponsible ignorant agitators, by the Public Service Commission.

WE have just received news from Midnapore. Society is "exercised" at the prospect of losing its favorite physician. The good Civil Surgeon of the district, Dr. A. Tomes, is very likely to be transferred to Patna. There is honey in the cup of gall, however, in the fact that another equally good and popular officer, Mr. J. Pratt, the officiating Judge, is confirmed in his appointment.

A COURT of Session for the Singbhoom district has been sanctioned at Purulia.

EMIGRATION to the French Colonies of Martinique and Guadeloupe has been prohibited by the Governor-General in Council.

FROM the 3rd of this month, the postage duty on letters from British India to the British Australasian Colonies has been fixed at 5 annas per half ounce or fractions of half ounce.

ON payment by the Ahmedabad Municipality of Rs. 2,000 as composition for stamp duty on that behalf, the debenture loan for Rs. 4,00,000 which that municipality has been allowed to raise, has been exempted from any stamp duty, otherwise chargeable, whether on issue, renewal, subdivision, or consolidation.

FOR quicker mail service, and as an experimental measure, a special mail train has been ordered for eight weeks, commencing with Wednesday, the 20th February 1889. The cost has been calculated at Rs. 1,546 per week. To make up the sum, letters by the special will be charged a special fee of 1½ anna—that is, the rate will be 6 annas per ½ oz. instead of 4½ annas—and none but fully prepaid letters will be carried. Only first and second class passengers and their servants bound for Bombay will be admitted into this train. It will leave Calcutta every Wednesday at 8 P.M., arriving at Bombay on Friday at 3 P.M., in time for the departure of the mail from Bombay. The permanency of this new accommodation for Calcutta will depend upon the success of the experiment.

AT the request of the Lieutenant-Governor, the Trustees of the Bengal Distress Fund have made a second grant of Rs. 1,000, making a total grant of Rs. 2,000 up to date, to the Central Relief Committee at Midnapore, of which the Collector is Chairman, and Deputy Collector, Mr. U. C. Mookerjee, Secretary, and Rs. 1,000 to the Commissioner of Orissa, with a request to the Collector of Cuttack to make over to Mr. Worsley any balance of former grants in his hands for the same purpose.

They have also given Rs. 600 to Mr. C. W. Bolton, Collector of the 24-Pergunnahs, for the purchase of Bora paddy seed to aid the people in the southern portion of that District whose crops have been destroyed by flood. The devoted Roman Catholic Missionaries in that part of the District have undertaken to superintend the distribution of the seed grain and to report to the Collector.

WHAT is Europe coming to? The end seems nearer than it ever was suspected. Vanity Fair—one of the London Society papers—in the number received three weeks ago, refers to the Bible as an indecent book and compares it with the "Decamerone" of Boccaccio.

It is not to be wondered at that the writings supposed to have been inspired by the phallic god should not be overpure, but it is sad to think that the mind of man can be so dominated by tradition that he can consider it right to place such archaic literature, without careful editing, in the hands of children in this country.

The unenlightened Western man, unable to follow the leaders of thought—the Darwins, Spencers, Huxleys, Proctors, &c., who have cast off the chains of the mind, still reverently bows the knee to the Trinity in Unity and Unity in Trinity. It is but a thin veneer of civilization that covers him; scratch it and the savage and his fetish are at once disclosed. The world is much the same in essentials, in all its parts. Ignorance is ignorance and superstition, superstition all the earth over.

COLONEL PARRY NISBET, Commissioner, Rawal Pindi, succeeds Mr. Plowden in the Cashmere Residency.

THE Dewan of Baroda, Rao Bahadur Lukshman Jagannath, is expected to retire shortly, when Dewan Bahadur Manibhai Jasubhai is to take his place.

HAVING drained his treasury, the white Mahrattas about the Nizam have advised him to invest what little might be left of it in a new Mint, with extensive works and scientific machinery for coining—air, we suppose. Already, it is said, half a lac has been sanctioned for machinery, and Rs. 15,000 for buildings. A monthly sum of Rs. 15,000 will be required for necessary establishment. Of course, an engineer has turned up capable of turning out better coins than now obtain, if the bullion be forthcoming. He is also capable of introducing modern scientific appliances for their manufacture—at any cost.

THE Maharaja of Benares has been very ill and fears were entertained of his safety. The Viceroy, through his Private Secretary, telegraphed a message of inquiry which was hopefully replied to, on the Maharaja's behalf, by Raja Siva Prasad. We are glad to hear that the old Reis is considered out of danger.

THE Presidential Elections in America have been carried by General Harrison by 65 votes over the head of President Cleveland.

WE are glad to find at last a disposition in Government to check the Loot that openly goes on, on all sides. The G. I. P. Railway Company voted Rs. 5,000 to Mr. F. W. Stevens for special services in designing and carrying out the new Victoria terminal building, Bombay. The Government, it is said, have vetoed the grant, as in their opinion Mr. Stevens had had enough remuneration while actually engaged on the work.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL HARRY TREVOR BULKLEY, Bombay Staff Corps, an officer of the Regular Force, is being tried by Court Martial, at Mhow, on no less than fifteen charges—of fraudulent misapplication of various sums of money, or deficiencies in the account, to the prejudice of good order and military discipline. They are reducible under five main heads :

“The first has to do with a sum of money paid to the credit of the regiment for charpoys made over to the 30th Bombay Infantry, part of which sum, it is said, was paid in to Colonel Bulkley's private account, and retained by him. Secondly, deficiencies are alleged in the half-mounting fund amounting to Rs. 5,000. Again, Colonel Bulkley is charged with having on different occasions drawn cheques upon the regimental band fund, aggregating in all Rs. 3,800, and appropriating the money to his own use. The hutting allowance accounts are also alleged to show a deficiency of Rs. 2,815; and finally the charge-sheet states that, exclusive of the above deficiencies, Rs. 10,085 is wanting from the regimental cash balances and unaccounted for.”

The prisoner, in defence, made a statement to the following effect :—

“Regarding the first charge—that relating to the Rs. 533—he contended that this sum should have been deducted from his January's pay drawn in February 1887, when he proceeded to England after his regiment arrived in Bombay from Quetta; but said that when informed by the Paymaster, that the amount was still due—this was in March last—he paid it at once. Regarding the Rs. 672 he urged, that the prosecution having failed to prove that the money reached his hands, he could hardly be charged with its fraudulent misapplication. He added that, on the contrary, he had shown by the Bombay Bank's letters, and telegrams that the cheque for Rs. 672 was cashed by one Ramchand, whom prisoner never saw or heard of, and whose whereabouts could not be traced, although prisoner had applied to the Police Commissioner at Calcutta to try and find him. Respecting the general deficiency of Rs. 5,187, he explained that the sum of Rs. 2,980 was credited in the regimental books, Rs. 1,312 advanced to the Paymaster when prisoner was in England, and Rs. 166 paid to the native officers discharged owing to the late Bombay riot. The evidence he thought tended to support his statements, and to show that his deposit of Rs. 4,200 with the regiment would more than cover the balance due.”

MR. ARTHUR CRAWFORD, as befits the veteran of the Bombay Civil Service, is great even in his fall. He is a Grand Old Man under a cloud. The Impeachment of Warren Hastings was reduced to twenty Articles. There are as many as thirty-three charges against Mr. Crawford. He is accused of corruptly receiving money from the following persons, as follows :—

No.	From	Name	Amount
1	From	Balgovind Sindekar	Rs. 2,000

The peculations are, with a single exception, all mean even for a Menon and utterly beneath the Lord of a Divisional Government, but in the aggregate, they contrive to obtain some dignity.

The thirty-third charge avers that he borrowed money in contravention of the terms of his covenant. To this, Mr. Crawford put in the following statement :

“I admit having borrowed sums of money from the persons mentioned as witnesses to the 33rd charge down to and inclusive of Sorabjee Cowasjee Captain. I admit being indebted to Latha Ebrahim, but the said indebtedness did not arise from borrowing transactions but is the balance of a running account for goods supplied. I admit having borrowed Rs. 2,000 from Govind Bodharao, but I do not admit at the time of such borrowing that his son was a Karkoon in the Mamlatdar office at Athni, or to my knowledge in the Government service. I do not admit borrowing money from the Administrator of Eshwantrao Kashirao. I do not admit that I borrowed Rs. 300 from Mr. K. B. Pendse as a loan. I do not admit that I borrowed money from Ganesh Balal Maleker. I do not admit that I borrowed money from Vishun Bapujee Soman. I do not admit that I borrowed money from Ganesh Chunanjee. I admit that Ramchund Krishna Shahane supplied oats, paying cart-hire in June, 1888. I am not able to admit the amount as the account has not been yet sent to me. The Bijapore china purchased in 1883 mentioned under the name of Narayen Chintan and Soman was bought by Sir James Fergusson and other members of the Governor's party, including myself. The mamletdar was told to settle with the various sellers and forward the china. I subsequently collected from the purchasers the sums due by each, and the mamletdar was paid in 1883. Save as aforesaid I do not admit the allegation with reference to the purchase of Bijapur china. Save so far as herein expressly admitted I plead not guilty to the 33rd charge.”

UNDER the head of Facetiae, we read in the Madras Argus :—

“George, dear,” she said, reproachfully, as she clung fondly around his neck, “why will you eat raw onions when you know you are coming to see me?” “Merely to test your love, my precious,” replied George. A correspondent writing from London says that Sir Lepel Griffin is not likely to return to India.”

According to the Overland Mail, Sir Lepel hesitates to return to India on account of the depreciated rupee.

DR. CHAMBERS having gone on leave, Syud Ameer Hossein, Northern Division Magistrate, has, in addition to his own, been put in charge of the Colonial duties.

MR. COLMAN MACAULAY has been placed on special duty in connection with the scheme for reduction of expenditure rendered imperative by the frontier expeditions. Mr. Cotton officiates as Financial Secretary to the Government of Bengal. He seems to be good for any Department. He acted for Mr. Nolan while that General, Revenue and Statistical Secretary was on special duty to report on Lower Burma as a field for emigration.

RAJA SIVA PRASAD has so long been allowed to do just as suits him at the Holy City of his residence, that he naturally forgets that the Railway is not the Maharaja. This mnemonic lapse is near landing him in the criminal court, for forcing open the barriers leading to the Dufferin Bridge, when the barriers were closed for the passage of a down train. The Traffic Inspector, Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway, has reported that the titled schoolmaster drove up to the bridge, and finding the barriers up, set his syce down who undid the chains. At that time a train was almost immediately due on the bridge, and had it arrived up to time, the consequences might have been awful. The Raja's account is that, when his carriage reached the barrier, the gates were locked, but the gates were soon after opened for the passage of a country cart, and taking this opportunity, his coachman passed over immediately behind the cart.

ONE Baranoshy Chowdry, of Dhoshia in the interior of Howrah, aged about sixty and apparently in good health, was playing at cards when he, throwing a card with some degree of excitement, fell down and was picked up dead.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

BURMA is to be raised to a Lieutenant-Government. That may be some consolation to the Upper Burmans as soon as they can reconcile themselves to a foreign domination.

WEDNESDAY week, after nightfall, Madras was visited by a storm. The wind attained a height of 46 miles, the gusts were more violent still. The barometer fell to 29", the lowest of the last 28 years. Nearly ten inches of rain fell. Many trees were uprooted blocking the roads; the leaves of standing trees were twisted and blackened, the branches hanging down. The native huts were entirely swept away, and several buildings were damaged, specially in the roofs. The storm was highest between 8 and 9 P.M. The British India Line Bhandura, with the other steamers in port, was ordered out to sea on Tuesday afternoon. She fell into the storm, and having suffered terribly, had to be towed into the Madras Roads on the 3rd instant. She leaned fearfully on her side, otherwise as she had ten feet of small beer—mixture of beer and water—in the hold, in which the casks floated gaily about, neither crew nor passengers could enjoy the situation. Her awnings were gone, the fires extinguished and the engines clogged, and from 9 o'clock of Wednesday night to 2 o'clock on Thursday morning, when she was about 40 miles out at sea, she was completely at the mercy of the elements. She had over six hundred coolies on board. Five of these were killed and twenty severely wounded.

As usual, most of the papers have copied the Pioneer's telegrams, without trying to understand all their mysteries. The Pioneer wails themselves were hardly better of in that regard, we suspect. Their Madras man played on them—landsmen up in the country where a sailing sloop would be a curiosity—a practical joke, by wiring such sea gibberish as that the Bhandura "has a considerable list to port," which we have in the above paragraph reduced to Her Majesty's klax.

What hid'st thou in thy treasure-caves and cells?
Thou all-devouring and relentless wave!
—Pale glistening pearls, and rainbow-coloured shells,
Which gicam low down the Hoogly's muddy cave?
—Keep, keep thy riches, melancholy stream!
We ask not such from thee.

Yet more! the billows and the depths have more!
High hearts and brave are gathered to thy breast!
They hear not now the booming waters roar,
The battle-thunders will not break their rest,
—Keep thy red gold and gems, thou stormy grave!
Give back the true and brave!

Give back the lost and lovely!—those for whom
The place was kept at board and hearth so long,
The prayer went up through midnight's breathless gloom,
And the vain yearning woke 'midst festal song!
Hold fast thy buried isles, thy towers o'er-thrown—
But all is not thine own.

To thee the love of woman hath gone down,
Dark flow thy tides o'er manhood's noble head,
O'er youth's bright locks, and beauty's flowery crown,
—Yet must thou hear a voice—restore the dead!
Earth shall reclaim her precious things from thee!
—Restore the dead, Oh stream!

Following the Marine Enquiry on the loss of the Ostrich, as if to spite the verdict of the Court—no body to blame—another ferry steamer, with its load of human freight, has been gathered to the treasures of the Hoogly. The Mongola, owned by Messrs. Hoare Miller, on Monday evening last, sank off Metiaboorj, in mid stream, in collision with the steam-tug Clive. The ferry steamer was in charge of a Serang, Miiza Ali, who, finding the vessel in distress, after the manner of the commander of the Ostrich, attempted to escape but was traced out. The Police were better advised on this occasion, the head interesting himself in the matter. They immediately hurried to the scene of disaster and have been unremitting in their efforts to recover dead bodies and making enquiries as to the persons saved and lost. The Serang has been placed before the Magistrate for negligent navigation and the Coroner will hold inquests on the dead bodies recovered and identified.

The missing passengers up to date have been ascertained to be:—Babus Nobin Chunder Doss; Ashutosh Mukerji; Mohendro Nath Ghosh; Nemye Chunder Chatterji; Monwarilall Bose, assistant to Dr. Mohendro Lall Sircar; Hurry Churn Chatterji, clerk, Municipal office, Calcutta; Jogendro Nath Banerji, ticket collector of the Mongola; Hurry Dass Pal, a cooper with Messrs. Cutler Palmer and Co.; a woman named Bhundie Dasse, maid servant of Babu Srinath Chowdry, of Andool, who had gold and silver ornaments on her person to the value of about Rs. 250; Babus Annoda Charan Acharjee; Bhuban Chunder Ghose, a zemindar of Sankrail; Giridhur Shaha, a wealthy wine merchant of Mashita, Bhootnath Dass, Blona Mullick, Doyal Chunder Paramanick, a cooper with Messrs. Kellner and Co., Grish Chunder Dey; and Surruth Chunder Bose, a merchant of Bantra.

The following is a list of those who were saved:—Babu Surjoo Coonar Mukerji, a clerk in the employ of Messrs. Cutler Palmer and Co.; Babus Jogendronath Roy; Nogendro Nath Roy, both also with the above Company; Anath Nath Roy; Troylokhonath Sircar; Babu Dwarkanath Mukerji, a clerk of the Public Works Department; Babu Jogendro Nath Ghose, a clerk in the office of the E. I. Railway, Store Department; Babu Kissory Mohun Mukerji, a clerk of the Military Department; Babu Upendro Nath Gluttock, a Government clerk; and Babu Otool Chunder Mullick:

We are enabled to add four names to the official list of the lost—of four Mahomedan gentlemen of position belonging to Muthaboorj, namely, Hamidood Dowlah Bahadur, one of the prominent officers of the late King of Oudh, and his brother-in-law, Mirza Mahomed Hossein, Moulvie Syud Hossein Sabir—second son of the celebrated Moojtahid and scholar, Shumsul Olama Mufti Syud Mahomed Abbass—and Hakeem Akbar Hossein. The corpse of only the last named has been found and identified, the bodies of the others not having yet been recovered.

It is time, however, that these passenger-carrying vessels should be placed under control and supervision by Government under strict rules, and that Government should shake off its lethargy and lay down and enforce the rules. It is strange that since the losses of previous years, no means have yet been adopted to know the exact number of souls in a passenger steamer. If Government had done its duty, we could have known how many persons there were when the Mongola went down to the bottom of the river. The passengers were all natives, and the last year's enquiry has shewn that no help is to be got from our people. These carrying companies are a great convenience, and the country and the state ought to be grateful to them. But they are but human, and all necessary precautions should be taken to ensure the safety of the passengers, without checking the enterprise.

The Harbour Department tried to raise the Mongola, but she was too weak to stand the chain passed under her, and she was cut in two.

WE have at length received confirmatory news from the spot of the new arrangements for the administration of Gwalior already announced. We translate from our Correspondent's despatch.

On the afternoon of Monday the 5th instant, a Grand Durbar, composed of all the noblemen and leading gentlemen, was held at the Jai Indar Bhowan Palace at Gwalior, for the installation of Madarool Mahiam Mookhtarood Dowlah Krishna Rao Bapoo Sahib Jadon Feroze Jung Bahadur, as President of the Council of Regency, in the place of the late Rajah Sir Gunput Rao Khurkey. The Resident, Colonel Bannerman, accompanied by Mrs. and the Misses Bannerman, arrived at the Palace, and was received at the steps, and led into the Durbar Hall, by Bapoo Sahib Jadon.

After His Highness the Minor Maharajah and the Resident had taken their respective seats, and the assembly had paid them their respects, the Resident rose and read out the khurrectah Of His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General, which announced that His Lordship had been pleased to appoint His Highness the Junior Maharane Sahibah Regent of the Gwalior State, during the minority of her son, His Highness the Maharajah, and to make her father, Bapoo Sahib Jadon, President of the Council of Regency. The latter then rose, and, in an appropriate little speech in Urdu, offered the grateful thanks of His Highness the Maharajah, of Her Highness the Maharane Sahiba, and of himself, for the great and genuine interest evinced by His Excellency the Viceroy and the Government of India, in the welfare and prosperity of the State.

Aitar and pan were now distributed and the Durbar came to an end. Salutes were fired in honor of the Resident, the Regent and the President.

THE arrangements made by the Viceroy for the administration of Gwalior have caused the greatest possible gratification throughout the Scindhia's Dominions, and are hailed with genuine satisfaction by all the subjects and well-wishers of the intervening and surrounding Native States. The name of Lord Dufferin—they have not yet mastered the new titles—is blessed as that of the protector of the Indian Rulers and cherisher of native rights and dignities.

ON the 7 instant, a Durbar was held at the Gwalior Palace, at which Nazars were presented to Her Highness the Regent Maharanee Sahibah, by all noblemen and gentlemen entitled to the privilege.

THE late Commander-in-Chief of Gwalior, General Sir Bapoo Saheb Avar, who was decorated with the insignia of a K. C. I. E. at the Chapter held in Calcutta, in the beginning of this year, having recently died, the post has been given to Appa Sahib Angrey, a distinguished nobleman of Gwalior and a member of the Council of Regency.

HAKHEEM SYUD KAZIM ALI KHAN has been appointed Vakeel Durbar and Private Secretary to His Excellency Bapoo Sahib Jadon Bahadur, the newly appointed President of the Council of Regency at Gwalior. This gentleman is the nephew of the late Hakeem Syud Ihsan Ali Khan, who was for many years the trusted Vakeel Durbar of Gwalior in the time of the late Maharaja Jyaji Rao Scindhia, and has been educated in England.

WE habitually keep ourselves at a respectful distance from the wisdom of the Indian Mirror as from the eloquence of the Bengalee. But we occasionally come upon the precious outpourings second-hand, in the columns of our far off contemporaries to whom Ditch water doubtless comes sublimated by the well-known enchantment of distance. Thus we read in the Advocate of India a characteristic Mirrorial puff direct of Mr. A. O. Hume, the Father of the Native Congress. It is as follows :

"For the services to the Government during the Mutiny, Mr. Hume was made a C.B. He retired from the Civil Service after he had risen to be a Secretary to the Government of India. Had he continued in the service, he would without doubt have been Lieutenant-Governor of the N.-W. Provinces long ago. But he cared little for power and high office. His sympathies were not bureaucratic. The incentive of 'filthy lucre' was wanting in him, for he possessed a comfortable fortune of his own, and this he has been spending in divers ways for the good of the land of his adoption. A man in a million! And this is he whom the enemies of this country have reviled and libelled for the last five years. Anglo-Indians, official and non-official, in the press and out of it, have made it a business of slandering Mr. Hume, because he entertains certain convictions, and has the honesty and courage to act up to them. They abuse him, because he will not allow them to trample upon truth and justice, upon given pledges, upon the rights of the Indian people recognised even by the Crown."

The Indian Mirror has the best of all reasons to be grateful to Mr. Hume, who has been the making of it: while he is glad to find the only native daily a convenient organ and a ready tool. He is its constant and by far its best contributor, imparting to its columns whatever signs of cultivation they ever bear. A paragraph from Mr. Hume is worth all the open letters and secret leaders of the unfortunate Parsee, whose family, in their plenitude and fervour of their affection, have sent him out on his wearying round, his return apparently postponed sine die (vide letters to the Mirror purporting to be from his own mother and brother). The Mirror is dreary enough as it is, but without the help of the Humes it would have been a frowning block of Ditch water ice of a native company, or an impenetrable block of timber from a fossil forest. To his many obligations for a series of years conferred on the paper, Mr. Hume added in December last a signal one on the editor which the latter could not afford to ignore. At the National Congress at Madras, he was sent away crying, in consequence of his exclusion from the conclave of twelve formed for the government of the Congress, when Mr. Hume relented and wiped the patriot's tears by finding room for him.

Except as a contribution of gratitude for the past and the future, the passage quoted above is not creditable to a writer who, whatever may be his deficiencies, is old enough to remember the antecedents of the subject of his adulation.

There are almost as many misstatements in the Mirror as there are sentences.

It scarcely becomes a native journal to extol the Mutiny services of that North-West Magistracy which is mainly responsible for the popular sympathy with the mutineers and for the popular bitterness towards the White man, which rendered the Sepoy outbreak so dangerous. We shall some day see old Ricketts of Moradabad presented to our admiration, we suppose? The less said about the doings of the officers of Government, civil and military, stipendiary and honorary, in those days, the better for their reputation and the cause of loyalty to England. Had he remained in the service, Mr. Hume would have been Lieutenant-Governor, N. W. P., long ago? Possibly. In that case, the man had not the patience. Perhaps he knew better than his eulogist. The truth is that Mr. Hume retired in a pet, because he was not made a Member of Council, and had, of course, no hope of the higher prize. And this is "the man of heroic mould,"

• But clearest of ambitious taint ;—

the official who did not care for power and high office! Why, his dogmatism and love of power are a source of infinite weakness to his dear child the "National Congress." His sympathies were not bureaucratic? Is not the evidence all the other way? During all the long period he was in service, did anybody hear of him as a liberal Indian politician, to say nothing of a gushing friend of the down-trodden natives starving for want of Representative Government? Did he not actually commit himself in black and white—nay, in print—against the people of India? He may now find it agreeable to soil his old nest, but so long as he was in the Covenanted Civil Service, he was undistinguishable from the rest of his brethren, except for a more than ordinary contempt for native claims.

It is all very well for poor Margaret to cry—

I now can see with better eyes

And worldly grandeur I despise.

But what is the value of late professions of self-illumination and self-denial without repentance? Even now, he refuses the light and poses, with visible satisfaction of the world-worldly, as the Gooloo Govind of the Indian National Congress.

'Twere beautiful to see

Once more a shepherd of mankind indeed,

Who loved his charge, but never loved to lead ;

One whose meek flock the people joyed to be !

But where is such a leader? Echo, alas! answers, Where?

BEFORE the Durga Pooja we were glad to learn that Mr. C. W. Bolton, the Magistrate-Collector of the District, an officer of unquestionable ability, himself went to Barrackpore to inquire into the defalcation case. Cannot any of our correspondents trace the result?

THE giant has been floored by the boy. Pandit Ajoodya Nath, one of the most respectable up-country Congress men and the most eloquent Urdu orator of the cause, has, it is said, received a crushing reply from Master Surjoo Pershad, a puny politician, who has not yet received his toga virilis, being still in the status pupillari at Benares. The anti-Congressists do not care to hide their satisfaction at the rise of such a prodigy in their ranks, and have presented the boy with substantial tokens of their appreciation, pour encourager les autres, doubtless. Raja Siva Prasad, in his capacity of the custodian of the Maharaja of Benares's conscience, sent some money to the Principal of the College for Surjoo Pershad. Baboo Pramada Das Mitra the most intelligent and accomplished Reis of the Holy City, though a Baboo to the backbone for a' that—on his own hook, moral and pecuniary, sent another sum. Principal Muir, however, returned the donations. He recognised the benevolence of the donors' intention, but urged that the Government instructions against officials recognising any political movement whatsoever were stringent and admitted of no evasion.

The donors were far too earnest to resume their grants. In fact, Baboo Mitra, as a good Hindu, could not receive his back, and the titled Jain had not given his own. So the presents were sent direct to the lucky student.

THE Evening News commenced with many flourishes—a bad sign—but it acquired in no time such an unenviable notoriety that we gave it up. It lent itself to the dissemination of calumny, libelling men at the malice of others. It was thus that we, among others, were attacked. Not that we had given any offence or it had taken any. We had the best of reasons for sparing each other. No love could be lost where none existed. Nor was there room for hate, because no point of contact—no relation. Between the high caste organ of the pure Indians and the journal of Shabby Gentility and the Great Unwashed, there was, of course, no competition. Nevertheless, we were game, fair or foul did not matter, to the new game-keeper. We say game-keeper, for the sportsmen were other folks—outsiders. We were set up as the target for the practice of the braves and Badmashes—Parsee, Bengali and Frank—in the Burdwan Raj. We became, so to say, the bull's eye for the butt of Bun Behari's asses's horns, but that asses have no such anatomical promontories, except perhaps in their domestic relations. Thus, evening after evening, these creatures were led out to knock their poor pates hard against us. But we did not feel. Many were the low personalities indulged in at our expense by our new contemporary. We, however, stirred not. The News next found comfort in the fact, of which it duly informed its readers, that proceedings were about to be taken against us in the courts by its patron the puissant Lala. But the young journal could scarcely brook the delay of the Raj lawyers, and so it proceeded to dish us forthwith. Then appeared an absurd account, meant to be sensational, of a pack of Mahomedan urchins led by an apocryphal Moulvi to the banks of the Banka, the rivulet of Burdwan, to protest against the crimes of Reis and Rayyet, and burn its offending Editor in effigy. We never cared a straw what stupid use was made of the likeness of our noble person, so long as nobody was rash enough to approach the original with any hostile views. But some of our friends, without our knowledge, took the trouble to inquire, and learnt that there was not an atom of truth in the News's account: there had never been any talk of making a grievance of anything we wrote, by any portion or fraction of the public, and there was no such Mahomedan, whether Moulvi or not, as was said to have headed the burning demonstration. On the contrary, they found that, except among a few hangers-on of the party in the ascendant in the Raj, we were popular in Burdwan, and the people at large were grateful to Reis and Rayyet for undertaking the risks of telling the truth, in the interest of an ancient House. We could perceive, from the News's columns themselves, the convicted blackguard who had been supplying it with the little lies on the subject, some of whose absurd Burdwan fictions in the same paper we had exposed before. No reparation was ever made to us. Nothing more was said even of the prosecution against us, the prospect of which had been seized by such honourable organs as the Indian Mirror and the Bengal Times. No wonder, we ceased to look at the News.

IT was, therefore, with agreeable surprise that, chancing, after the late holidays, to glance at the paper, we found a remarkable change. The Evening News was no longer the flimsy filthy rag. The promises made at starting were at length being, so far as possible, made good. Formerly, to a great extent, the Evening News was an evening réchauffi of the morning papers' overnight telegrams, while the editorial department was so weak that it was questionable whether there was any responsible editor. Now it was matterful, and specially good in non-official news of all kinds. What was more to the purpose, it had ceased to be the disreputable thing it was. Having once thought differently of a new brother, we think this acknowledgment, awkward as in the prolixity of the introductory explanation it may look, is due. We now read the News with pleasure, and may quote it without reproach.

No sooner said than done! Here is a smart paragraph which would be admired in any part of the world—Bœotia of course always excepted:

"It is said that the medical profession in Poona are racking their brains to discover the cause of a new fever that has made its appearance in that place. It is a malady of a peculiar type and confines itself solely to the Brahmin community. The symptoms are a depression of spirits in a financial form, loss of understanding, bewilderment of reason, incapacity to answer questions at a cross-examination, an inclination to make rambling statements especially when in a witness box, a partiality to rob heartshorn (Robertson) &c., &c. After a lengthy exchange of technical ideas on the subject, the faculty have arrived at the conclusion that the fever be termed the "Inverarity fever!" The remedy suggested as a cure seems as simple as it would be efficacious. It is, perfect rest by retirement from official life, with wholesome exercise in the way of hard-labour for a period in accordance with the severity of the malady."

The medical profession in Poona are scarcely worth their salt, if they are so much at sea in regard to the pathology of this famous disease. Roundly speaking, it is a moral dissipation—a sliding on a lower plane of conduct—brought on by evil communications and undue temptations, and resulting in certain overt acts which, by repetition, become habit. Usually, its earliest symptom is an unaccountable intolerable itching of the hands and fingers, which is temporarily relieved by handling money in gold and silver coin and small notes of Government Currency and putting it in the pockets. Our contemporary misses the true etiology by calling it the "Inverarity Fever." It would be more to the point to name it the Labouchere Fever of the Huq non Huq œdema. The Mahrattah Brahmins of the Western Presidency are the veriest fry who may be allowed to suffer in silence. It is the white Brahman whales of the farther West who are the most important patients. They have converted the India Office into a great Hospital. Our contemporary would do the British Empire enormous good, if it could make the Gorsts and Stracheys and others accept his simple cure.

THE DRINK FLOOD :

OR, THE OUTSTILL SYSTEM OF EXCISE.

THE outstill controversy has entered on another phase. Mr. Westmacott's investigation of the subject has laid bare many of those very defects which from the first were observed by the unofficial public, and brought to the notice of Government, of course in vain. His enquiry was, indeed, confined to the districts of Hooghly and Howrah, and if it has disclosed grave departure from the rules laid down by the Excise Commission, if it has established the existence of irregularities in the administration of the outstill system in a metropolitan area well under the shadow of the Board of Revenue, how much more serious must be the mischief it is working in the country at large, may well be imagined. That there has been a serious lowering of the price of liquor, and that no restriction has been placed on the distiller's natural desire to extend his manufacture and his sale of the cheapened liquor, have been completely established by the enquiry. Mr. Westmacott's report is about as complete a vindication of the unofficial public complaint, as it could well be, and Sir Stuart Bayley's Resolution on the subject is perhaps the first official document in which the working of the outstill system has been examined in a fair impartial spirit. In saying this, we, of course, except the Excise Commission's Report. The Excise Commission was too well alive to the weak points of the system, and if it nevertheless recommended its maintenance in sparsely peopled tracts, and even its extension into urban areas, it did so under the belief that the restrictions and safeguards which they proposed would go far to nullify its evils. The subjoined extract from the Resolution will bear out this view:—

"Notwithstanding that the recommendations of the Excise Commission in regard to the capacity of stills and fermenting vats have been nominally introduced, it has been found that the effect of these measures has been practically neutralized, and the consumption of intoxicating drink increased by the selection of inappropriate sites for shops by an unduly low rate of duty being fixed on the estimated consumption in calculating the upset price of the stills, and by the capacity of stills and vats originally fixed being afterwards increased in proportion to the fees the abkars were willing to pay for their licenses, thus giving rise to an undue cheapening of liquor and offering improper facilities for its sale in the interior and its introduction surreptitiously into the urban and suburban areas under the fixed duty systems. It is not too much to say that the safeguards which the Excise Commission considered absolutely essential to justify the continued existence of the outstill system have in this tract been so little kept in view that the system became scarcely distinguishable from that which in paragraph 102 received the severe condemnation of the Commission as being likely to foster the very evils which Mr. Westmacott's report has brought to light. On this point the Commission say in comparing the sudder distillery with the outstill system:—

'There is no difference in principle between the two systems, provided care be taken to limit the producing capacity of the outstills, and to make the revenue paid on each proportionate to its capacity. On the other hand, there is a radical difference between any system under which stills are taxed according to their producing power, or a duty is levied on the amount produced, and any system under which the distiller obtains the privilege of making as much spirit as he can on payment of a sum fixed without reference either to the amount actually produced by him or his means of production. The Commission have no hesitation in condemning the latter for all times and places, whether it takes the form of outstills without limit of producing power, or farms, or any similar arrangements.'

The Lieutenant-Governor accepts generally the views contained in the whole of this paragraph, and whatever may be his decision ultimately as to the possibility, under proper safeguards, of so working the outstill system as to free it from the reproach of artificially stimulating the sale of an unnecessarily cheap liquor, he is confident that in this instance those safeguards have not been carefully applied, and the reproach above indicated has been incurred because the system, to which alone the Commission gave its approval has not been properly, and with all its necessary restrictions, introduced. Its introduction at all into this tract was an exception to the general policy adopted, and it was therefore especially desirable that there should be no relaxation in the safeguards which were recommended. It is probable that in other parts of Bengal the errors brought to light by Mr. Westmacott may equally obtain; and without attempting to decide, without further experience, whether the outstill system, as safeguarded by the recommendations of the Commission, can ultimately be maintained, the practical matter for immediate consideration is the reform of errors in the administration of the system actually in force over the greater part of Bengal."

The Excise Commission, at any rate, was free thus from the settled bias in favor of the system so characteristic of the normal official mind—itsself the monster offspring of bureaucratic discipline and esprit de corps. The officials, taking their cue from the Revenue Board, held the outstill system as the thing after all—a grand discovery, in fact, in Excise Administration, the merits of which were beyond all dispute. Its chief recommendation in official eyes was its alleged efficacy as a self-acting preventive of illicit distillation and of smuggling. That in providing a check on these evils, it produced the far greater evil of stimulating the manufacture and greater consumption of liquor, was, with some reluctance, admitted, but the utmost resources of official sophistry were employed in making light of this grave objection. It was pretended, in the face of patent facts, that the liquor turned out from an outstill was of a weak quality, and that this sufficiently neutralised the effects of increased production and of the cheapening of the price. The increase of production was alleged to be the natural effect of increased prosperity in the country, and, indeed, a circumstance to be regarded with satisfaction, rather than an evil to be contended against. Even the cheapening of liquor due to the stimulated traffic in outstill produce, was boldly denied. In the earlier days of the question, officials of the position of Divisional Commissioners were, indeed, found to go so far as to seriously propound the doctrine that after all it was to the benefit of the rural population that they were gradually taking to the use of the liquor. It was, we believe, the redoubtable Mr. Beames who, in an official paper, insisted on the tonic virtues of a glass of country grog with which to wash down a sodden mass of country rice. Statistics of the excise revenue in England and of the consumption of liquor per head of population, were quoted to show that, in comparison, there was no consumption of liquor to speak of in this country. The absolute fallacy of any comparison between the two countries was, of course, kept out of sight. The attitude held by the official class, as a rule, towards this question, has hitherto been cynical to a degree. No small credit is due, therefore, to Mr. Westmacott for breaking from the traditions of the body. He is justly entitled to the compliment which the Bengal Government has conveyed to him, "for the thoroughness and impartiality of his enquiry." The conclusions arrived at by him are a triumphant vindication of the popular outcry against the system, and Sir Stuart Bayley appears also to be in a more independent frame of mind in regard to the points under discussion. A great deal of official prejudice, not to say interests, is, however, arrayed in favor of the maintenance of existing arrangements, and it would be a surprise to look for a satisfactory settlement of the question, even under the most favorable circumstances. It is something, however, that some of the objectionable features in the practical administration of the system have been expressly condemned in the Resolution before us, and that Mr. Westmacott will be placed on special duty in connection with the approaching excise settlements.

A NEW JOURNALIST AND HIS NUTRITIOUS HODGEPODGE.

THE Indian Daily News rejoices in a Mussuric Correspondent who is an original, and knows it. Certainly, he knows he is somebody. Whatever others may think of him, he is satisfied with his own estimate of himself. He is not without his secret canker, because he still cherishes aspirations. Just now, his ambition seems to be to cicerone the Viceroy on his journey down country. But for his distracting literary method, his hints might have a better chance. Indeed, but for this, he would be an acquisition to any journal. As it is, it is a positive nuisance to wade through his long columns of chaff to pick up the grains of information and wisdom. He is we cannot say the Prince of digressers, seeing that the title has been applied to great writers like Macaulay and Montaigne, but he is certainly the most exasperating of writers for digression. He is always tantalising, always leaving his readers in the lurch. It is a great pity. For, he is an Old Indian who has lived in various parts of India and Burma, and, having enquired and read and thought a good deal, has acquired a fund of valuable information and ideas.

He does not care to write about Mussuric, but devotes himself to things in general and that in the most general, perfunctory way. His letters are an olla podrida of literature, politics, sociology, history, antiquities, botany, zoology, geology. He

Is everything by fits and nothing long.

Last not least, he is not always intelligible. He deals in innuendoes and obscurities—references to local magnates, ephemeral transactions and unfamiliar persons. In his last, he opens with

"The Harp that once in Tara's Halls" and proceeds, by way of the Pioneer and Shakespeare and Lord Reay and his Dutch friend and the Indian Mirror and Koot Hoomic, to the Viceroy and Dacca, thence back to the Delhi country and Aligurh and, by many a devious path by way of the Kootub and Borneo and Java, emerges on "tomfool (tamasba) shows" (this last is a double quotation, being his and from him) and reaches the climax of the Method and the end of his first paragraph in this prodigious period, which we the more readily reproduce entire, because we are hardly able to parse it and certainly do not catch its meaning, to wit:—

"But thus the 'world' goes on, the prince of it over it 'the prince of the power, of the air,' whose existence even is doubted by wisacres! and the Eternal World of Truth and Light and Love, God's World, separate from it, and over it, and in, and through it!"

The next paragraph deals with an equal variety of topics from Local Option and the Congress and the Police and the Viceroy and Sir Charles Elliott and Mr. Scoble and the Railway Bill and Famines and what not, not unwisely to be sure, but in defiance of all method and at express hurry and bustling confusion. He has an unfortunate incapacity to stick to a point or dwell on any subject. One would suppose that at last when he came to speak of the affairs of his own Mussurie, he would find himself at home and remain in it for a season. Alas! he no sooner mentions the transfer of Dr. Anderson of that station to Mainpurie than he rushes off at a tangent to Burma and descants on the best mode of officering the Police there!

Many useful remarks are interspersed in the letters and many curious glimpses of the present and the past are afforded by them. Thus, in the one under notice, he deprecates Lord Lansdowne's intention to choose a Private Secretary in India. Here is an anecdote in support. A friend of the writer "has often had occasion to correspond privately with the supreme official Head of the State, and has, indeed, done so during many successive Viceroyalties, but that only lately, since a Mr. Hewett, of some Indian service, has been acting for Sir Donald Wallace, my informant has not even had the bare acknowledgment of several letters and enclosures—some of great value to the senders—to the Viceroy! Probably this Mr. Hewett has been taking it on himself to act as the Viceroy in these cases, little thinking his master might like to have been consulted."

The portion of the letter which is most interesting at this moment relates to the Viceroy's visit to Dacca. The writer does not like the idea of the long steamer journey from Sahibgunj and the necessary stay on board. He is anxious that the vessel might possibly stick in the shifting sands. But his fear is not of the vessel sinking but the larder failing. There's carnivorous John Bull beyond mistake! And then not only will the great Lord Saheb be condemned to an anachronistic Lent and living on the fish of the Pudda, but—horrible to contemplate!—all the subsequent dates of the programme will get deranged! There, too, is the British worshipper of Time the great Fetish! Over and above these, is another mysterious danger—an undefined liability too dreadful to speak of.

"Then his being so many days on board in the river has a very serious objection which I shall not mention."

We hope our contemporary's correspondent has in kindness telegraphed a confidential warning to the Private Secretary, or if the Indian Mr. Hewett is not to be trusted, to the Khas Briton Lord Beresford. Perhaps, such a communication will be rewarded with an invitation to the telegrapher to come and undertake the office of guide, philosopher and friend of the Viceroy through the shoals and whirlpools and the pirates of the Ganges and Megna. We better give the rest of the passage as a specimen of the writer's lawless literary procedure:

"There is no one now living who knows Dacca—and for that matter many other parts of India, including even Moulmein and its famous roses, about which your Bummah correspondent lately made mention, for it was I who at my own expense sent all the choicest varieties there against the late lamented Earl Mayo's visit—more than I do. At least ~~the~~ ancient capitals of Bengal, going up to the very earliest Hindoo period, lie about there not far from each other. Dacca itself—not the modern city, the creation of Mr. Commissioner Buckland and Sir Abani Gham—can go back first to several hundred years well into the Moslem period, and then also 2,000 years back into the early Hindoo and Roman period; but the site and remains of this last are known alone to me; not even Chitragong Lyall, who was before at Dacca, nor Lammie the Able, know anything about them. Nor about the trend of the ancient Bay of Bengal about those parts, nor the volcanic country, nor the broken pieces of water whence I have seen fire-balls issue, nor the saurian monsters of gigantic size and unfamiliar shape and mien—such as we read of only in works on palæontology, and who led very much warmer lives, and who, by the way, are also reported as having been seen in the volcanic lake parts of New Zealand, with eyes as big as saucers and bodies as big as bullocks, crawl out of, and take a quiet noon-day walk on this unfamiliar and changed earth. There is, too, the site of an ancient bloody field of battle of the earliest ages; and even the very kind of pearl of a pink variety that used to be exported for the dames of the Roman Court of Cæsar. And a hundred other equally interesting things; but all have given way to jute! And it is only this that Lord Dufferin will see."

He then threatens—

"Shall I now proceed to describe with equal minutiae of detail the antiquities of Kangra, or Delhi (and reveal the true origin and theory of the 'Kootub,' which has not yet been even suspected!), or Borneo, or Java? But I won't, lest the Dutch friend I have referred to before get some new (journalistic) 'fits,' and create a scare, if not a 'scene.'"

A good resolution, by all means!

We must not be supposed to undervalue the writer. He is a shrewd outspoken critic with vast stores of information and a capacity for speculation. He is a sound politician into the bargain, as when he speaks of Lord Dufferin as

"as great and good a Viceroy as India has had—rather too good, free, open, and kind, for the cult of the country."

The italics are his. That is the bare truth, but the present Administration has been so unlucky and so misrepresented and misunderstood, that it argues no ordinary calibre to recognise, and some courage to avow, it. With a little care, he would be a most valuable acquisition to our journalism.

State Paper.

No. 16, dated Calcutta the 5th January, 1888.

From—Lieutenant-Colonel W. F. Prideaux, Agent to the Governor General in Council for the Affairs of the late King of Oudh.
To—W. J. Cunningham Esq., Officiating Secretary to the Government of India, Foreign Department.

[Concluded from p. 502.]

32. The late Prince Faridoo Kadr left three other motai wives, named Faridoo Mahal, Sowhi Begam and Mchdi Begam, to whom the King refused to grant an allowance because they were childless. These ladies have petitioned me representing that they are entirely without means of support, and earnestly entreating that His Excellency in Council may be pleased to grant them a small allowance in order to save them from destitution. As they enjoy no rights of inheritance under the Shia Mahomedan law, I would venture to support their application for a small provision at the hands of Government, and would recommend that they be each granted a pension of Rs. (40) forty per mensem for the remainder of their lives.

33. In addition to those dealt with in the preceding paragraphs of this letter, the late King left some great grandchildren who are without means of support and who merit to some extent the compassionate consideration of Government. The late Kara Muhammad Mirza Bahadoor, known as the Burray Mirza, eldest son of the late Wali Ahd, Prince Hamid Ali Bahadoor, died on the 1st of July last leaving one nikab and three motai wives, four sons, and four daughters. I think a limit should be placed on the allowances receivable by motai wives and I do not propose that the widows of this grandson of the King should each be pensioned by Government with the exception of the senior, or nikab one, but as the senior descendants of His Majesty in a direct line, I venture to think that a small provision should be made for the children. I would therefore recommend that the pensions of Rs. 300 per mensem which, under the terms of paragraph 24 of this letter, I should have recommended for the late Kara Muhammad Mirza had he survived, may be divided amongst his children in the proportion of two-thirds for the sons and one-third for the daughters. On this scale, each of the sons will draw a pension of Rs. (50) fifty per mensem, and each of the daughters Rs. (25) twenty five per mensem, which should form an adequate pension for their maintenance and education until such time as they may be able to supplement it by their own exertions. I would also propose that a pension of Rs. (40) forty per mensem be granted to Alam Bahoo Sahiba, the nikab wife, and mother of three of the children.

34. As the motai wives of His late Majesty stand on a different footing from the legitimate wives and descendants of the late King, I propose to deal with their claims to a provision for the future in a separate letter.

35. I may conclude by stating that, in submitting these proposals, I have not lost sight of the fact that, after all claims against the late King's estate have been satisfied and the expenses of the administration liquidated, there may remain a considerable balance which in pursuance of the views of Government should be distributed among heirs according to the rules of Shia Muhammadan law. At the present stage of affairs, however, it is impossible to estimate the amount of the claims which Government may consider to be justly due against the King's estate or the expenses attendant on the administration, or the sum which the landed property may eventually realize. In the absence of these data, I venture to think it would be advisable to settle the pension question at as early a date as possible, both in order that the family may be relieved from anxiety regarding their future position, and to protect them from the intrigues of which they are the victims at the hands of unscrupulous persons, who have led them to believe that they have influence with Government. I would respectfully venture to hope that the proposals I have had the honor to submit will not be considered in excess of what is necessary to support the credit and respectability of a historic family without reference to the prospective advantages which they may possibly reap from the realization of the King's property. On this latter part of the question it is my intention to address Government at greater length at a future date.

36. I annex a statement (Appendix A) showing in detail the maximum allowances drawn under the existing scheme and the maximum pensions which will be drawn by the nikah wives and descendants of His Majesty if my proposals receive the sanction of Government. The total amount of the latter is Rs. 23,020, exhibiting an increase over the present maximum rate of allowances of Rs. 11,430 per mensem.

APPENDIX A.

Statement showing the existing maximum rate of allowances drawn by the "nikah" wives and descendants of His late Majesty the King of Oudh and the maximum rate of pensions and house rent proposed to be granted for the remainder of their lives.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a represen-

ation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full mered of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to qiark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author's compelled to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that heart of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne fall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by
SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY
(Author of Kabutar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

Important News for India,
WHERE FEVERS AND CHOLERA
REIGN SUPREME.

A RECENT TRAVELLER ON THE Chinese Coast found that District remarkably FREE FROM TYPHOID FEVER and CHOLERA. He soon discovered the cause. The people there do not drink cold water from tanks or wells, often extremely impure, but keep a pan of water constantly boiling, into which from time to time they drop a little Tea, and when thirsty THEY DRINK HOT TEA! If the weak and adulterated Teas of China can do this, what may not the pure and strong Teas of India be expected to effect?

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

TO A STEP-CHILD.

THOU art not mine ; the golden locks that cluster
Round thy broad brow—
Thy blue eyes, with their soft and liquid lustre,
Thy cheek of snow—
E'en the strange sadness on thy infant features,
Blending with love,
Are hers, whose mournful eyes seem sadly bending
On her lost love.

Thou art not mine ; upon thy sweet lip lingers
Thy mother's smile,
And while I press thy soft and baby fingers
To mine the while—
In thy deep eyes, so trustfully upraising
Their light to mine,
I deem the spirit of thy mother gazing
To my soul's shrine.

They ask me, with their meek and soft beseeching,
A mother's care ;
They ask a mother's kind and patient teaching,—
A mother's prayer.
Not mine—yet dear to me—fair, fragrant blossom
Of a fair tree,
Crushed to the earth in life's first glorious summer,
Thou art dear to me,
Child of the lost, the buried, and the sainted,
I call thee mine,
Till, fairer still, with tears and sin untainted,
Her home be thine

TIME THE RESTORER.

THOU wingest thy flight o'er the realms of earth,
And its silent places are filled with mirth ;
Thou stretchest thy hand o'er the desert place,
And the palace rises in marble grace ;
The depths of ocean are touched by thee,
And green isles swell from the surging sea.

O'er the barren mountains thy foot has strayed,
And their heights are veiled with the forest shade.
Thou passest on, and the tiger's den
Is changed to the dwellings of cheerful men ;
The heathen wilds by thy steps are trod,
And the Christian temple springs up to God.

The bones of millions in dust are strewed,
But the nation's strength is by thee renewed ;
Genius and learning expire, but thou
Kindlest their fire on some younger brow :
Man must perish, but thou hast shrined
In thine awful temple his living mind.

Yet, O restorer of perished things,
Who scatterest life with thy ceaseless wings,
Who goest forth, and upon thy track
Youth and beauty and bloom come back,—
Powerful as o'er earth's realms thou art,
Thou canst not quicken the perished heart.

Thou canst not waken its wasted fires,
Its virtuous aim, and high desires ;
Thou canst not call back the radiant train
Of hope and love to their bowers again ;
Life to the lost one thou canst not give,
Nor say to the spirit of memory, live.

Yet there is a power strong to save,
There is an arm that unlocks the grave,
There is a spring in the realms of light
That restores the lovely, the young, the bright ;
Where the holy love of God is crowned,
Where the dead revives, and the lost is found !

L. G. P.

TOO EARLY LOST :

OR, THE MUTE INGLORIOUS BARD.

Life has voiceless geniuses. They think deeply, they feel most fervently, but they have no words to give back those divine images which their eye and ear daily drink in. Yet we know that an angel will hereafter loosen their tongues.—Fredrika Bremer.

I STOOD beside a poet's grave,
Fresh flowers bedecked the ground,
And the soft summer twilight cast
A holy spell around ;
With tears of sorrow in mine eyes,
I knelt upon the sod,
That such a soul had passed from earth,
And now was hid with God.

Oh ! his the poet's heart and soul,
Oh ! his the poet's eye !
Though from his lips had never burst
The songs of melody.
As in the sea-shell's folds the tones
Of unheard music lie,
His heart within itself contained
Those strains that never die !

For deep within his earnest soul,
High, holy thoughts had birth,
And glorious visions girt with light,
Undimmed by shades of earth ;
And though his spirit found no words
That glory to impart—
Like a mute lyre in sunshine laid,
Oh ! his the poet's heart !

I wept that such a soul had passed
Unheard, unfelt, away ;
That o'er his memory fame had cast
Not one immortal ray.
Oh ! early thus—oh ! silent thus—
That he in dust was laid,
With no unfading laurel wreath
Entwined around his head.

I wept not for the captive soul,
With heavenly freedom crowned—
I wept not for the glowing thoughts
In heavenly life unbound ;
The strains of burning eloquence
I knew were breathing there—
The tones of thrilling harmony
Resounding through the air.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

THE full title of the new Viceroy is—The Most Honourable Henry-Charles-Keith Petty-FitzMaurice, Marquess of Lansdowne, G.C.M.G., Earl Wycombe, of Chipping Wycombe, County Bucks, Viscount Caln and Calstone, County Wilts, and Lord Wycombe, Baron of Chipping Wycombe, County Bucks in the Peerage of Great Britain ; Earl of Kerry and Earl of Shelburne, Viscount Clanmaurice and Fitzmaurice, Baron of Kerry, Lixnaw, and Dunkerron, in the Peerage of Ireland. He is expected at Aden on or about the 27th instant and at Bombay on or about the 3rd December.

Orders for his reception have been already issued.

The Resident at Aden has orders first to receive the Marquess as Viceroy of India.

An Aide-de-Camp of the Viceroy has it in command to proceed up to Bombay to attend upon the Marquess throughout his journey to Calcutta. Of course, the Governor of Bombay will welcome him in due form and with proper distinctions.

One of the principal Civil Officers of each Government or Administration will be deputed to meet the Marquess of Lansdowne as he enters the limits of such Government or Administration, and will remain in attendance upon His Lordship until he passes beyond those limits.

At the Railway stations at which halts are made for rest and refreshment, Civil and Military Officers will be in attendance. There will also be a Guard of Honour upon the platform.

Should the Marquess of Lansdowne make any stay at Allahabad, His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces will make all arrangements, in communication with the Military authorities, for His Lordship's reception in a suitable manner.

At the Howrah terminus, the Secretaries to the Government of India and the Military Secretary and Aides-de-Camp to the Viceroy will await his Lordship's arrival, and at the platform the Commissioner of Burdwan, one of the Secretaries to the Government of Bengal, the Brigadier-General Commanding the Presidency District with the District Staff, the Commissioner of Police and Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation, the Sheriff of Calcutta, and the Magistrate of Howrah, will be in attendance.

A Guard of Honour of Native Infantry will be drawn up at the Howrah terminus. The route to the Government House will be lined throughout by troops. At the Government House, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal will receive the Marquess of Lansdowne at the foot of the grand staircase and the Viceroy at the top.

IN Dacca, they are preparing to receive the Viceroy in proper style. They held a public meeting on the 2nd instant and formed a Committee. The Committee met on the 5th and 7th, and passed resolutions inviting public subscriptions to meet the expenses of the reception and for a permanent memorial, and requesting the residents to decorate and illuminate their respective houses. The District Magistrate Mr. L. Hare has been elected Chairman of the Committee. He informed the meeting before his election that "he would prefer not to be on the Committee personally. He was anxious to render them every assistance in carrying out their views as to the reception of the Viceroy, but was of opinion that his presence in the Committee might have the appearance of official interference in a movement which was wholly spontaneous. He, however, left himself in their hands." But the Committee knew better. We make the above quotation to express our satisfaction with Mr. Hare for his policy of non-interference and avoidance of appearance of interference in popular movements. We hope other Magistrates will make that their rule of action. If it were generally acted upon, the cry for the separation of the Executive from the Judicial would lose much of its force.

THE Nawab of Bhawalpur has rescinded the order prohibiting the export of edible grain and seeds from his territory.

THE Russian explorer Colonel Prejevalsky is reported to be dead. The news requires confirmation.

FOR their attempt at theft on board the S. S. Assyria on a voyage to the Gulf, the Karachi Magistrate has sentenced 10 and 13 coolies to two months' rigorous imprisonment each.

THE High Court resumed work yesterday. The buildings have undergone some renovation during the holidays.

THE Sixth Criminal Sessions begins on Wednesday the 5th December. Mr. Justice Norris is expected to preside. The calendar will be a heavy one. Among others, Suddhabodhe will stand his trial for the death of his infant wife Kristomanini.

THE Government, on the advice of the Legal Remembrancer, have appealed to the Sadar Court from the Sessions Judge of Shikarpur acquitting Mr. Parumal Khubchand. The appeal has been fixed for the 27th. Mr. E. Leggett will represent the Government and Mr. Constable, the Public Prosecutor, it is said, will appear for the acquitted. Mr. Constable must have received permission of his employers to defend a person whom they wish to see convicted.

UNDER the power recently taken in the Legislative Department, to more effectually repress the purchase, from soldiers, of arms, ammunition, clothes and other articles, the Governor-General in Council has been pleased to declare that fifty rupees and two hundred rupees shall, for the purposes of Section 156 of the Army Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict., Cap. 58.) in India, be the respective equivalents of five pounds and twenty pounds.

MR. W. MAUDE, Officiating Joint-Magistrate and Deputy Collector, 24-Pergunnahs, is Gazetted to officiate as Under-Secretary in the Revenue, General and Statistical Departments of the Bengal Secretariat, during the absence, on deputation, of Mr. H. W. C. Carnduff.

MR. F. A. JACKSON, Officiating Superintendent, Chief Court, Punjab, and Shaikh Nanak Baksh, Pleader, have been appointed, under the Negotiable Instruments Act, XXVI, of 1881, Notaries Public within the limits of the Lahore District.

ON return from furlough of Mr. F. R. Mallet, Superintendent, Geological Survey of India, Mr. R. D. Oldham, Officiating Superintendent, has been appointed to officiate as Deputy Superintendent, 1st grade, vice Mr. C. L. Griesbach, on deputation ; Mr. P. N. Bose, Officiating Deputy Superintendent, 1st grade, goes back to his own place as Deputy Superintendent, 2nd Grade ; and Mr. E. J. Jones ceases to act as Curator.

MR. C. J. RODGERS, Archaeological Surveyor, Punjab Circle, has been appointed Honorary Numismatist to the Government of India.

THE Chief Secretary to the Government of Madras and the Secretary to the Government of Bombay in the Political Department have been especially empowered to grant licenses to export, by sea, ammunition, military stores, or arms other than cannon or than such rifles as come within the operation of Rule 5 of the Rules under the Indian Arms Act XI. of 1878, to ports in Native States or foreign settlements within the political jurisdiction of their respective Governments, the second, in addition, to ports within the political jurisdiction of the Political Resident in the Persian Gulf. The Political Resident at Aden will grant licenses for such exportation by sea from the port of Aden to any port on the Coast of Arabia or Africa.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL R. P. NISBET, C.I.E., Commissioner of the Rajal Pindi Division, is Gazetted a Resident of the 2nd Class, and Resident in Cashmere; Lieutenant-Colonel W. F. Prideaux, Political Agent of the 1st Class, late Agent Khas for Affairs of the King of Oudh, officiates as a Resident of the 2nd Class and Resident at Jeypore; and Colonel H. P. Peacock, Officiating Resident of the 2nd Class and Officiating Resident at Jeypore, reverts to his own as Political Agent of the 1st Class and is posted as Political Agent in Ulwar.

WE read in the Amrita Bazar Patrika :—

"Though we are under an obligation to the Times of India for having made the disclosure that the Government offered it certain terms for its advocacy, our contemporary has not told us the precise nature of the term offered to it. Was it cash, say a fixed stipend? We know that during the Viceroyalty of Lord Lytton a proposal was made to pay the subservient papers with Government advertisements. The other way is to purchase a certain number of copies, and distribute them to Departments and officials. The Pioneer has the reputation of being an organ of the Government of India. He ought to be able to tell us whether the connection between the Government and its organ is simply platonic, or a little more grosser than that."

Our good contemporary does not exhaust the forms of persuasion. It omits, for instance, the sop of departmental printing, or other large contracts, to the scribes and Pharisees.

AFTER a good deal of effort to make rice a paying crop in Ceylon, the cultivation is to be abandoned. The Government have accepted the view that the experiment has failed. Paddy cannot be grown at a profit.

ON Monday, before the Parnell Commission several Irishmen, including some avowed Fenians, testified to outrages in which they took part.

On Tuesday, Reuter telegraphed the arrest of another Irish patriot, Mr. Sheehan, M. P., for Kerry, having been sentenced to one month's imprisonment under the Crimes Act for advising the adoption of the plan of campaign.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THERE was a students' outbreak at Madrid on the 10th. The demonstrations continued the whole day. Several Republican agitators were discerned among the lot. These turbulent proceedings were aimed at Senor Canovas and other Conservative leaders. They did not quite lynch anybody, however. Only Senor Canova's carriage was stoned. The mob dispersed without any fight.

THE sensation from Paris is that the Revision Committee has recommended the abolition of the Senate and the Presidency of the Republic.

THE St. Petersburg news is more stirring. The Czar has ordered an increase in the infantry in the Army Corps on the western frontier to two divisions each. The official explanation such as it is—is that it is a mere redistribution occasioned by the abandonment of Choukoff as a military district.

THE Lieutenant-Governor returned to Belvedere on Monday. The journey down was not a smooth one. Lady Bayley had her right arm in a sling and Mrs. Farquharson a bandage over her eye. Both of them had received injuries by the upsetting of the trolley on the Darjeeling-Himalayan Railway by a stone happening to be on the line. Miss Bayley too had escaped from a dreadful doom. She avoided the trolley accident by riding—but the horse slid and carried her 20 feet down the Khud.

MR. PRESTIGE in charge of the trolley has been more seriously hurt and is detained at K. 6004.

SIR STEUART BAYLEY is a child of Luck, indeed. The Lieutenant-Governor left for his Orlissa tour on Wednesday—to find the powers of heaven had anticipated him. The scarcity there had been dispelled by the recent rains.

The party took the steamer Resolute at Prinsep's Ghat at 8 o'clock in the morning for Chandbally.

AT the instance of Mr. Woodroffe, in the absence of the Advocate General at Darjeeling, the High Court—the Chief Justice Sir Comer Petheram and Mr. Justice Trevelyan—have fixed the 28th instant for the final disposal of Mr. Moylan's appeal from the order of the Recorder of Rangoon disbarring him. Mr. Pugh, on behalf of the Recorder, wanted a longer interval to prepare himself for the fight.

THE Crawford Plot thickens. The Commission seems to have grown weary of the work, and on the conclusion of the evidence on the Chief of Bhore item for Rs. 10,000, the President asked Mr. Latham to choose out, and confine himself to, the strongest cases. It was also said that the Government was about to appoint Messrs. Moore and Steward to report on the Mauludars who had spoken to giving bribes, in disregard of the promise of immunity by Mr. Ommoney. Now comes the news that the Bombay High Court—Justices Birdwood and Justice—have issued notices on Sudekar, Dabir and others, calling upon them to shew cause why they should not be prosecuted under the Penal Code for giving illegal gratification to a public servant. The Government seems to be no party to this phase of the Scandal, for we see that the High Court also directed a notice on the Government Pleader.

TO add to the recent disasters in Indian waters, another steamer with as many native passengers as were lost in the Sir John Lawrence, is missing. Messrs. Shepherd & Co.'s coasting steamer Valarna from Cutch Mandvie with 900 passengers, due in Bombay in a few hours, is overdue for over a week. Other steamers were sent out in search for her, but have brought back no news of the vessel. The belief gains that the Valarna with her heavy human freight has been added to the treasures of the sea.

The Valarna left Cutch Mandvie at 8 A.M., on Thursday week, in charge of a native Captain. She was to have called at Porebunder, but the weather was rough and, instead of touching there, she was heard only to whistle.

The vessel is 170 feet in length, her breadth of beam is some 26 feet, her registered speed 13 knots per hour, and she is licensed to carry 1,047 passengers.

ANOTHER total loss of an emigrant ship! Messrs. Shaw, Savill and Albion Company's iron ship Trevelyan, Captain Roberts, left the Clyde for Otago, New Zealand, with passengers and cargo, on the 23rd March and was last spoken on the 31st March. Since then no news was received of her, and she was posted missing at Lloyd's on the 10th October. On the 25th June, Messrs. Donald Currie & Co.'s Drummond Castle, Captain Winchester, on arrival at Plymouth, with the homeward Cape of Good Hope and Natal Mails, reported a large sailing-ship foundered close by the Drummond Castle off Cape Agulhas, during a terrific gale on the night of the 3rd June. Plymouth advices dated October 2 state that a life-boat had been picked up at Koeborg, Plethenbergs Bay, named Trevelyan. The number of passengers on board the Trevelyan is not stated, but that of the crew is given at 35. It is now believed that the lost vessel was off the South African coast early in June, and that that was the ship sighted by the Drummond Castle.

THE Post Mortem Enquiry on the lost Mozgolt has resulted in the notable discovery that the three passengers—Nibaun Chunder Chatterjee, Bhobun Mohun Ghose and Mu Akbar Hossein whose bodies were recovered and examined, were drowned, death resulting from asphyxia—medical gibberish for suffocation. The other enquiry by the Chief Magistrate into the negligent navigation of the Serang Captain—is still proceeding. No Marine Court has yet been ordered. Perhaps the Government await the result of the Ministerial investigation. It is not possible, though, that all the facts regarding the vessel and other circumstances in which the public are interested in connection with passenger steamers, will be disclosed, affording hints towards future precautions. The Police report as to the number of passengers lost is not forthcoming. In the meantime, we give a list, fuller than the one already published, of the persons lost and saved belonging to Andool and the adjoining villages.

THE Ministry has again been unlucky. In consequence of the rebuke administered by the Home Secretary Mr. Mathews, for an article that the Commissioner of Police published in Murray's Magazine, Sir Charles Warren has withdrawn himself from the head of the London Police. The affair is creditable to neither side, least of all to the late commander-in-chief of the Metropolitan Force. The influence of the Non-Regulation government of Ireland on the governors is already showing itself. Otherwise, few statesmen at the present day would care to kick up a row over a magazine article, as to drive a high officer from the service. But if the minister had some ground for irritation, at the oozing out of Departmental secrets, there is no justification whatever for the practical retort of the head of the Department. Such a state-servant ought to possess some judgment and command of temper, and if he could not muster loyalty to the Minister, he should at least evince patriotism. Sir Charles has offered a bad parting example to the men under him. He evidently regards himself indispensable. Therein, we hope, he will find himself disappointed. What a pity that Mr. Monro did not stay a few months more. We hope he will yet be invited to fill the vacancy or to assist the new Chief.

THE Gods, alike of Heaven and Earth, love Pooja, and the tuneful Owen Meredith, who, for our sins, was set over us for a term as our Earthly Providence, found or made government a long holiday. But only for himself and his immediate Court. For nonetheless did he discountenance holidays for flesh and blood. Recreation and enjoyment were a privilege of Olympus. Therefore, though dearly loving both Pooja and holidays, for himself and the Immortals, he thought fit to curtail the Pooja holidays of the Government List by way of emphasising the distinction between men and gods. The men set up a great noise in consequence, disturbing the peace of Olympus itself, so he was induced to restore them. Thus he had learned to appreciate the Pooja holidays for the denizens of earth and skies, for officials and non-officials, for Covenanted and Uncovenanted. Of course, he learnt to value them all the more for himself. He retains that lesson still. The other day, during the Doorga Pooja, while the newspapers by the mail were talking of him as though he were at his post at Paris, he, unknown to the journalists, had slipped out of the Embassy, for a couple of weeks' vacation. His Lordship passed the Pooja vacation (so to speak) at his own seat Knebworth. He gives the news himself in a private note to India.

FOLLOWING the example of the Urbs Primus in Indis, our Municipal Commissioners meet specially next Thursday to vote addresses to both the retiring and the incoming Viceroys. The Bombay Corporation have prepared an address to the Marquess of Dufferin and Ava which has been likened to the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out—for it takes no notice of the annexation of the Ava kingdom.

THE Governor of Madras has been on tour through his territory. That is the established fashion, of course. But Lord Connemara at least uses his eyes and his understanding. Everywhere he shows his strong common sense. He is solicitous of preventing the waste of public money in the name of illusory reform. At Nellore, he put his foot on one of the costly "fads" of the day. In these days of science worship, when superstition itself professes to rest on science, it requires some considerable courage to breathe a syllable against the prevailing fetish. Lord Connemara is no admirer of high pressure tillage in India under European experts. He does not believe in agricultural chemistry and physics as the panacea for the poverty of India. He is old-fashioned and wise enough to avow himself an orthodox Indian agriculturist. He has not much faith in district farms in which he had seen a great deal of money sunk to no good. He believes very strongly in agricultural shows, but only if the rayyets take an interest in them. According to him, the native implement is generally as good as the foreign one; and he doubts very much whether all the experienced agriculturists at home can teach the Indian peasants very much.

OFFICIAL journalism, after all, is not all exempt from the calamities that pursue journalism in general. If it has its obvious advantages, it has its share of disadvantages, too, though these may not be so obvious. Indeed, the "outer barbarians" of the Press know nought of the pangs that their brethren, basking in the sunshine of official smiles, suffer from. The worst of their case is that they dare not complain. They are in the situation of the thief's mother in the Indian saying who is not permitted to lament for her son. The most favoured of the tribe just now is in this plight. The journal by appointment as it were, has received a visitation—of not the most delightful kind—from Authority. The frown of a Prefect or a Minister of the Interior would be bad enough, but on this occasion a Higher Power is offended with the Moniteur Official. The great Pioneer's special Bombay communication has been stopped by command of the Indra of the Western Ghats. And our contemporary can scarcely — hint a fault or hesitate dislike.

The British Bohemian who was wont to delight the public through the Pioneer, with his tales of the Western Coast, has been muzzled. He was summoned like a trembling thief to the awful Presence and chastised into self-effacement on pain of being sent to official Coventry—perhaps ordered to some solitary hole and corner or some malaria-infested fen. And his maternal patron in the Press can but barely impart the news to the world by way of explanation to the readers for the stoppage of their usual supply of the Bombay article. Even this is done with great tact, with subdued periphrasis. And why? Because—as our contemporary says—"or we shall have the blow descending on ourselves." Can this be a real fear? Then is the Press of India gagged without the necessity of legislative repression! Our contemporary begins—"One always speaks with bated breath of the high politics of the Government of Bombay." Who is this one? We do not know of anybody that so speaks, within the Presidency or without.

"But (continues the Editor) the inquiries that are being made for the Bombay letter that has been looked forward to—more especially by His Excellency the Governor—at fortnightly intervals in these columns, forces us to say that by way of explanation our readers must imagine for themselves a recent scene at Mahableshwar when an offending correspondent, summoned up to appear before His Excellency in full Council, received a fitting rebuke from the statesman under whom he serves, and was warned, with all the circumstances that could give dignity to the injunction, that his contributions to the Press must cease. 'Romaney,' indeed, is no more: one vigorous stroke from the Colossus of the West has extinguished him. These things, once more, are not to be lightly spoken of, or we shall have the blow descending on ourselves. Let it only be said that, in certain quarters, the suppression of this unhappy writer is attributed to his having ventured to say what everyone was thinking about the Government in the earlier stages of the Crawford case. And it will cause no surprise to those who have amused themselves with the study of the philosophic Radical in office, to find the same Governor one day expressing to a native editor his sympathy with the Congress as an agency for the improvement of the Administration, and the next suppressing a correspondent, over whom he chances to have control, for a perfectly honest criticism upon public affairs."

That is tolerably plain, to be sure, still it strikes us as inadequate. It is not thus that great journals protect their agents and their own honour. Would the Times in such a matter have contented itself with polishing its irony and pointing its innuendo at the offending statesman? The Pioneer should never forget that it has the interests and the honour of the whole Press in India in its keeping.

THE assent of the Governor-General in Council having been given to the Act for the extension of the limits of Calcutta, the question arises as to the best method of dealing with those portions of the Suburbs which remain outside the amalgamation limits. Mr. Forbes, Magistrate of the 24-Pergunnahs, now on leave, appears to have left his views on the subject. He thinks that the best arrangement for the excluded area in the South, will be to treat it in connection with a revision of the boundaries of the South-Suburban Municipality, that is, the Municipality of Behala. The whole area should, in his opinion, be subdivided into two municipalities having Tolly's Nullah for their line of demarcation. A similar question has to be decided with regard to the northern portion of the Suburbs, viz., Cossipore, Chitpore, portions of Balliaghata and Ooltadanga, and the Baranagar municipality. Mr. Forbes would amalgamate them with the southern half of the Baranagar municipality, which is of a more urban and remunerative character than the northern half. As, having regard to Section 9 of Act III (B. C.) of 1884, the consent of the Commissioners in meeting of each of the municipalities concerned to any revision of boundaries, is necessary in order to authorize Government to take any steps in the matter, a Sub-Committee of six Commissioners of the Suburban Municipality has been appointed for the purpose, the municipalities of Baranagar and Behala being invited to send three delegates each to be present at their deliberations.

THE Pioneer's Calcutta Correspondent does not evidently like the last appointment to the High Court bench, but as the Powers have willed against his wish, he, like a wise man, suppresses a wry face with a dubious and enigmatical treatment of the subject, thus:—

"Dr. Gurudass Banerji's appointment to the Bench of the High Court has come as a surprise only in the way that we, the public, always expect the first favourite to win. It was known that a native was to be appointed to the vacancy, but it was considered that the Government would select and, if need be, go out of their way to select a Mahomedan. It is said that no Mahomedan was thought up to the mark. This may or may not represent the fact. The amusing thing is that now the choice has fallen upon a Bengali, the Mirror, of all papers, is all for a Mahomedan. Whether this proceeds from dislike to the new Judge, or merely represents the feelings of a man who, having obtained all he desires, can afford to be generous, who shall say? It is murmured in some quarters that Babu Rashbehary Ghose, another pleader of the High Court, has more independence of character and more natural ability, and it is suggested that with less independence he might have been more successful; but in any case Dr. Gurudass Banerji is a practitioner of great learning and experience, and has always commanded the respect of his profession. It is to be observed that, assuming the Bench to remain at its present strength—and there seems no prospect of an increase in the number of the Judges—the next vacancies will have to be recruited either from the ranks of the Bar or of the Covenanted Civil Service, as the case may be, the Government having gone to the limits of its powers in appointing outsiders."

We believe the truth about the matter is, that Baboo Gurudas had been introduced by Sir Richard Garth to his successor as the ablest Hindu lawyer and a gentleman who could give him the best assistance, in the way of information, about the ways and manners of the people of the Lower Provinces. Accordingly, the Bengali pleader did "coach" the new Chief on several occasions. Thus too he had the best opportunities for impressing the Chief most favorably with his knowledge and acuteness, as well as the moderation of his views and the mildness of his manners, and his honourable character. When the time came, under direction from the Government of India, for the Chief Justice to name a native gentleman for the bench, it was the most natural thing in the world for him to name Dr. Gurudas Banerjee. Sir Comer Petheram told Dr. Banerjee at the time that he would get the office, and the Pleader communicated the news to his friends, though, in the humble spirit of a Brahman and the prudence of a wise man that he is, he did not allow himself to be sanguine. He knew how many were the slips between the cup and the lip. Above all, the good Hindu had cause for fear when the great Ali, supported by his British Begum and the certificates of his paper Branches, went forth to conquer Great Britain and the India Office.

THE obscure little village of Kotrung on the west bank of the river, above Ooterpara, once the site of a Mogul dockyard—now scooped out and despoiled of its soil in the operations for brick-making by the Calcutta Municipality and its lessees, has earned an enviable distinction. It has not only its municipality but a rara avis of a corporation with a soul to be—blessed! The Kotrung Board has courage as well as brains. The Commissioners have shown at once common sense and adaptability, by holding their sittings in the evening, after the business of their individual avocations is over. This is the old country practice and still obtains, but it has been swamped by European innovation and is getting obsolescent in deference to the convenience of the official classes. Sir George Campbell tried to revive it, but it won't do, and for very good reasons. Those reasons were special ones and don't apply to a homogeneous population living together in the same place near their business-quarter. The people should recognise their own convenience.

AMONG the numerous visitors of note expected during the present season, not the least interesting will be Miss Manning, the Secretary to the National Indian Association—the social reform society of London, not the Caucus of Surrender Not's juvenile Inreconcilables. She is already come to the Western Presidency where they have given her a hearty welcome. She deserves it from all parts of India. She has devoted herself to the good of India and of Indians. She is the soul of the organization started by the late Miss Carpenter for the enlightenment and social elevation of our people. Without agreeing to all their views and methods, we can surely admire the good motives and benevolent zeal of our foreign friends. Miss Manning did not exhaust all her soul and her energies in her interest on public questions and schemes regarding Indian improvement. She not only associated with men and women from the East, Oriental and European, with a view to the furtherance of her views and the objects of the society, but cultivated the natives specially. Apart from her, so to say, professional character, she was good to them. Our young men going to England for education or for qualifying themselves for a profession, be it the Civil Service, the Bar, Medicine, Agriculture, or any other, are sure of a welcome from her. Many such have profited by her interest and her advice. She has a family claim on India. Her mother had been long a resident in this country, which she knew intimately, in the best sense, in its past as in its present, and whose people she thoroughly appreciated and loved. In Literature Mrs. Manning made her mark as Mrs. Spiers, and there can be no two opinions about the excellence and high usefulness of her work on India. That book appeared more than thirty years ago. Notwithstanding the mass of writing on the subject that has since appeared, it holds its ground still. True to its name, there is no other which gives such a charming and yet accurate picture of Life in Ancient India. Miss Manning must, in some measure, be prepared to feel herself at home in the India of to-day.

THE papers report the mysterious disappearance of a European Prince in Asiatic waters. The Landgrave of Hesse had been out with his suite globe-trotting incognito. He was last heard of at Singapore, where he arrived from Java by the S. S. Volga. The following Sunday he did not appear at breakfast. He was probably unwell, they thought. But when he did not come to lunch too, the denial of food was considered too much for a European and so enquiry was made. He could not be found however, and the horrible suspicion of suicide occurred to his people and others. As the port was found open, it was supposed that he let himself down into the bosom of the great sea for a grave. The ways of our European fellow-creatures are strange. Here is a man who voluntarily makes a world of arrangements and leaves home and dear ones to go to the ends of the earth on so simple and easy an errand as to die quick, somehow.

THE Louis Jubilee Sanitarium at Darjeeling is intended for Natives alone, whether Hindoos or Mahomedans or Christians. To furnish it with sufficiently spacious accommodation for these various classes, separate houses will have to be built, for which the Committee have already got a good site, and all that now remains to secure the success of the undertaking, is provision of adequate funds for the construction of the buildings, and their needful equipment. The Committee have hit upon an excellent idea for popularizing the institution. They intend to bring the benefits of the Sanitarium within reach of comparatively humbler classes, by admitting the lowest class of patients at one rupee per day, and at even a smaller rate, if considerable funds are forthcoming. The need of such an institution—an asylum to fly to in the intervals of life's weary work, or to recover shattered health—is too patent to require any words at our hands. It is truly a national object which it has in view, and we hope a united national effort will be made to ensure its success.

WE congratulate the Committee of the Baranagar English School on the renewal of the Government grant of Rs. 7,500, for their school building, which had lapsed in consequence of the unfortunate litigation forced on them by the late Babu Kali Mohun Das, Vakil, High Court. The fresh sanction has been made subject to the same conditions as before, one of which is that an equal sum should be contributed by the Committee, in addition to the provision of land for the building. A good site for the school-house on the river side has been given to the Committee by Rai Surendranath and Rai Jotendranath Chowdry, Zemindars of Taki—who have also generously offered a donation of Rupees two thousand. The Committee have nevertheless an up-hill task in raising, by subscription, the balance, and we are therefore peculiarly glad that Kumar Dowlut Chandra Roy, grand-son of the well-known Raja Baidyanath, has come to the Committee's rescue, by offering a donation of one thousand rupees. We commend Kumar Dowlut Chandra's public spirit and beneficence. The other day, he placed a sum of Rupees two thousand in the hands of Government, as a permanent endowment for founding an annual medal to be awarded to the Bachelor of Arts in the Calcutta University who stood first in the examination. The cause of education must now look to such self-help in the country, for its chief support, and the Kumar's example cannot be too widely imitated.

A EUROPEAN merchant of high standing at Samarang, in Singapore, has come to grief. He has been caught in the act. We mean he was discovered in the exciting diversion of putting money in his pocket at the expense of the state and his fellow-subjects and specially his fellow-merchants, by the process vulgarly called smuggling. He had extensive dealings. He exported largely the famous produce

Of Bourdeaux, Chambertin, Frontignac, St. Peray, Lafitte, Chateau Margaux, And Sillery (a cargo
On which John Bull sensibly (?) lays an embargo),

Our European merchant did not care for the embargo and would not pay the fine established for removing it in any case. He had a simple method of avoiding the payment and having his cargo. He has so long practised it that he came to regard it as a matter of course. In November 1886, 14 cases of "Chateau Lafitte" arrived at that port consigned to the accused. It appears that besides 538 ordinary bottles of genuine "Chateau Lafitte," there were in the cases 138 other bottles made of zinc, and these were found to contain 186 cattiees of raw Turkish opium. It is said the discovery was made on one of the cases taken at random being opened and examined by a customs house officer to verify the invoice. Credat Judacus Apella - non ego. The Custom House must have got an inkling from an informer—possibly, some base enemy or teacherous friend. Or, the exporter must have fallen out with the Customs examiners and appraisers over their share of the spoil. The latter is the more probable supposition. These officers know by instinct when an attempt is made to impose on them. But they are agreeable folk and make no bones if properly feed. It is the over avaricious—the beggars who would make a monopoly of making money—even by underhand means—whom they detest, as also the impudent hypocrites who, after a notorious career, pretend to take fire at the slightest suggestion of a shady operation. It was thus that old Lazarus, of our city—a very Dives in prosperity—in an unlucky moment, chose to shut his eyes against his sores and thought nobody else could, in consequence, see them. Poor man! he was rudely awakened from his ostrich dream. It is to his credit that the disgrace which he thus invited on himself stung him to the quick and he did not long survive it. But if Lazarus was for once foolish and suffered, there are hundreds who, though in the same perilous boat, manage, by tact and prudent expenditure, to escape.

Be that as it was, our Singapore merchant was detected in passing through the Custom House opium as claret. It was proposed to prosecute him. This was no easy matter. A "merchant prince" who has thriven by withholding duties on opium is, besides being a powerful man, a persona grata in local society. Nobody cared to touch him. A thousand difficulties were presented in the way of bringing him to justice. But somebody had made it his business to see that the smuggler should be punished. And so he was punished, though nearly two whole years were consumed in the proceedings. On being found guilty, the accused was sentenced to one year's imprisonment and a fine of ten thousand guilders.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1888.

SIR AUCKLAND COLVIN'S MANIFESTO ON THE CONGRESS.

SIR AUCKLAND COLVIN has read a timely homily to the Indian National Congress. His letter to Mr. Hume is a frank and dignified remonstrance against some of the later developments of the movement. It should be taken as a responsible authoritative expression of official attitude towards the Congress, and taken also in good part. If the leaders of the Congress are wise, they should not quarrel with it. He is no enemy, but like a friend he says he would be only too glad to see those who direct the counsels of the Congress return to the attitude which in its earlier days characterised it and abandon the aggressive and hostile tone of their later publications. He offers this advice in the true interests of the institution itself. For he reminds the leaders of the Congress that they only alienate from them the sympathy of official classes and provoke opposition by their later tactics. "The aggressive tone which its organs adopt may rather hinder than assist the Government when the hour for action may seem to it to have come." He thus takes the Congress men into his confidence, and speaks from his higher platform of knowledge and authority to those whom he regards in statu pupillari. He is himself, he adds, in the Liberal official camp, and not without sympathy towards the objects and aims of the Congress. Indeed, he saw little to object to in the proceedings of the first and second sitting of the Congress, and even looked upon them with sympathy. But as we had anticipated, there came a rude awakening when, throwing off the moderation of their earlier programme and method, the Congress party began to assume a tone of extravagance which could scarcely be agreeable to the responsible rulers of the land, and was likely to arouse the jealousy of other classes and the apprehensions of moderate men of all sections of the population.

In fairness to the Congress party, however, it must be said that in their efforts to educate and enlighten popular opinion on the objects of the movement, by the publication and circulation of small tracts in the vernaculars, they were under the well-known disadvantage of making themselves intelligible to classes quite unfamiliar with political subjects. They had to bring themselves to a level with the meanest understanding, and, if in their sole endeavour to be understood, they made use of illustrations such as those which occur in the conversation between Moulvi Farid-ud-din and Rambaksh of Kambakhtpur, and to which Sir Auckland, from his point of view, not unnaturally, takes exception to, it must, in some measure, be excused by the inherent difficulty of making abstract political ideas acceptable to the ordinary range of mind. They were not the best or least offensive illustrations, perhaps, but almost any illustrations would be open to some objection. At any rate, the extracts from the Congress publications, to which the Lieutenant-Governor of the North Western Provinces takes such serious objection, are not altogether indefensible from the point of view the questions elucidated therein are usually regarded by the extreme section of unofficial politicians. Their tone and substance are, we are afraid, hardly different from the tone and substance of many of the Native Press. Whatever the views and attitude of that Press, they are not necessarily formed in bad faith, even though without sufficient knowledge. Animus against the Crown is out of the question. Sir Auckland Colvin is just enough to admit, there must be inevitable differences in the views of official and un-official classes, on these questions. We have carefully read the extracts, and must confess to a sense of relief that they are not more atrocious than we find them. These passages have been cited as specimens of the hostile spirit actuating the Congress party, but they may be shown to have a far more inoffensive aim. They indeed criticise the action of Government in several respects with blunt severity, but this by no means to subvert and revolutionize the established machinery of Government, but with far humbler objects. A little adjustment of that machinery here and there—some slight reform in the administration by way of a response to the claims of the Congress, will more than amply satisfy the utmost expectations of the vast majority of even the most thoughtful and aspiring. We have not spared the Congress when we considered it outstripping its proper limits. We have never spared ourselves in private in giving our views to all who care to inquire. And we mean yet to make some of these public when the proper time comes. Meanwhile, in justice to the institution, we must vindicate its character from the imputation of seditious motives. It may be true enough some of the Congress men are liable to be carried away by their ardour to use unguarded language, the effects of which upon illiterate classes are unlikely to be of a healthy kind. This must be checked. The leaders of the Congress are quite welcome to what Mr. Hume calls their quiet teachings and preachings, but they must expect to be brought to book whenever their professions differ from their practice. Sir Auckland Colvin's complaint against them, they cannot afford to slight. He accuses them of systematically "holding up the British Government and the English officials in India to the indignation of the people as unjust, inconsiderate ill-informed and reckless of the consequences of their actions..... Here and there some of the officers of the Government in India are given credit, if not for good service rendered at least for good intentions. But anything that may be said on this score is far more than obscured by the thickness and depth of the darker shades of the picture." He reminds the Congress of the benefits of British rule and triumphantly points to its work in the past. Notwithstanding, however, all the loyal professions of the Congress men, he regrets to find there is no reference at all in their publications, particularly the tracts which have been extensively circulated in the country, to that work. He says :—

"Of the India of to-day, as we know it; of India under education; of India compelled, in the interests of the weaker masses, to submit to impartial justice; of India brought together by road and rail; of India entering into the first-class commercial markets of the world; of India of religious toleration; of India assured, for terms of years unknown in less fortunate Europe, of profound and unbroken peace; of India of the free press; of India finally taught for the first time that the end and aim of rule is the welfare of the people and not the personal aggrandisement of the sovereign—I fail to find a syllable of recognition."

Sir Auckland has spoken at once with freedom and moderation, and, on the whole, with great justice. It was inevitable that there should be large divergence of views between officials and their private critics. Without excusing, for the intemperance and injudiciousness of the tone of some of the utterances of responsible heads of the Congress movement, or discussing either its pretences or its programme, all we claim for it, and will always claim, is fairplay. Just now, we are concerned most to vindicate the Congress from the suspicion of sedition. While we say this, we must warn the Congress men, as they value the continuance of popular countenance and official sympathy, they must all put a restraint upon their tongue, while their chiefs applied themselves to a deeper study of the great problem of Indian government and a more practical acquaintance with the immediate needs of the Empire and the true measure of the aspirations and capacity of the people. That will be a valuable discipline for themselves. Sir Auckland Colvin's manifesto must be laid to heart. His concluding words have a meaning which cannot be missed: "Meanwhile, I shall personally watch their proceedings with the interest they deserve, and follow the effects of their workings in these Provinces with the vigilance with which, as their head, I endeavour to inform myself of all public movements which show themselves within our limits." The Congressmen have everything to gain by keeping these words before them. In order to profit by them to any appreciable extent, they would have probably to impose on them a good deal of sacrifice—to alter their tactics, to weed the personnel, to infuse fresh blood and seek new alliances.

THE LATE EARL OF LUCAN.

ACCORDING to Reuter's message, Lord Lucan has at length paid the debt of Nature. He was as old as the century. He received no liberal education but passed at once from school to the army. From licking fads and fisticuffing other scapegraces and disturbing alma mater's peaceful neighbours and the Queen's lieges in general in the precincts of Westminster, to fighting and bleeding in more real earnest and on a vaster scale, as a unit in the organised disturbance of states and nations, in the pay of Government against Government, is no violent change but rather a normal development. It is thus, we believe, that aptitude for the profession of arms—itsself a necessary evil at best—is usually evolved in boyhood and discovered in school-life. By allowing scope to the juvenile bent, Nature is conciliated and cultivated, and the highest skill brought out. The opposite policy of forcing the square substance into the round hole, was to stir up war in the individual and cause bitterness and disappointment to the family and cripple the nation by converting one of its units into a thorn in the side of the rest. The aristocracy is, of course, above suppression. Even the farthing rushlight of its most insignificant member is in no danger of being violently snuffed out or hid under a bushel. Great, however, as is the advantage of birth, it cannot make up for the deficiencies of Nature. Young Bingham could never have been great in any line, but his best chance lay in one of the professions that were least distinctly intellectual. He might be an indifferent preacher or a bad lawyer at best, perhaps a dangerous diplomat. It was well for himself as well as his country, that he embraced arms and stuck to the business of war. The consequence was as might have been anticipated. If he could not rise to a Wellesley, he at least died a Field Marshal.

He entered his profession at a period unfavorable to practice. England was enjoying the calumet of Forty Years. It was a period of extraordinary activity and, on the whole, of unprecedented prosperity, during which the nation extended its commerce, improved its arts and manufactures, enlightened its mind and perfected its institutions. But cui bono? cried the man of war, lounging at watering places at home or devilling deep at hells abroad. For the young soldier with "fight" in him, it was certainly a depressing time.

There was no opportunity for learning real warfare, to say nothing of acquiring even a clasp. Promotion was possible because man was mortal. Or, it lay through the despised path of purchase. The generous spirit of young Bingham chafed under circumstances beyond his or anybody's control. At length, he found in not only foreign but foreigners' service his chance of a noviciate. Heir to an Irish earldom, he in his 26th year easily entered the unreformed House of Commons as member for County Mayo, retaining his seat till 1830, notwithstanding absence on foreign service. But politics was not his forte. So he volunteered his sword to the Russians in their war with Turkey in 1828, and fought in the campaign under General Diebitsch.

In 1840, he entered the House of Lords as one of the Representative Peers of Ireland. But he made no more mark as a senator in the Upper than he had done in the Lower Chamber. As a soldier, he found a chance of usefulness again fourteen years after, when the war broke out with Russia. He was in command of a Division of the Light Cavalry in the Crimea. He fought at its head at the great battle of the 20th September 1854, before the heights of the river Alma, and on the 25th of the next month at the bloody engagement at Balaklava, and last not least again in ten days, on the 5th November, at Inkermann. With the Peace, he finally sheathed his sword. He was loaded with honours for his services in the field, but his reputation even as a military man was not of the higher order. He was at best a hero of the Gough type, but courage in a British soldier of a noble house is but a matter of course. At Balaklava he blundered into a fearful mess. He was plunged after the war into a long and angry controversy on the subject. He justified himself on the orders of Lord Raglan, but the latter denied that he had given any for the charge, and the bearer of the message—whatever it was—had been among the foremost of the victims of the action taken on it. Lord Lucan as the Commander of the Light Horse should have known better than to accept, without a remonstrance and argument, a call to destruction of his force and to the risk of tarnishing the honour of British arms. His case was different from that of the men whom he led

Half a league, half a league,

Half a league onward,

All in the valley of Death.

* * * *

"Forward, the Light Brigade!

Charge for the guns!" he said:

Into the valley of Death

Rode the six hundred.

"Forward, the Light Brigade!"

Was there a man dismay'd?

Not tho' the soldier knew

Some one had blunder'd:

Theirs not to make reply,

Theirs not to reason why,

Theirs but to do and die:

Into the valley of Death

Rode the six hundred.

Luckily, the honor of England was saved by splendour of the execution, the cool steadiness of the British soldier and the exuberance of British valour. As the French General Bosquet said, It was magnificent, but it was not war. If anything were wanting to complete the triumph of retreat, it was supplied by English Literature. It would be worth incurring a larger disaster for any nation to have such a patriotic lay as the occasion brought forth. It is simply perfect. His bitterest enemies may forgive the deceased nobleman for having, by his rash eagerness for fight, afforded the occasion for the production of the finest war song in the world. Appropriate in rhythm and movement and dramatic in expression, the Charge of the Light Brigade breathes fire and sword, and brings the listener into the very thick of the terrible conflict and carnage.

ILL-FEELING BETWEEN CLASSES AND ITS ADVOCATE.

In a recent issue of the Pioneer, is a long article under the heading "Sedition and its Antidote." Often enough, have we noticed in our contemporary's columns articles clearly intended to set class against class, people against people, Mahomedans against Hindoos, North Country Rajpoots and Shicks against the Bengalis, and now it would try its best to widen the breach between Anglo-Indians and Eurasians and Natives.

In the article to which I allude, we read, "The disgusting manners of the increasing numbers of low class Europeans and Eurasians towards natives of rank is a source of constantly growing friction." This sentence bears on its very face the stamp of recklessness and absurdity, for we ask where and how do natives of rank come in contact with low class Europeans and Eurasians? It is not the poor European and Eurasian that causes the "friction" the Pioneer complains of, but the haughtiness and incivilities offered to natives of rank by the governing classes, the Civilians of India. I have known men paying twenty, nay thirty thousand rupees towards the land taxes of this country, kept in the blazing sun hanging about the tents of his mightiness the Deputy Commissioner Sahib or the Collector Sahib, without even the civility of a chair being offered to them, because the Zemindar had refused to lend an elephant or had not sent a dallee up to the Huzzoor's expectations, or, even on some occasions, because the native of rank would not tip the Huzzoor's bearer or chaprassi. This fact has not only been witnessed by me over and over again, but also by one of our most able politicians some years ago, when he was in India and was one of the causes of the appointment of the Commission to enquire into the way India was governed and the actual requirements of the country. There is not the slightest doubt that the original scope of the enquiries that this should have made, were much burked and curtailed by those in power and but comparatively a dry bone given to the country. But thank God this Commission will not be the last. One must and will again shortly sit upon the working of the present system of recruiting the Covenanted and Uncovenanted Civil Services of India.

Civilians were supposed to receive the high pay they get to prevent their palms from itching, but travelling about the country as I do, especially amongst respectable natives, it is impossible to close my ears to the revelations of bribery and corruption that daily reach them in ordinary conversation, and not only mine but of all Englishmen that respectable Natives can trust and before whom they do not fear to speak openly and aboveboard.

With regard to the modern Civilian, the handwriting on the wall Mene Mene Tkel Et., has appeared and it only requires a few more Crawfords, Laidmans, Beameses, Sir Alfred Lyalls with Madras and other scandals for the Civilian Oligarchy and Civilianism, as it at present exists, to be wiped out. It is only the other day that the mouthpiece of Civilians was advocating that the Hindoos and Mahomedans should be allowed to fight out their religious quarrels. What would England say if the Times or the Standard had advocated the same policy with regard to Roman Catholics and Orangemen in Ireland and that the Irish Constabulary should not interfere when there was a religious outbreak on account of opposition-procession.

The Pioneer goes on to say, "In testing loyalty the first criterion is that a man's acts should tend to make the people contented. To stir up discontent should be treason." We ask what should be thought of the ruler both as an honest man and a politician when the country asks for an enquiry, a public enquiry, into an offence against the predominant religion of the inhabitants of that country, and the Government, through the advice of Civilian Secretaries, were to tell them flatly that they would not give them that enquiry? If the Government expects its people to be loyal to them, they must be loyal and honest with their subjects. Do the acts of the generality of the Civilians in India lead one to believe that they treat Natives of rank with besitting courtesy? I can emphatically state that they do not. Here is a case in point. When at Benares, last hot weather, many respectable Natives wished to hold a public meeting respecting the Benares Temple case, for the purpose of having a petition drawn up pointing out to the Government of India that the action of the Government in looting the temples and for the misappropriation of the trust money was an act diametrically opposed to the utterances of Her Gracious Majesty in her Proclamation and was an infringement of the religious liberties of the Hindoos confirmed to them by that Proclamation, the great Bengalee orator, the Secretary of the Dharma Arya Somaj drafted out a petition to the Chairman of the Municipality, Mr. White, c.s., Collector of Benares, asking for permission to have the use of the Town Hall, Benares, for the purpose of a meeting on a subject of the utmost importance to all Hindoos. In accordance with a Municipal ruling it was necessary to get this petition countersigned by six respectable reises of the City of Benares. The signs of the petition were

Ram Kali Chowdhri,	Retired Subordinate Judge.
Munshi Sadho Lal,	Banker.
Mr. Sanyal, M. A.,	Professor of Mathematics, Benares College.
Mahdeo Das,	Banker.
Gokul Chund,	Banker.
One of the Leading Pundits,	Professor of Sanskrit, Benares College.

The application was granted, Mr. White writing across the application that he did not see any reason why the meeting should not be held in the Town Hall. In printing the post card notices of the meeting, the printer by error put down that the meeting would be held on Sunday the 19th of April. It so happened that Sunday fell on the 24th, so to prevent any mistake I went to the Municipal Secretary, to whom I had been referred by the Chairman, and explained the error that had taken place in printing the notices, and asked if it would make any difference if the meeting was held on Sunday the 20th. Mr. White gave the Municipal Secretary instruction that the sanction to hold the meeting in the Town Hall was withdrawn and ordered the native gentlemen who had signed the petition to attend at his Kutchery. Here he spoke to them roughly. Ram Kali Chowdhari, Munshi Sadho Lal and Professor Sanyal all spoke up and said there was no reason for refusing to allow the meeting to be held in the Town Hall, that Mr. White having given sanction he could not well withdraw it, that if the Town Hall had been wanted for any one else but Captain Hearsey, Mr. White would not have acted in this way. Mr. White replied that he was afraid Captain Hearsey would abuse the Civilians and that there might be a row, and that this being a religious matter and a matter which had been settled over 30 years ago by the Government of India, it ought to be allowed to rest and not raked up afresh. Moonshree Sadho Lal said that he was ready to go security that there would be neither row nor disturbance of any kind. Mr. White again said to these gentlemen that it was for a religious purpose and for that reason likewise he would not grant the Town Hall. It was pointed out that Sre Krishna Prosen Sen had applied for and obtained the use of the Hall in the previous year for the celebration of the anniversary of the Arya Dharma Somaj which was an entirely religious affair. Mr. White then said it was for a political purpose to protest against the action of the Indian Government and therefore on that ground he would not allow the use of the Town Hall. It was pointed out to him that the Town Hall had already been on more than one occasion used for political meetings, viz., for a meeting to protest against the Income Tax and also for a meeting to protest against the increase of the Salt Tax. Mr. White, driven into a corner, said he did not care, he would not allow the Town Hall to be used for the purpose that it was wanted, and again spoke very harshly to the native gentlemen in question for asking the Town Hall for Captain Hearsey's use. The Native gentlemen were much annoyed at this treatment and I was at the time very nearly reporting the case officially to the Lieutenant-Governor of the North West Provinces. It is men of the stamp of Mr. White, who are not gentlemen in our acceptation of the term, that do these acts which cause them and the whole of their service to be looked on with the most intense hatred by all the unofficial and respectable classes in India.

ANDREW HEARSEY, Captain.

UNDER WHICH KING?

I bear my tribute to the courage and love of justice which induced the Indian Mirror to publish the unjust and malicious attack upon it, penned by Mr. Hume. But to any thoughtful mind that letter gives food for serious reflection. Who is Mr. Hume? He is a Civilian who gained a peculiar nickname in the Mutiny. He has been Secretary to the Government of India, in the Department of Odds and Ends. He is a retired Civilian who has gone through the strange experience of seeing his department revived and his work given to another. And to-day he professes to be the exponent of free native public opinion, and yet in this case he discourages and discountenances honest opinion fearlessly expressed. I and a good many others believe in what Mr. Hume denounces. But his action makes us ask, In what way it is possible for Mr. Hume to assert that he expresses the views of the natives, and reflects the opinions of native society, while the Mirror does neither the one nor the other? Where has this Daniel received his commission that he should thus come to judgment? But besides his offence against the Mirror he has gone out of his way to bring down discredit upon the cause we have at heart. The son of Jocy has shown himself no match for the Gallio of Naini Tal. Who authorised Mr. Hume to risk so desperate and so unnecessary an adventure? Did he think his Gallio would come down and be quietly bound, or did he suppose a man so trained to public discussion as Sir A. Colvin would stultify himself and make himself a reproach in India, and a laughing stalk in England, simply to oblige his quondam colleague with a cheap and nasty triumph? Shame! Shame! if such are to be the leaders of the hopes of the Indian Nation. But Sir, I would ask your permission and forbearance to go a step further. The Congress is put forward as a national movement on the part of the natives of India—a movement we ought all to be proud of. Yet my cheeks burn with indignation when I see such men as Mr. W. C. Bonerjee, the Editor of the Mirror and the eloquent Surendra Nath obscured in their legitimate enterprise and their patriotic efforts by the ever meddling, ever interfering, ever objectionable Anglo-Indian. Let us make our national movement, national. Let us, strong in our sense of duty to our native land, in the justice of our cause, and in the righteousness of our contentions, discard once and for ever the patronage of a daring and disappointed foreigner. See to what reproach, odium and obloquy we expose ourselves and with justice. We, who are the Indian Nation, are to be represented in Bengal by the son of Jocy, the Scotch Radical, an ex-heaven-born, in Madras by an English Barrister, in Bombay by a Parsee, who has been rejected with contumely by Finsbury, where even the street boys make a joke of his name, and in England by a man who is credited with cutting himself off from all Beliefs and by an ex-Indian journalist. Are all these foreigners members of the Indian Nation? Or are our noblest and highest aspirations to be made the cat's paw of a section and not the best accepted section of British Radicalism? Mr. Hume and his English confre'es have like the shoe maker gone beyond their last, when they are so eaten up with the conceit that they represent us, as to dare to rebuke us if we dance to any other pipe than their own. No, Sir, the time has come and the man has come. In place of Mr. Hume it is our duty to install Mr. Bonerjee. He has the culture, the far-seeing intellect, the pure and unselfish patriotism which those who now lead us cannot possibly have and only ungracefully affect. Let Madras which maintains such a paper as the Hindu, find amongst Hindoos a leader fit to act as the colleague of our own friend and guide. Let Bombay follow the example of Madras. Then and only then shall we be in an honest position from which to fearlessly challenge the suffrages of the world; then and then only can the Indian Nation assert itself and demand as its right the respect and attention of the Government and people of England. Is it possible that a people so astute as the English can believe in an Indian Nation, when, except Messrs. Bonerjee, Lall Mohun Ghose and Naoroji, all the representatives of India and its people are self-commissioned Englishmen? Instead of creating sympathy, the bulk of the English people will hold that a section of the extreme Radicals are engaged in the effort to palm off an Indian Parnellism as an Indian National movement. Far be this reproach from us, who after all must be the bones and the sinews of the Congress. To shew the utter and comprehensive selfishness of the English clique, which is playing some game of their own with the natural desire of educated natives, to turn their education to the service of India, we are told we are to have the next Congress presided over, by whom? By a noble Indian? By a man whose name and position must make the world believe he knows those whom he represents? By a native statesman? No, none of these can be found, or if they can be found, are not thought worthy by Hume and Co., to stand forward as the mouthpiece of our national movement. In their place we are told we are to have Mr. George Yule. A man who certainly has lived in India, who certainly is a friend to the natives, who represents nothing in England, and no political views in India, unless it be those views which would make Simla cease from being the Indian Capua. It would be very kind and very good of Mr. Yule to allow himself to be put forward on this occasion—but will he? If he do, where will he carry weight? What is the object of making him President? Will it make the National movement of India national, to be presided over by an English gentleman? Why should we submit to a worse tyranny on the part of a little group of Anglo-Indians, than anything we suffer from the Government of India? Let us rouse ourselves and face and overcome the false and degrading spectacle to be presented to the world, that we cannot represent ourselves. Of course we may be grateful to Mr. Hume for having shown us the way, and we need not enquire too narrowly into the motives which actuated him in doing so. But oppression cancels gratitude. Haughtiness provokes distrust. When Mr. Hume goes out of his way to condemn the Mirror for speaking fearlessly and courageously at a moment when the public are disgusted with the vituperation and vilipending which stain and disfigure his feeble letter in reply to Sir A. Colvin, it is time for every man to ask himself, What it is that Mr. Hume represents, and why it is that out of his mouth proceed sweet words and bitter? I think Sir, that leaders of our native associations ought to consider these things and announce to Mr. Hume his deposition.

State Paper.

No. 1221—1.

From—The Secretary to the Government of India,

To—The Agent to the Governor-General in Council for the Affairs of the late King of Oudh.

Fort William, the 28th March 1888.

Foreign Department.

Sir,—I am directed to reply to your letters cited in the margin, on the subject of pensions for the nikab wives, sons, grandchildren and daughters-in-law of the late King of Oudh.

2. After consulting the Government of Bengal, the Governor-General in Council is able to approve of the principles upon which your proposals in this matter are based, and to accept their details with only slight modifications. The allowances will be fixed grants for life on the usual conditions of loyalty and good conduct. They will be intended to cover all expenses of the several recipients during their lives; and on the death of a pensioner the Government of India will be perfectly free to reconsider and settle afresh the provision, if any, to be made for his or her descendants or family. Further, the Governor-General in Council agrees in your view that the life pensions should be exclusive of, and altogether separate from, the law-jagis in which certain members of the family have interests, and the shares to which they may be entitled under the Shia Muhamadan law upon the realisation of the late King's estate.

3. With these general observations I am to convey the sanction of the Government of India to life pensions aggregating Rs. 22,490 per mensem or Rs. 2,69,880 per annum. This sanction will take effect from the 1st April 1888, and will supersede all previous orders on the subject. The detailed distribution of the aggregate sum amongst the classes and individual members of the late King's family is set out in the tabular statement appended to this letter. You will notice that the pensions allotted to the sons differ somewhat from your proposals, and that the pensions are in all cases inclusive of house-rent, and liable to the payment of income tax.

4. The only point on which there is any important divergence of opinion between the Government of Bengal and yourself, and in regard to which the Governor-General in Council has felt hesitation is the provision to be made for the eldest son, Kamr Kadr Mirza. Under the scheme of allowances from the late King's pension which was settled by the orders cited marginally (Foreign Department letter No. 973-I. P., dated the 14th December 1880), this son is at present in receipt of only Rs. 300 per mensem, and he has never enjoyed more, for he was not officially recognised by the late King as holding any exceptional position by right of birth. There is no doubt, however, as to his seniority, and the Government of India agrees with you and the Lieutenant-Governor in thinking that he should be regarded as the head of the family. His position will thus be much raised, but still it will by no means be on a level with that of the eldest son Hamid Ali, who was alive when Lord Canning's kharita of the 17th November 1860 was written. That letter, which pledges the Government to nothing, refers to circumstances altogether different from those of the present eldest son. After full consideration the Governor-General in Council accepts your opinion that a pension of Rs. 3,000 per mensem will be sufficient for Kamr Kadr Mirza. In addition to this he is granted a sum of Rs. 12,000 for the liquidation, under the supervision of yourself or your successors, of his most pressing liabilities. If, however, it should be found by experience that the case of Kamr Kadr requires more liberal treatment, the Governor-General in Council will be prepared to consider the matter.

5. The question of a title for the eldest son is a point which should be settled. It is certainly objectionable to confer upon him formally the title of "Shahzada" or "Prince," for that style would keep up ideas which are not desirable. I am to enquire whether you think that the title of "Nawab," or "Nawab Bahadur," combined, if necessary, with some territorial designation, might appropriately be conferred upon Kamr Kadr Mirza, and that of Mirza upon the other sons.

6. As regards the place of residence for the members of the late King's family, the Governor-General in Council is of opinion that they may be allowed to live in Calcutta without any special restrictions.

7. In conclusion, I am directed to state that the Government of India appreciates the marked ability and care with which you have worked out this scheme of pensions, and generally your efficient performance of the various duties of Agent to the Governor-General in Council for the Affairs of the late King.

I have the honor to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant

Holloway's Ointment and Pills. Abscesses, Erysipelas, Piles.—Unvarying success attends all who treat these diseases according to the simple printed directions wrapped round each pot and box. They are invaluable to the young and timid, whose bashfulness sometimes endangers life. Though apparently local, diseases of this nature are essentially blood diseases, but a little attention, moderate perseverance, and trifling expense will enable the most diffident to conduct any case to a happy issue without exposing secret infirmities to any one. The Ointment checks the local inflammation and alleviates the throbbing pains. These directions also clearly point out when and how Holloway's Pills are to be taken, that their purifying and regulating powers may assist by adjusting and strengthening the constitution.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder
 Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet
 (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and
 many Bengalees, is not accurate as a represenation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad

 story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder;
 and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen
 could give individual instances of Bengalee
 faithfulness almost unique in history, taking
 all the circumstances of our relation to India
 into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both
 courageous in the expression of his opinions,
 and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared
 speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five
 members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body
 of men—small for that large province who
 are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young,
 but grave and aged; some have, in the course
 of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted,
 so that on its return to them it has amazed
 none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however,
 cannot be denied.

In the forefront of this little band is the author of this book of travels, Baboo Sambhu
 Chunder Mookerjee—a writer of high repute,
 as I have said, also an administrator, as the
 reader will see from the title-page to this book.
 A keener, yet a kindlier satirist, one might seek for and not find. His use of the English language has astonished many an educated
 Englishman; and the quality of his reading is shown by his marvellous power of quotation;
 not merely from authors like Shakespeare, and Milton, and Macaulay, and men eminent in science, but from out-of-the-way old ballads,
 and little-known old pamphlets, in the application of which he leaves one wondering—first,
 how he obtained the productions at all, and
 secondly, how, having obtained them, he learned to apply them so appositely to the
 subjects which he intends them to illustrate.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened
 the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens
 the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a
 Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice.
 A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and,
 though the fair maid and he are divided by
 race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face,
 without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much
 might be said, and still leave much more to
 say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing
 in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles
 over their disputes, while he astonishes them
 by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of
 his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in
 its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but
 of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to quack, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell:

 [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen,"
 ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor
 Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah
 dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that
 bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian;
 not English. Where an English artist's mind
 would be filled with European ideas, the mind
 of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class
 of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive
 and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

On the eve of one of his journeys, our author was placed in a dilemma of a kind
 not unknown to travellers in India, but not on that account the less stupid. He wished to go by a particular boat, and took time by the forelock for that purpose. The fare was at first stated as 90 rupees, to pay which he offered "a new crisp, fresh British India" note
 for 100 rupees. "It was," he adds, "fresh from the Currency Office, and had been received
 only the day before from another Government department." The rest of the story is
 thus told: [Extract.]

The humour of the little sketch is worth
 something. I can fancy the author laughing even in his dismay; for he can laugh well at others, and equally well at himself. I shall only venture on one more passage; and I give
 it as showing the spirit of the man who dares
 to call his newspaper Prince and Peasant.
 He desired to return to his home in Bengal,
 and to bid adieu, for a time at least, to Independent Tipperah, where he had been located
 "some two years." He received the Maha-rajah's permission to return home; but still he
 could not get away. [Extract.]

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of
 courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers
 and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest,
 the man whose plans are the wisest as plans;
 but the man who, with plans or without them,
 gives confidence to the people, and confidence
 not merely in his justice, but also in his con-siderateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has
 relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once
 more recall, as I easily and very vividly can,
 the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as
 known to me many years ago. I see him, as
 I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra
 Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika;
 and I feel and say, with all earnestness and
 sincerity, that among these are men whom
 the Government of India would be wise in
 recognising and winning entirely to its side.
 They are men on whom no really generous
 word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times
 with men of kindred occupations at home,
 and I think that they are as a rule by far
 the truer gentlemen in good manners, and
 often in very much more than mere manners.
 May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless
 their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by
SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINI DASSY
(Author of Kabirah, Bhavt Kuson.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression. It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer. -The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Sumati Guindra Mohini's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem -The Calcutta Review.

Important News for India,

WHERE FEVERS AND CHOLERA
REIGN SUPREME.

A RECENT TRAVELLER ON THE
Chinese Coast found that District remarkably FREE FROM TYPHOID FEVER and CHOLERA. He soon discovered the cause. The people there do not drink cold water from tanks or wells, often extremely impure, but keep a pan of water constantly boiling, into which from time to time they drop a little Tea, and when thirsty THEY DRINK HOT TEA! If the weak and adulterated Teas of China can do this, what may not the pure and strong Teas of India be expected to effect?

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

LOVE IN THE LAW :

OR THE JILTED BARRISTER'S ADDRESS.

SAY, Mary, canst thou sympathize
With one whose heart is bleeding,
Compelled to wake from love's young dream,
And take to special pleading ?

For since I lost my suit to you,
I care not now a fraction
About these tiresome suits at law—
These senseless forms of action.

But in my lovely chamber oft,
When clients leave me leisure,
In musing o'er departed joys
I find a mournful pleasure.

How well I know that spot where first
I saw that form ethereal—
But, ah ! 'n transitory things
The venue 's not material.

And reading Archbold's practice now,
I scarce believe 'tis true,
That I could set my heart upon
An arch-bold girl like you.

But then, that bright blue eye sent forth
A most unerring dart,
Which, like a special capias, made
A prisoner of my heart.

And in the weakness of my heart,
One fatal, long vacation—
I gave a pledge to prosecute,
And filed my declaration.

At first, your taking time to plead,
Gave hope for my felicity—
The doubtful negative you spoke,
Seemed bad for its duplicity.

And then, your blush so clearly seemed
To pardon my transgression,
I thought I was about to snap
A judgment by confession.

But soon I learned, (most fatal truth,)
How rashly I had counted—
For non assumpsit was the plea
To which it all amounted.

Deceitful maid, another swain
Was then beloved by thee—
The preference you gave to him
Was fraudulent to me.

Ah ! when we love, (so Shakspeare says,)
Bad luck is sure to have us—
The course of true love never ran Without some special traverse.

Say, what inducement could you have,
To act so base a part ?
Without this—that you smiled on me—
I ne'er had lost my heart.

My rival, I was doomed to view
A husband's right assert—
And now 'tis wrong to think of you,
For you 're a femme covert.

When late I saw your son and heir,
'T was wormwood for a lover—
For then, the plea of infancy
My heart could not get over.

I kissed the little brat, and said,
Much happiness I wish you—
But, oh, I felt he was to me
An immaterial issue.

Mary, adieu !—I 'll mourn no more,
Nor pen pathetic ditties—
My pleading was of no avail,
And so I 'll stick to Chitty's.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

BOTH the Viceroy and the Lieutenant-Governor return to the capital on Thursday, the 29th November. Our criticism of the latter's gazetted movements is justified by the event. Sir Stuart Bayley has revised his programme and will reach Calcutta in time to receive the Viceroy. Lord Dufferin will arrive at the Sealdah Railway Station at 4-30 P. M. The route laid down for the entry to Government House is by the Circular Road, Dhurmtolla, Esplanade East, and Old Court House Street into the Government House by the North-East Entrance.

THE Black Expedition has ended. General McQueen has issued his Farewell Orders, in which he congratulates the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of all corps and departments—"on the thorough manner in which they have carried out the work entrusted to them by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief." He thus summarises the results :—

"The Hasanzai, Akazai, Pariari Sayads, and Tikariwals have tendered their submission in full, in accordance with the terms dictated to them by the British Government. The Machai Peak and Thakot, as well as

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

Pokal, the principal village of the Allais, have been visited by the Force, and the construction of roads along the Indus Valley to the Chagarai border and to Thakot from the Agror Valley, gives the power of rapid movement to troops in the future, which will go far towards maintaining the security of our frontier and our friendly relations with the Cis-Indus tribes.

The enemy against whom the Force has had to contend have hitherto considered themselves secure from attack, owing to the mountainous and supposed inaccessible nature of their country; but the Hazara Field Force of 1888 has proved to these tribes that their highest and most difficult passes, hitherto untrodden by the foot of European, can be traversed by any well-organised force.

Much hard work has been entailed both in marching and road-making, and the exposure at high elevations by the Nos. 1, 2 and 3 Columns, and the heat experienced by the River Column during a period of six weeks, without tents, has been most trying.

Notwithstanding the hardships, the Major General is greatly pleased to report

"the cheerful manner in which all duties have been carried out, the exemplary conduct of the Force, and the soldierly spirit which has animated all ranks on every occasion. The almost total absence of sickness amongst the troops, from first to last, showed that the fine condition of the men left nothing to be desired by any commander."

The withdrawal of the troops before the submission of the Chagarzais is explained elsewhere. They would not send any jirgah. The time fixed for it expired, still no jirgah came. They might have been spared this call, for—as it is now said in defence of the march back of our troops—this tribe never gave any cause of offence and there was no casus belli against them.

THE Sikkim Field force is also breaking up. It will not be a complete withdrawal though. A small post will remain at Gnatong to guard the road, and a larger one at Guntok, till the arrival of the Chinese Ampa and a definite understanding with the Tibetans.

ONE of our leading "stars" has left the Indian theatre "for good." Last Saturday, Sir Charles Aitchison bade "positively his last farewell" to India and took ship at Karachi. It is to his credit that from his position in life, he rose to be the Foreign Secretary of the Government of India, a Chief Commissioner, the Lieutenant-Governor of an Indian Province and an ordinary Member of the Imperial Council. He brought from his Scotch home some conscience and did not leave it at Alexandria. Accordingly he got into disgrace during the Lytton regime. He landed in India the same year that Lord Dalhousie annexed Oudh, that is, 32 years ago, and he left the country to the regret of many Indians who had known him or received favors at his hands.

WE see that the eminent Artist Mr. Archer has come back to Calcutta from Western India. The Marchioness of Dufferin and Ava is also expected in the metropolis next Thursday. Would it not be desirable to secure a portrait of Her Excellency from the hands of Mr. Archer, for the decoration of the Town Hall? We make this suggestion, as we have not heard that any other arrangement has been made by the Committee of the Dufferin Memorial to have her ladyship's picture painted.

THE Municipal Commissioners have decided to address in the coming and address out the retiring Viceroy. They have also voted Rs. 2,000 for the caskets. We find the editor of the Indian Mirror among the sixteen who have been commissioned to draft the addresses. He was present at the meeting but took no part in the discussion.

MR. ROBERT TURNBULL, the retired Secretary of the Calcutta Corporation, has returned to Calcutta and returns to the Municipality as a Government Commissioner. Mr. Turnbull will have no more complaints on the score of neglect of his numerous native friends since his retirement.

A SHAN has made his fortune by one bound. He sold in Rangoon a ruby for Rs. 80,000. He at first wanted a lac. Never mind! Rs. 80,000 make a Cæsus in the Shan country. He may be somebody at Mandalay or Rangoon. Nobody will now shun the Shan.

THE Baboo in charge of the Bulrampore Hospital, Lucknow, will henceforth be styled Rai Bahadur Ram Lal Chuckerbutty, for—what? Does "Baboo" stink?

THE Collector of Hooghly, Mr. G. Toynbee, is engaged on a sketch of "The First Fifty years of the Administration of the District, with some account of the Portuguese, Dutch, French and Danish settlements." He is the author of a useful monograph on the history of Orissa.

THE six Punjab States of Patiala, Bhawalpur, Jhind, Nabha, Kapurthala and Faridkot have been selected to contribute troops for training for imperial purposes.

A Ghee Bill has been decided upon for Bombay. The Government has accepted the measure suggested by the local Corporation for prevention of adulteration of that necessary article of food. More vigorous working of the law is wanted here.

IN the Queen's Bench Division, before Mr. Justice Stephen and a common jury, the Revd. E. G. Roberts, Nonconformist minister, obtained damages of £2,000 against Messrs. Daniel Owen & Co. Limited, proprietors of the Western Mail, for articles and letters published in that newspaper imputing gross immorality to the minister.

THE proprietor, Mr. Edward Harrington, of the Kerry Sentinel has been fined £500 by Sir James Hannen for contempt of Court—for publishing an article declaring that the Parnell Commission is the creature of the Government and the Times. His Counsel advised apology, but Mr. Harrington refused to accept the advice. For a stupid attack on one of the Judges, our "Orator" Surrender Not was sent to jail in spite of his submission to Court.

THE Times of Ceylon writes under date the 3rd instant:—

"The police were on the alert all last night, ready to board the S. S. Hohenstanfen, having received orders to arrest one of the passengers, who is charged with criminal behaviour in respect of a certain sum of money. It seems that Lord Carrington, Governor of New South Wales, telegraphed to Sir Arthur Gordon that a man had booked his passage by the Hohens anfen under the name of H. P. Seeton, and that he stood charged with criminal misconduct in respect of a sum of money amounting to £6,000, and giving his description, but scarcely any other details. The Inspector-General of Police having obtained the permission of the German Consul to search the vessel, on the arrival of the Hohenstanfen very early this morning, Inspector Trevena of the Detective Department, accompanied by a sergeant, repaired to the vessel, and without any difficulty found the man, who was a first-class passenger to Southampton, and arrested him. He had only one trunk with him, which contained very few clothes, and in which two bags were found, one containing £5,950 in gold, and the other £15, also in gold. On being brought on shore, he was at once conveyed to the Police Head-quarters, accompanied by Captain Hansard, where he underwent an inquiry; and from thence he was taken to the Harbour Police office near the Breakwater, where he was found lying dead this afternoon."

The Ceylon paper concludes with the honest and sage remark—"This is a sad termination to this distressing affair." To us, this is a mere abuse of language. Sad the termination may be called conventionally, as involving the loss of a life. As a term of sympathy, the word is thrown away. But this British writer of Ceylon is all sympathy for the rascal, and talks of "this distressing affair." Wherein is it—the affair as distinct from its termination—distressing and to whom? For our part, we should say, it was a characteristic termination of a villainous affair—a fit end of a career of crime. We suppose of course, the fellow committed suicide—sneaking out of the world for fear of facing the consequences of deliberate crime. As for the Ceylon paper, we hope the Times does not represent insular ethics.

IN his address to a deputation of the Berlin Municipality on the occasion of laying the final stone of the Hamburg Harbour, the Emperor of Germany

"expressed deep annoyance with the Press for persisting in drawing invidious comparisons between himself and his father. He hoped his family affairs would not be discussed. This extraordinary sally, combined with the Emperor's want of tact in alienating the Pope and Count Taaffe, is the subject of serious comment abroad."

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—The combined ill effects of overcrowding, sedentary occupations and monotony of life are only too well known to those who have to pass the best part of their lives labouring in factories and crowded workrooms. The compulsory confinement weakens the general health and induces chronic constipation, indigestion, and various forms of skin diseases. Holloway's remedies are of priceless value to persons of this class, for they can be used without entailing loss of work, being purely vegetable in their composition, and consequently act without harshness on the most delicate system. The experience of more than forty years proves that no means surpass Holloway's remedies for curing bad legs, bad breasts, piles, and wounds of all kinds.

A PROTEST has been entered by a large number of Members of both Houses of Parliament, Professors, University Lecturers and Fellows and others, in the columns of the Nineteenth Century, against competitive examination. They consider it an evil to be avoided, consisting in dangerous mental pressure and misdirection of energies and aims. They make a number of recommendations which may be reduced to—

1. The appointment of a Royal Commission to consider the subject of official appointments by examination.
2. The appointment of Committees representing the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge and other educational bodies, to inquire how different kinds of examinations react upon education.
3. The appointment of a committee representing the signatories of the protest to inquire into the methods of appointment by corporations, hospitals, and private firms.
4. That a request be made to the masters of public schools to inquire into the influences resulting from the examinations to which boys are subjected, and to suggest what substitutes should be employed for some of the examinations."

ON Thursday the 22nd, a salvo of fifteen guns announced the assumption by Mr. David Miller Barbour of the Financial Membership of Council. The previous Saturday, the Hon'ble Philip Peceval Hutchins, C. S. I., of the Madras Civil Service took upon himself the execution of office vacated by Sir Charles Aitchison.

THE Librarian of the Shakespeare Memorial, at Stratford-on-Avon, has requested the Secretary of State for India for copies of every edition of Shakespeare's plays and every book relating to the poet published in any Indian language.

A SCHEME is afloat for a Public School in the Panchmari sanitarium, in Bombay, for the poor Anglo-Indian youth.

IT is said the Nizam, with a small following, made a minute inspection of the building vacated by Colonel Marshall. The object is still a mystery.

A EURASIAN in Madras bequeathed by his will Rs. 20,000, for the annual relief of the poor of his class out of the interest. He further enjoined that the sum was to be funded as "Murray Memorial Fund." It is not said how the executors intend to utilize the money or whether they propose public subscriptions in aid of the Fund. Is there to be a Murray Dole?

THE Secretary of State has accorded his sanction to the appointment of Professor Forrest and Director of Records in Bombay.

NAWAB KHURSHED JAH leaves Hyderabad tomorrow on a visit to this city. Some of his people have already entered appearance.

WHEN country spirit manufactured in British India, upon which excise duty has been paid, is imported by sea into Calcutta, and the rate of excise duty at the port of exportation is lower than that chargeable in Calcutta, a differential duty will be levied by the Excise Superintendent of Calcutta at one rupee per gallon of spirit London Proof.

THE Test Examination of private students from the Presidency and Chota Nagpore Divisions, for the next Entrance Examination will be held on Tuesday, the 11th December.

AN addition has been sanctioned to the Municipal bylaw of the town, namely,

- "No. 59 A. When no separate arrangements are made for the removal of refuse, resulting from any business, trade, or profession, which refuse is of a description that ought to be removed, the Commissioners will charge the person carrying on such business, trade, or profession the same fee for its removal as if it had actually been deposited in the public streets."

This is, we believe, to generalize the fee and to make it payable all round like the night soil rate in the new law. In other words, this is an additional tax on business trade or profession hitherto exempt. This only saves domestic refuse.

IT is all very well for us to complain of Anglo-Indian trying to divide our Mussulman brethren against us. Our worst enemies, we fear, are of our own household. We badly want leaders of moderation and discretion throughout the country.

In the rioting case at Burwai, in the Holkar Territory, about thirty prisoners were discharged, in the absence of evidence, but the rest of the accused were, after a patient trial, for being members of an unlawful assembly, rioting, hurt and grievous hurt, convicted and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment and to pay fines. The Eastern Herald hears that the Hindus, no sooner the discharge of the Mahomedans was ordered, sent a telegram to the Maharaja Holkar complaining of the action of the local authorities. We are glad that our Mhow contemporary condemns this foolish precipitancy and exhibition of animus :

"This was a most unwise step for the Hindu inhabitants of Burwai to take when the case was being judicially tried by a special officer. Of course the Maharaja knows how to treat such communications. From all accounts we know that no Hindu is at any disadvantage by the release of the Mahomedan prisoners. Why should they grumble then?"

AT Patiala, the Viceroy thus announced the acceptance of the offer by the Native States towards defences of the Empire :—

"The Government of India has not failed to give its earnest attention to the offers by native Princes, and, while knowing them to be as sincere as they are generous, has endeavoured to work out a scheme by which they might be turned to advantage in a manner both gratifying to the Princes themselves and of material value to the Empire, I believe we have succeeded in working out some scheme, and this Darbar seems to me to afford a fitting opportunity for its public inauguration. The Government of India does not think it necessary nor in all respects desirable, to accept from the Native states of India the pecuniary assistance which they have so freely tendered, but in one very important particular we wish to enlist their co-operation. The armies of the Native States are strong in numbers, but at present of various degrees of efficiency. Among many of them there exist warlike traditions and fine soldierly material, while some already contain regiments well worthy to share in any active operations which Her Majesty's troops may be called upon to undertake. What we propose, in a few words, is that we should ask these Chiefs who have especially good fighting material in their armies, to raise a portion of these armies to such a pitch of general efficiency as will make them fit to go into action side by side with the Imperial troops. For this purpose some extra expenditure will be necessary, as troops in the present day, to be thoroughly fit for service, require very complete arrangements in the way of arms, transport, equipment, and organisation generally; but we shall in no case ask any Native State to maintain a larger force of this description than it can well afford to support, and we do not doubt that under these conditions the Chiefs, knowing that the Government of India has no desire to take undue advantage of their loyalty, will be glad of the opportunity of making good their words and providing troops for the defence of the Empire. I trust that the Chiefs selected will, in any case, regard the acceptance of their offer as an honourable distinction, while those whose armies it is not found possible to utilise in the same manner will understand that if they cannot usefully contribute to the fighting strength of the army, they can in other ways render service equally meritorious and equally sure to win the approval of Her Majesty the Queen-Empress.

To help these Chiefs in the work of maintaining the troops selected for service, a few English officers will be appointed as advisers and inspectors. These officers will have their head-quarters at some centre point in British territory, and will visit the several States in turn. Capable native drill instructors will also be lent to the Native States from our own regiments. The selected troops will be armed with breech-loading weapons, presented to the several States by the British Government. These will be Carbines for the Cavalry and Snider Rifles for the Infantry. In addition to this each Punjab Chief will receive from the British Government a battery of four guns.

It is hoped that in this way, while each force will remain purely a State force, recruited in the territories of its Chief, and serving within them, the troops composing it will gradually be made so efficient as to enable the Imperial Government to use them as part of its available forces to meet any external danger. A number of the States of the Punjab and others elsewhere have, I am happy to say, expressed their full concurrence in this scheme, and arrangements will be made to carry it into effect as far as they are concerned. I cannot but feel that I have been very fortunate in being able to announce before I leave India the inauguration of this measure, which will, I hope, help to show the world in what estimation Her Majesty the Queen-Empress holds the Native States of India, and how she appreciates the conspicuous loyalty and attachment of their Chiefs."

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE Viceroy started on his down tour on Thursday the 13th, with the regretful farewell of the Himalayan capital, and arrived at Lahore the next day in the evening, where at the Railway station, he was received by the Lieutenant-Governor, and other Civil and Military officers and the Nawab of Bahawalpur and the Rajas of Nabha and Faridkot. The Municipality also welcomed him by an address in Urdu. A large crowd had gathered outside the station. Having replied to the address, Lord Dufferin drove to Government House along roads decorated with bunting and lined with troops. The day closed with a dinner party and a crowded Conversazione brilliant with the costly dresses of the Rajas and Reises. The Viceroy, as usual with him, passed an hour and an half pleasantly in receiving and conversing with, those introduced to him. On Thursday four more addresses—three from the Mahomedans and one from the Sikhs—were received and replied to. The same day Lady Dufferin declared the Lady Aitchison Hospital open. After an address by Lord Dufferin, Lady Dufferin distributed prizes, one pardanashin closely veiled is reported to have been present at this distribution. The Viceroy next visited the Veterinary College and presented diplomas to some thirteen students. In the afternoon, the Nawab and the two Rajas previously mentioned paid visits separately to the Viceroy. Then the Viceroy at a very simple ceremony invested Nawab Imam Baksh Khan with his K.C.I.E. ship.

Friday the 16th was Lady Dufferin's day at Lahore. A deputation representing all-classes of the Punjab presented her an address signed by 50,000 persons, for her efforts in the cause of the Indian people. The women of Gujranwala and the pardanashins of Lahore followed with their addresses. After returning the visits of the Chiefs, the Viceroy left in the evening for Patiala.

The Patiala festivities commenced the next day the 17th with the reception of the Lieutenant-Governor at 7-30 in the morning. The Viceroy arrived at about 11, and was welcomed by the Maharaja accompanied by the Lieutenant-Governor, the Rajas of Jhind and Kapurthala, the chief officers of the State, and many European and native gentlemen besides. The Viceroy was then conducted under an escort of cavalry to the Camp erected for the guests opposite the Moti Bagh. Here some 200 tents ran in parallel rows, the two principal avenues ending with the Viceregal and Lieutenant-Governor's shamianas, with all conveniences for the distinguished party and the guests. At one o'clock, amid the firing of salutes, the playing of the National Anthem, the Maharaja and the Rajas of Jhind and Kapurthala began to pay visits to the Viceroy, who received them with due honors in a beautifully fitted up tent called the Viceregal Reception-room. In the afternoon there was a Durbar in the Fort. Here the Maharaja was presented with a marriage gift of Rs. 5,000, a pearl necklace, a robe of honor and silk stuffs. It was at this Durbar that Lord Dufferin announced the policy of his Government for the utilization of the troops of the Native States for the defence of the Empire. The day closed with illuminations and fireworks. There was a dinner too in the general mess-tent. The Viceroy proposed the toast of the Queen-Empress, and the Maharaja proposed the health of Lord and Lady Dufferin. An Evening Party by Lady Dufferin brought the entertainments of the evening to an end.

The next (18th) morning many people rose in the camp to be apprised of the danger they had escaped overnight. Lady Helen Blackwood's tent had caught fire and it and everything in it been burnt to ashes. Fortunately, the night was still and the fire could not spread. Lady Helen had seen the fire start near the fireplace and saved herself by a timely flight. The fire is attributed to some defect in the fireplace. At midnight the Viceroy had noticed the canvas wall near the chimney smouldering. It was of course promptly put down. Later on it had caught fire again.

In the afternoon the Lieutenant-Governor and the Viceroy returned the visits of the Maharaja. Sir James Lyall accepted of the Maharaja the usual peshkash—a bandil or turhan—and in his turn presented a golden clock, a gun and a sword as marriage gifts to the Maharaja.

The Viceroy, in his return visit, touched and remitted nuzzurs from the high officers of the State, but accepted a khillut from the Maharaja.

Here too Lady Dufferin bore her mission in mind and laid the foundation-stone of the Zenana Hospital. The cost of the building has been estimated at Rs. 30,000. The annual cost is given at Rs. 10,000.

Later in the afternoon there was a parade of the State troops under command of Sirdar Bakshi Gunda Singh, the Commander-in-Chief. The Viceroy and the Lieutenant-Governor in company of the Maharaja drove to the saluting point, and the troops marched past very creditably, specially the 1st Regiment of Infantry.

A gymkhana closed the day and the festivities at Patiala. The sports consisted of lime-cutting, tent-pegging (in which the Maharaja himself took part) elephant and camel races, acrobatic feats, &c.

Lady Dufferin left Patiala the same evening for Agra and the Viceroy the next morning for Aligarh, which His Excellency reached at 4 P.M., on the 20th. He was then taken over to Sir Ahmed's College. Here he was assailed by an address. After replying to it and inspecting the College and partaking of afternoon tea, he joined the special and reached Etawah at 10-10 P.M., and left for Cawnpore and Allahabad at six in the morning of the 21st.

In his reply to the Berlin Municipal deputation, the Emperor sharply noticed the contumacy of the Press in drawing invidious comparisons between himself and his father, and he hoped that his family affairs would not be matter of public comment. The aspiration of Kaiser is not to be disregarded, and we may expect, for a period at least, a re-action of loyalty in the German press.

The Emperor probably meant more than he said. He must have had on his mind the invidious comparisons, instituted all over Germany, between his father and grandfather. Whatever his want of tact, he possesses discretion enough not to bring all the domestic linen into the highway to wash. He could not well in propria persona in public arraign his own mother, as he would virtually have done had he noticed the publication of the late Emperor's Diary, it being no secret that the Dowager Empress Victoria connives at that publication. There was another reason for imperial reticence. The matter was sub judice. The book, after having been pooh-poohed as apocryphal by the organs of Government and of Prince Bismarck, whose reputation has suffered by it as much as his master the Emperor William, was the subject of a prosecution against author and publisher.

The gravamen of the offence of the late Emperor's Diary lies in its disclosing the true author of German Unity and, of course, the true hero for German devotion. It was the late Emperor, who, first of all the statesmen of the country, understood the political problem and saw the opportunity for solution in the success of the war of 1870. It was the Crown Prince of that year who forced upon Emperor and Chancellor (Bismarck) the solution and made them submit to his clear vision, lucid reasoning, and persistent patriotism. At least, that is the meaning generally put upon the Diary published.

We quote the most significant passage, namely, the entry on the 3rd September 1870, after the surrender of Sedan and the capture of Napoleon. The Crown Prince wrote:—

"Bismarck came to see me at Donchery. We retain Alsace in the German administration. The idea of the federation of the empire and the re-establishment of the Imperial dignity had scarcely been thought of. I noticed that he was only inclined to it conditionally, and I took care not to press it upon him, although I was convinced that it must come about. Events are leading towards it, and circumstances cannot be more favourable than they are owing to this victory. On the 30th September I spoke to the King about the Imperial question which was maturing. In the meantime negotiations with the German States have already commenced. The King does not think this question imminent. He referred to the remark of Du-Bois-Reymond that Imperialism was antiquated; there would be in future in Germany only the King of Prussia and the German Duchies. I replied that the three Kings of Saxony, Bavaria, and Wurtemberg force us to take the lead with the Imperial title. On alluding to Napoleon his opposition at last became weaker."

THE Times has eaten humble pie. Sir John Pope Hennessy has triumphed in his suit against the Thunderer. It apologies and pays costs, and a nominal verdict by consent has been recorded. Sir John is now free to return to his own in the Mauritius, where a hearty welcome awaits him.

JOY HURRY ROY writes to a contemporary:—

"The Statutory Civilians are men educated in India. They have not received an English education, and are no better in point of education than the generality of the members of the Uncovenanted Service. It is the general opinion that they are an utter failure. Their heads have been turned by writing C. S. after their names. They are the laughing-stock of the public. Being Bengalis they associate with Bengalis. The pleaders get round them beautifully; they say to their faces that not one of the pucca Civilians can write English equal to their decisions, nor know the law so well. It is ridiculous to see how they are flattered, and with what an idiotic smirk they swallow the bait and decide cases in favour of the flatterer. They generally give musical parties in which native bajawalahs play on all kinds of noisy instruments, and there is plenty of singing of a kind by dancing girls; in short, their tastes and sympathies are with Bengali vakils and mukhtears. One or two of them adopt English customs, playing lawn-tennis and other games once or twice a week, but they do not generally make friends either with the English or their countrymen. The sooner they are abolished the better for the country."

Fe, fa, fum, I smell the hand of an Englishman! It is no use disguising. As the boy Yacoob Khan, at Herat where he was Governor, cried to Haji Vambery, penetrating through his character of a holy Durwesh, By Allah! thou art a Frank. The internal evidence is irresistible. The language and the logic as well as the sentiment are all of Britain—British—not to say of Anglo-India—Civilian. Here is an unmistakable stroke: "Being Bengalis they associate with Bengalis." And here again: "They generally give musical parties in which native bajawalas play on all kinds of noisy instruments,—like the sitar, esrar, sarangi—and there is plenty of singing of a kind by dancing girls"—singing which comes home to their bosoms. They do not pay exorbitantly for Italian and German music which they do not understand, and vieing with one another to appreciate, or look charmed by, vile Rossini and Mayerbeer. It is a pity this young gentleman has no soul for melody, or he would have been conquered by Tlang, Tlang, Tat Tlang the Tubla rings!

With Kôil notes the Buji sings!

In short, their tastes and sympathies are with Bengali vakils and muktears. In fact, they are only Bengali Baboos. The gravamen of the charge against them is that, with all their Western learning they have imbibed, they are Indian gentlemen still. The objection to them is that they have not been denationalised, and disdain not to associate with their fellows. The head and front of their offence has only this—and nothing more.

The Statutory Civilians are to be congratulated upon such evidence in their favour from the enemy. Little did the writer suspect what a certificate he was giving these Baboo Civilians. Before closing, indeed some suspicion crossed his mind and led him to stultify himself. He again discloses himself undeniably where he speaks kindly of one or two black sheep who have adopted English customs, and writes himself down an ass saying that the great majority are desperate Ishmaels or gloomy misanthropes who keep themselves aloof from human kind.

There are Statutory Civilians and Statutory Civilians, and to say that they have all failed is a shameful perversion of the fact. They have failed who could not be expected to succeed under any circumstances—the scapegraces of noble houses and young hopeleses of parents assiduous in attendance at the ante-chambers of officials with a weakness for dallies and dinners seasoned with abject flattery. They have succeeded who ought to—the men of education and proved working powers. It is true that they were educated in India. But their education is genuine and not Indian at all, except in the accident of place. The proof of the pudding is in the eating thereof. The case of the Statutory men as made out by one of them, Babu Baroda Charan Mitra, in the National Magazine, is in evidence, showing high powers of reasoning and presentation. The last number of the same periodical contains a fine article evincing research and Oriental studies, by another gentleman of the much-abused body, Babu Nanda Krishna Bose. And Babu Ashutosh Gupta lately sent to the Asiatic Society a similar paper.

THIS—in the Indian Planters' Gazette of the 20th instant—is the style in which the wiser and more gentlemanly Anglo-Indian journalists are relieving themselves of their pent-up feelings at the appointment of a third drop of Asiatic leaven to the mass of British dough on the High Court Bench:—

"The High Court opened on Friday, when the new Native Judge, Dr. Guru Dass Banerji, took his seat. All the legal comets have returned from their visit to the old country. Whatever happens to the rice crop, one may be sure that this vakil-ridden country will produce an unfailing crop of litigation during the coming year."

—the Planting interest of course not being behind-hand in supplying its quota commensurate in extent with the length and breadth of its pretensions and the dignity of Magna Charta and the voluminousness of the Statutes at Large. In thinking of the new appointment, the writer is naturally enough reminded of India as a miserable vakil-ridden country. But there was little excuse for forgetting that this is a barrister-jockeyed country. It was barrister-jockeyed before it was vakil-ridden. It was ridden to bleeding ribs and spavined backs by British lawyers in the shape of judges, advocates and attorneys, before any vakil was heard of in the East.

This writer is content with the dispensation of Providence by which a galaxy of comets periodically make their appearance in these skies, to sweep with their long bushy tails the gold mohurs and rupees of the East, to spend them beyond our participation or ken. It is the vakil brood—the distinctively native nuisance—that stinks in his nostrils.

THERE is always something provided for idle hands. Here is the season's mine sprung upon the receivers of the depreciated Rupee. "The Art of Patinage to be exemplified during the Season 1888-89, as it has never before been attempted in India." Grammar and all, of course. We have no idea of what this Art may be. Is it akin to the fine Art of Grooming, which, according to the Proverbial Philosophy of the Syce world, is as profound as the boundless Ocean? For our part, we would prefer the known pâté to the unknown delicacy patin. The Prospectus is headed "Opening on the Calcutta Maidan of the Columbia Elite Roller Staking Rink." What a rolling up of nouns! Supposing some of the nouns to have an adjectivity for the nonce, which Columbia is it? there are so many—and what of Columbia? And is Elite a proper name or the French word? If the latter, what has it in the connection? Is the "roller" of the Elite or the "rink"? Is it a call to the Elite to roll themselves on the Maidan? Then thank God, we are not of the order. It is Elite all over. For the bill goes on to speak of the "fashionable, elite, and social circles!"

This over Elite business hails from that land of unco-respectability, Australia. The showman has commenced with dividing Indian society into a new system of caste, of which the English are the Brahmans, the Europeans the Kshettriyas, the Eurasians the Vaisyas, and the Natives the Sudras. We quote the new Brahma verbatim:—

"Owing to numerous requests, we have decided to set apart Monday and Thursday evenings, and Tuesday and Wednesday mornings and afternoons, for the exclusive use of the English population of Calcutta. At other afternoon and evening sessions, the better classes of Europeans, Eurasians and Natives, will all be heartily welcomed."

LORD DUFFERIN is now on his way to Dacca. It is rarely that the highest functionaries of the Government of India stray to the older abandoned capital of Bengal. In 1824, the good, genial and classical Bishop Heber visited it when the city had recently recovered from the alarm of a surprise by the Burmese. In 1829, Lord Combre went there. And other bishops have followed for confirmation and other Generalissimos for inspection.

Provincial Governors could not avoid one of the chief cities, situated, as it is, in the heart of the Eastern Districts, but few Governors-General or Viceroyes have been there. The best remembered visit is that of Lord Northbrook. The old city, now revived a good deal by British peace and enterprise and the general prosperity under the present régime, will doubtless not stint its liberality in giving the Viceroy a proper reception. The Zemindars of the Division have hurried to the call. Preparations are already in progress. We cannot, however, admire the judgment or taste shown in one notable arrangement. The matter has already set the city in a blaze. The feeling is well expressed in the article in our leading columns "The Intended Contre-temps—at Dacca." Dacca seems to labour under a fatality. She can never rise superior to petty intrigues on public occasions. The Europeans themselves are no better than the natives, while the leading authorities fail to lead for want of tact. Was there ever such an insane proposition as to lead Lord and Lady Dufferin to the house of a joint family of Shaoos—to impose on the unsuspecting Representative of the Empress and the highest Lady in the land the hospitality and society of, if not actual gin-shop-keepers, at any rate, money-lenders of the publican caste? It is all very well for shallow reformers and irresponsible radicals to laugh at the distinctions of caste. But caste, in one form or another, reigns everywhere. In India, Caste is a great fact—perhaps the greatest. There is no escape from it here, as is in other societies. Even here, a family may, by generations of possession of property and its generous use, or by the genius or conduct of its members, rise to some sort of social consideration, though nobody will still eat or drink with it, or accept its hospitality, or form marriage alliances with it. The family in question has yet to acquire that limited entrée. It is enough that, since the destruction of the old families of Dacca, the aspiring Cockneys dub themselves "Baboos." They are a prosperous tribe, no doubt, absorbing all the substance of the old Nawabs and Meers and Mirzas. They are Shaoos for "a' that;" "for a' that and a' that."

This question has in Dacca, Moorshedabad or Patna or even Burdwan a far greater importance than it would have in a mushroom place like Calcutta—the capital of the British traders in the East. In the older cities and seats of aristocracy and former power, these points of precedence and social position and eligibility are subjects of angry controversy and sources of bitter discontent. Nor were the officials formerly so radical and reckless as they are now often disposed to be. One illustration to the point we will mention. It is within living memory that the last of the old hereditary Nawabs of Dacca, Shums-ood-Dowla Bahadoor, was miserable to the last for want of a state palki or palanquin. He could have purchased fifty, but the Judge and Magistrate would not allow him the privilege to use any. His brother had the distinction, but Shums-ood-Dowla as a young Nawab had plotted against Government and been confined in Fort William, and though he was finally allowed to succeed his brother, he was not permitted to sport the fraternal vehicle. And very properly, too. So particular was Government in those days, when the traditions of how the British had acquired the country had not been lost. Bishop Heber himself, the soul of honour and overflowing with the milk of human kindness, and fresh from the atmosphere of England, thoroughly appreciates the Government denial. The spirit in which these distinctions of our country were regarded by Europeans in India, is placed beyond cavil or doubt by the fact that the Bishop, in noticing the subject, goes so far as to question the right of Nawab Shums-ood-Dowla's brother and predecessor himself to claim the palki. It was an usurpation. And yet, the Bishop was most courteous to the Nawab and even tenderly kind.

Does any of the European gentlemen of Dacca, who are a party to this business, think that the brothers would not have before the mutinies been allowed to ride a palki or a carriage?

THE VICEROY'S FAREWELL TOUR.

WE have already given a summary of the Viceregal movements. In the Punjab, Lord Dufferin's reception was enthusiastic, while the scenic effect of the vast multitudes of well-dressed stalwart men in picturesque costume, who gathered to do the retiring Viceroy honour, was superb. The Punjab is no shoddy or shabby genteel country. Its very mob has no vulgar look. It is the country of the shawl, the finest woollen in the world, and of the long ample-sleeved coat and flowing garments, and of the massive turban—the grandest head-dress conceivable. It is famous for its silk and goldthread embroidery. Above all, it is the Land of the Kohinoor. There brave men and fair women alike delight to sport jewellery on their persons. All these elements of external impression were displayed in profusion on the occasion of the Viceroy's farewell visit to the Province, and combined to make it one to be remembered. In keeping with their love of, and taste for, personal decoration, the people are more impressible and altogether more human, so to say. Without the philosophical imperturbability of the rest of the Indians, they are more lively and impulsive—somewhat like the French, without their wit and purged of their conceit, and more genuinely hearty. Accordingly, they received their favorite Viceroy with open arms as it were, and whether at Lahore or at Patiala, under cover or in the open air, they hung round him with evident attachment.

Addresses were presented to the Viceroy by the Lahore Municipality, by the Sikh people, and by the Mahomedans, besides similar compliments to Lady Dufferin. The various associations of Islam vied with one another in bidding his Lordship a cordial farewell, with many expressions of their respectful approval of his policy and of thankfulness for the benefits of his administration. There was a downright reality in the forms observed on some of these occasions, which is rarely seen at these high stage "palavers." Instead of the cur and dried addresses, in irreproachable English of the officials, purporting to convey the sentiments of the people most of whom do not know English, the Viceroy allowed them to approach him in their own tongues. He had studied these tongues in order to be able to communicate direct with the people. The Mahomedans seized the golden opportunity, which they had not enjoyed since the downfall of the Mogul Empire, of addressing the Viceroy in Persian. It must have been a distinct relief to them to escape from the Procrustean bed of English speech. Only in the flowery periods of Persian eloquence, could their thoughts and sentiments find ample room and verge enough. Such addresses contain the genuine mind in the appropriate dress. Thus, unlike the stern severity of British official literature, one of these documents bristles with quotations from Persian and Arabic poets. Lord Dufferin was equal to the occasion. He replied to the deputation of the Anjuman-i-Islamia in Persian—a noble language which lends itself gracefully to the expression of political messages. That was surely an event in British Indian history. These addresses were characteristic in matter as in manner. As befitted the frontier Province and a martial race, they cordially supported the military policy and diplomacy of the present administration and the measures undertaken for strengthening the frontiers. The Mahomedans of course dwelt with fervour on the Viceroy's sympathy for them. But it is creditable to both sides that they could not allege a single measure of distinct partiality towards the Mussulmans. Lord Dufferin in his reply to the Central Mahomedan Association said:—

"I have always aimed at securing community of sentiment and interests between the members of the different great nationalities who inhabit India, and discouraging the continuance of race animosities, and I shall esteem it the greatest work of my Viceroyalty if my policy has, as you indicate, contributed towards bringing about these desirable results."

In Patiala, there were grand doings. The occasion was doubly interesting in consequence of the marriage of the Maharaja, to do honor to which auspicious ceremony the Viceroy and his Lady and his Lieutenant and their suites and other European officers, Civil and Military, and the neighbouring Rajas, went. At the Durbar held by His Excellency, Mr. Tupper, Secretary to the Government of the Punjab, announced a complimentary marriage gift of Rs. 5,000 from the Government of India. An honorary dress presented to His Highness was also laid before him at the Durbar. This being accepted and removed, His Highness made a neat little speech to his distinguished guests. The Viceroy, in his reply, took advantage of the occasion to announce the Government scheme for accepting the offers of military help by the Native Princes.

The Viceroy left the Punjab for the N. W. Provinces. At Alighur, the reception was scarcely less enthusiastic. A crowd of notabilities awaited on the railway platform his Excellency's approach, and conducted him to the Mahomedan College. It was a noble place—the monument of the energy of Syed Ahmed Khan, supported by the devoted exertions of such lieutenants as Raja Joy Kissen Das in Upper India, and Nawab Mehdi Ali Khan and others in Hyderabad. Here, before a vast concourse of Mussulmans, the Viceroy was plied with a long rambling address of a decidedly party political character but of little coherency, evidently intended to inveigle him into some expression which might be turned to account. It was a vain effort. Lord Dufferin kept his assailants at bay and, deftly avoiding controversial topics, disappointed them with a fine lecture on self-help in education. Indeed, the Viceroy had little choice. How could he meddle with so rich a production surcharged with the wisdom of Aligarh refined by its Anglo-German schoolmaster. The document contains, for instance, such extraordinary propositions as this—

"The promotion of English education among Mahomedans cannot be conducive to their commercial and agricultural prosperity."

In fact, the whole is a scarcely veiled denunciation of High Education and the cultivation of European languages by the people of this land as the surest path to economic ruin and political disaffection—to commercial bankruptcy of individuals and revolution in the State. Such is the wisdom of the Sage and the Serpent his Gooroo.

LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT ON TRIAL— AT SERAMPORE.

DR. LIDDERDALE'S impeachment of Dr. Mitra's administration of the Serampore Municipality, meets with scant support from the district officials. Not that there are no defects, and even grave ones in the sanitary condition of Serampore, but the existence of them cannot justly be held as a failure in duty on the part of the Chairman. Either he is not provided with sufficient funds, or with sufficient legal powers for effectively dealing with them. In a few instances, it is true, the administration of the Municipality appears, in the opinion of the district authorities, fairly open to adverse criticism, but the Chairman personally is not to blame for this. He was not properly assisted. As Mr. Duke, Sub-divisional officer of Serampore, observes:—"It is not to be expected that he can himself go about very much or do much inspection. This duty is not always expected of a Chairman where he is ably seconded by a Vice-Chairman whose especial business it is. In this Municipality, he used not to be.....so seconded and in consequence the town had got into an unsatisfactory condition." This Vice-Chairman has since been removed, and he appears to have so thoroughly neglected his outdoor duty that Mr. Duke wonders why Serampore did not present even greater appearance of dirt and untidiness under the circumstances. Mr. Toynbee, the Magistrate of Hooghly, would seem to make too much of the fact of the Chairman's non-residence. Indeed, if the appointment lay with him, there would be no chance for it in the circumstances of the case. He remarks on this point:—"The fact of the non-residence of the Chairman was brought by me to your notice when forwarding his election for confirmation, and the responsibility therefore rests with Government in this matter." It is as well that the law in this respect is as it stands at present. By retaining in its own hands the power of confirming the election of the Chairman, the Government has acted wisely, or these elections would be quite at the mercy of the subordinate officials. Mr. Toynbee's view of the law in regard to the Vice-Chairman's tenure of office, has a practical bearing on the present case. "The Vice-Chairman," says he, "being elected by the Commissioners without any power of veto, the Chairman can hardly be held responsible for his shortcomings. This is, I consider, a grave defect in the present Municipal Act." Dr. Mitra would thus appear to have been placed at a great disadvantage, by the action of the Municipal Commissioners in giving him a lieutenant who would not work. We know of a worse case, in which the Chairman and Vice-Chairman were at cross purposes all through, until one of them parted company.

At any rate, Dr. Lidderdale should have spoken on better information, particularly when he meant to speak such damaging things. "I think, it is a pity," remarks Mr. Toynbee, "that Doctor Lidderdale did not give the Chairman an opportunity of meeting or explaining away his charges before he sent in his report. It is as easy to find fault as it is difficult to manage a town like Serampore. A little less fault-finding and a little more advice and encouragement would have done more good." The scheme of self-government is but just introduced in this country, and it could only be maintained if officials were to bear themselves towards it in the spirit of Mr. Toynbee. While, however, commending him for apparently bearing kindly feelings towards the experiment, we cannot pass over without comment any expression of opinion which he has formally placed on record. Mr. Toynbee says: "The fact remains that, as predicted by Lord Ripon, the Executive Administration* has suffered from the introduction of Local Self-Government into Moffussil Municipalities. It is foreign to the nature and habits of a native to be out of door all the morning, supervising the Municipal staff, and without such supervision they can never be kept up to the mark. The Moffussil Municipalities cannot afford, as Calcutta and Howrah can, the services of a highly paid European Executive." Again: "On the whole question my opinion agrees with that of the Sub-Divisional officer of Serampore that, as regards relative or comparative charges, Doctor Lidderdale's indictment fails and that as absolute charges though true they are greatly due to want of funds and to the absence of that effective outdoor control which will I fear never be possible to Bengalees." We are aware of no such prediction ascribed to Lord Ripon. For the rest, this is a sweeping generalization indeed. Why, we entirely fail to see what there is in the nature of the Bengalees or their habits to make outdoor inspection impossible to them for all time. Mr. Toynbee's experience must be very limited to be sure, or he would not retain such a prejudice against us. We do not know if he includes the native Subordinate Executive Service and the Public Works Service in his comprehensive characterisation, but surely a man of his age and position in the Service must have come across scores of native officers who have proved themselves quite equal to duties demanding the most laborious outdoor inspection. There is, in truth, nothing in native character incompatible with energetic work. Their lethargic appearance itself is not universal as Englishmen might think from the sight of pampered Baboos and Baboolings in town. Finer specimens of little supple-limbed, active humanity are not to be met with than in Bengal, among our people. For the rest, their indifference and inactivity is wholly due to their enforced unemployment, in the unequal distribution of patronage. Give them opportunities, and you call forth the latent forces that lie dormant for want of exercise. It is their fate rather than their fault, that explains the general appearance of apathy that must have led Mr. Toynbee into a hasty judgment.

The Sub-Divisional officer's report is, indeed, an able document. While it goes into great details and is marked by thorough grasp of the minutiae of executive administration, in discussing general principles it never falls into Mr. Toynbee's errors. Mr. Duke's letter would be a useful study for those who have to deal with the details of sanitary administration, and at the same time he takes a very sensible view of the broad aspects of the subject. Some of the administrative difficulties we have to contend with are, in reality, involved in the very nature of representative government, while there are others which are the creation of our municipal legislation. "It is not perhaps very reasonable," says Mr. Duke, "to expect that the conduct and measures of a representative body can be greatly in advance of those of the electorate, and what public opinion exists on sanitary questions, even what opinion there is as to the connection between disease and insanitary conditions in such a place as this, you are already aware." His conclusion is perfectly fair. "At the same time

I would point out that considering the great area and limited income of the municipality and the legal difficulties with which energetic action is hedged, the Commissioners hardly deserve sweeping condemnation. Relatively at least the state of Serampore is much better than that of several of the neighbouring towns, and I even think that as the Chairman points out, it is not worse than that of the larger and more important municipality of Hooghly. Relative tests are perhaps the only ones which are quite fair, considering the constitution of the municipalities and condition of the people." Native Chairmen have already difficulties enough to cope with to entitle them to be spared such unjust and sweeping generalization as Mr. Toynbee has passed on them. We are perfectly at one with him when he indicates the causes which necessarily make a non-official Chairman's position weak and uncomfortable. "Native Chairmen and Vice-Chairmen also undoubtedly find more difficulty in enforcing the Municipal regulations than European Executive officers do, owing partly to the strong party-feeling which exists in every town, and partly to the unpopularity which such a course entails. The Native papers, petitions, and all kinds of obstruction and annoyance are freely made use of to vilify any Chairman or Vice-Chairman, who really tries to do his duty."

Having said all that might justly be urged in support of the Chairman, we reserve for another occasion some remarks which we consider to be due in justice to the other side of the controversy. We are particularly sorry for the sake of the Chairman himself, for instance, that he should have given a handle to his critics by the view he has taken of the genesis of cholera. But of this, more fully hereafter.

THE INTENDED CONTRE-TEMPS AT DACCA.

Dacca, November 14.

Dacca is in ferment over an extraordinary arrangement for the reception of the Viceroy. Some interested wire-pullers have so managed the thing between themselves, with the result that His Excellency will be conducted to a stranger's residence for an evening's entertainment.

The Dacca Club is going to entertain the Viceregal party at a ball and supper at the private residence of the Brothers Rup Lal and Raghu Nath Dass. This has been settled, unless, indeed, the Viceroy, in keeping with the dignity of his exalted position, decline to give effect to that part of the programme. These Dass brothers, I believe, are not unknown to you and most of your readers. They are Hindu bankers of one of the lowest castes. They are moneyed men, no doubt, but many such moneyed men there are in Dacca, with this difference that the money of these brothers has not, up to date, borne any considerable share in the promotion of public or private charity or of works of utility. Rup Lal is ready enough to promise. At his son's marriage in 1882, he promised to permanently light the town with electric lights ---for nothing short of this would look well, and gaslight is an old tried thing in Calcutta; but woe to us! the same dim and distant kerosine lights, as of old, yet feebly illuminate us. We shall hear of electric lights no more, as our large-hearted Nawab has undertaken to introduce gaslights in this town. The younger brother Raghu Nath, not to be outdone, took the breath out of Dacca by the heroic promise of Rs. 30,000 in commemoration of the Queen's Jubilee. But alas! the Rs. 30,000 is not yet forthcoming, and will, it is believed, never see light.

Sir Steuart Bayley is one of the universally beloved and most popular Lieutenant-Governors we have ever had. On the occasion of his late visit to Dacca, a reception committee was formed. Raghu Nath was elected a member thereof, and Rup Lal separately written to for subscription. What do you think was the result? The liberal brothers did not subscribe a pice, and, what was more, Raghu Nath withdrew his name from the committee altogether.

Such is their public spirit and devotedness to public good, such their generosity and patriotism! in consideration of which and for which only, the members of the Club are going to honour them, (for such the brothers call it, under inspiration of their wire-pullers), by inviting the Viceregal party to their place. But who is responsible for the scandalous arrangements? No wonder, as some local newspapers report, that our worthy Nawab was opposed to it as he well might be, for the Governor-General of India is not a trifle to be taken to any and every man's place, least of all, to the private residence of a man whom he has never seen, nor known, nor even heard of.

Again, the two Rajah Bahadurs whose opinions also ought to carry much weight in this connection, are, it is said, opposed to it on the same and additional ground of principle. It is now an open secret that some wire-pullers, who had some private object to gain by raising the Dass brothers in public estimation, have succeeded in inducing the authorities in charge to come to this universally condemned arrangement. Mr. Hopkins, the Divisional Commissioner, was then a new comer to a new land and so was Mr. Anglis, the then District Magistrate, and remembering what these mighty magicians the wire-pullers have done in past times, we are not at all surprised at their success with the unsophisticated officials. The place of Messrs. Rup Lal and brother, so far as I remember has not yet been trodden by the Europeans of the station, either at dinner or ball. It is still fresh in the memory of the people of Dacca, how disdainfully were the brothers treated, when, during the aforesaid marriage, they proposed to Mr. Rampini, the then District Judge, a dinner and ball. Mr. Rampini's feeling was shared by all the Europeans, and the idea of the dinner and ball at once fell through. And why did Mr. Rampini and, following him, all the Europeans of the station do so? The solution is very simple. They knew the brothers through and through, and therefore considered it beneath their dignity to go to dinner and ball at theirs and with them. But, alas! the Viceroy and Governor-General of India, the Empress's representative in the land, and his wife the good Marchioness---the first lady in the Empire---go to a ball at the brothers' and probably with them.

DISCIPLINE AND MORAL TRAINING IN SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

Dated Calcutta, the 24th September 1888.

From---Nawab Abdool Lutef, Bahadour, c.i.e.,

To---The Under-Secy. to the Govt. of Bengal, General and Revenue Departments.

I am much obliged for your request, inviting a full expression of my opinion upon the question of discipline and moral training in schools and colleges, now under the consideration of the Government of Bengal, in consequence of the Government of India's letter No. 10---384, in the Home Department, dated the 31st December 1887.

2. I have expressed elsewhere some of my views upon the subject, and the Mahomedan Literary Society of Calcutta also have, by their letter dated the 31st July last, under my signature, placed their corporate views upon the same question before the Government of Bengal. The views expressed by the Society are in full accord with my own; but there are points upon which I am glad of a further opportunity of dwelling at greater length. I have devoted the labours of a life to the advancement of education among my countrymen, more specially amongst my co-religionists; and the subject now under discussion is consequently one which commands my deepest interest and most anxious consideration.

3. Considering the fact that the native members of the Education Commission in their totality were in a minority of 1 to 2 as compared with their European colleagues, that not a single representative of the orthodox Mahomedan community (as distinguished from the "advanced" school) had a seat therein, and that there was perhaps only a single representative of the orthodox Hindu community, it is not strange that a majority of the members of that Commission should have decided to recommend that the existing rules prohibiting religious teaching in Government schools be applied to all primary schools wholly maintained by Municipalities or Local Boards, in the hope that home studies and the increase of aided schools with no restrictions as to religious or moral teaching would do much in the direction of religious instruction.

4. In common with many orthodox members of both the Mahomedan and Hindu communities, I venture to disagree with the proposal of the majority of the learned members of the Commission, on the following grounds :--

First--Because a course of school instruction effects a great economy of time and labour for teachers and taught alike as compared with private teaching.

Secondly--Because the curriculum of Indian schools is so exacting that a boy finds it hard to make time at home for other studies without affecting his prospects at school. That, indeed, has always been the educational difficulty with the Mahomedans. They can not give up their religious instruction; at the same time the secular curriculum of the Government schools and the aided institutions under Hindu management ignores the necessity of the former altogether, and is so high that it is impossible for any student to go on simultaneously with both. The Hindus for the most part give up their domestic religious education and confine their attention to the secular instruction given in the schools; and for this, amongst other reasons, they are almost always at the top of the list. The Mahomedans prize their religious instruction more highly, and consequently fail to keep abreast of their Hindu countrymen in scholastic competition. In some cases Mahomedan boys elect to run an even race with their Hindu competitors by neglecting the religious instruction; the result is promising from the secular point of view; they turn out clever men in their own way; but it is no wonder if they turn out to be irreligious and deficient in discipline and in reverence. This gives rise to dissatisfaction in the minds of the elders of the community, and room for the appearance of those old suspicions against English education which it has cost me a life's labour to remove from the minds of my co-religionists.

And thirdly--Because I am afraid the time is still very distant when my co-religionists in Bengal will have acquired sufficient wealth, energy and organization to start aided schools of their own. The ground is to a great extent occupied by Christian missionary institutions which are in possession of grants-in-aid, and by schools under Hindu management. At the same time, religious and moral education are so necessary for the best interests of society, that it is extremely undesirable that one or other of them should be postponed for an indefinite period, awaiting the time when the Mahomedans should have made sufficient progress in material prosperity and aptitude for organisation.

5. It is therefore proper and necessary that existing public schools should be fully utilized for the imparting of religious instruction to the extent and in the manner recognized by the despatch of 1854. This has been pointed out by one of the dissenting members of the Education Commission, who gave instances in which religious instruction had been given by teachers to Mahomedan boys in Government schools on the Bombay side; but there has been no attempt yet to my knowledge by any religious community on this side of India to work the provisions of the despatch in that direction. The text of the passage in chapter IV, paragraph 178, of the Education Commission's Report alluded to above, has been quoted in paragraph 5 of the Government of India's circular under discussion; and in connection with the same topic I take the liberty of transcribing certain passages from chapter VI, paragraph 321 of the same report :--

"Religious Teaching in Colleges---Government having deliberately adopted the policy of religious neutrality, there is no religious teaching in the colleges managed by the Department of Education. The grant-in-aid system is based upon the same policy, and it might therefore seem that the subject of religious teaching in aided colleges has no place in the report of this Commission. Nor would it, if the question had not been raised by some of the witnesses whether another policy than the present be not equally consistent with the religious neutrality of Government colleges---the policy, namely, not of excluding all religions, but of giving equal facility for instruction in them all.....The argument adduced in favour of such a policy seems generally to be that the minds of students are so filled with their secular studies that religion drops out of view and ceases to influence them, and that home influence has been found in practice too weak to counteract the anti-religious, or rather non-religious, influence which exclusive attention to the subjects studied at college is exerting.....The remedy proposed is that Government should employ teachers of all prevalent forms of religions to give instruction in its colleges, or should at least give such teachers admission to its colleges if their services are provided by outside bodies. We are unable to recommend the adoption of any plan of this kind....."

6. Although the Commission do not agree with the suggestions above made, I venture to think that they are, with special reference to the condition of the Indian Mussulmans, well worthy of consideration and acceptance. In my humble opinion, the Government, whilst maintaining its attitude of strict religious neutrality, should afford facilities for the formation of special religious classes in Government schools for different communities who may so desire. At the outset, the attitude of Government should not be permissive only, but inviting and encouraging as well. The Government officers need only arrange for the time being set apart for religious instruction, but the teaching might be carried out by private and not State agency. In Bengal, the Moshin Fund might furnish the nucleus for the fund out of which teachers of the religion of Islam might be paid. The Mahomedan community will hail with delight such an appropriation for any part of the income of that splendid endowment, and they might be left to raise any further funds as might be required from time to time to endow such teacherships. If such facilities were afforded to the followers of all religions, and their application limited to the students whose guardians desired their boys so to be instructed, no charge of violation of religious neutrality could be brought against Government. The appointment, removal, &c., of the religious teachers would be in the hands of a Mahomedan Committee nominated by Government; the latter, through the head of the local institution, retaining the power of excluding an individual teacher whose moral and personal character might render him undesirable as an occupant for such a post.

7. Where, as in many places, there is a special provision for teaching Urdu or Persian to Mahomedan boys, the same teacher might be allowed to be subsidised out of Mahomedan funds for giving extra lessons beyond school hours in religion and morals to the Mahomedan boys. This would help the boys simultaneously in the acquisition of the said languages. Where there is no such provision, the religious instruction will have the additional advantage of being the only assistance available to the boys for the acquisition of Urdu or Persian, it being obvious that elementary religious instruction to Mahomedans in India must be conveyed in one or other of the said languages.

8. As regards the schools wholly maintained by Municipalities or Local Boards, I am prepared to go further, and to ask that not only should the same facilities be given there as in Government schools, but that the local bodies should be authorised to spend money for such purposes. A broad line of distinction has been always drawn between the action of Government as such and the action of such local bodies; hence their action will not be construed into any violation of religious neutrality on the part of Government. The local body would be doing things in the same way as a voluntary association might have done. The Government might retain a power of veto on such arrangements for securing to all religions a fair dealing out of the common funds.

9. I do not at all agree with the recommendation of the Education Commission that a moral text-book be prepared, based on the fundamental principles of natural religion,--firstly, on the ground that natural religion is an unacceptable term to every firm believer in a particular religion like Islam, based upon express revelation. Those who found their faith upon such a basis are not prepared to join in an eclectic search amidst the tenets of the many religions prevalent in India, and selecting therefrom some parts as natural and rejecting others as artificial. To them the whole of their faith and every part of it is the special message of God, in which there is nothing to pick and choose. Secondly, on the ground that there will be no security that a text-book prepared by a mixed Committee may not contain principles and expressions prejudicial to the faith of Islam. If in a purely literary course the Calcutta University could see no objection in selecting as texts for their examinations writings like Addison's Spectator, No. 94, and Scott's Talisman, full of the foulest abuse of the prophet of Islam, what hope can the Mahomedans have of absolute neutrality in a compilation which obviously must be prepared under the superintendence of men of the most earnest religious convictions? In this connection, I beg to invite attention to the passage (given in the Appendix) from my memorandum of the 28th June 1877, drawn up at the invitation of Lord Lytton, with reference to the labours of the Committee which had been appointed by His Lordship to consider the question of University text-books.

10. For the above reasons I am against the compilation of a natural religion moral text-book. But should the compilation of such a thing be sanctioned as an unavoidable necessity, I sincerely trust that in such case it will be made subject to the unanimous approval of a thoroughly representative Committee of the followers of the various religions prevalent in India.

11. To my mind it is impossible to separate morals from religion, and I have therefore very little faith in the efficacy of secularised moral instruction as distinguished from religious instruction. From my point of view the only effective way for teaching morals to the young is to teach them the religion in which they have been born and bred, and which their guardians wish them to follow. It is for this reason that I have addressed myself to the task of discussing the otherwise apparently irrelevant question of religious instruction, on a reference as to the proper means for imparting moral instruction to the alumni of our schools.

12. The last point upon which I wish to dwell is that relating to the debating clubs and societies of students. I appreciate fully the great assistance which such organisations, properly conducted, give to the cause of education by encouraging habits of reading, writing, and speaking among the boys. They encourage habits of thought, and are great helps to the cause of education, when confined to topics which are within the scope of the boy's study and comprehension—mostly the subjects contained in his class books. But there ought, to my mind, to be a safe limit to the subjects of discussion in such places. It is essential, however, that the subjects should be such as are within the level of their minds. To allow a boy of fourteen or sixteen to discuss the fundamental principles of the social, political and religious fabrics is as dangerous a proceeding as to let him play with destructive weapons of whose use he has no clear conception. There is a time and age for all things, and neglect of this essential doctrine is sure to lead to harm to the mind and body of the experimenter. I object to such discussions distracting the attention of even older students from the proper subjects of their studies, and I trace much of the irreverence and laxity of discipline amongst the rising generation to the unrestricted license of thought and speech created by these associations in their usual style of business. The Hindus have been the greatest sufferers, as their best men readily confess, and the Mahomedans are also slowly perceiving the growth of the same evil.

13. It is impracticable to superintend all organizations of the above description; but much may be done by teachers in schools giving the right direction to students, by forbidding the discussion of social, political, and religious subjects in the societies and debating clubs which are convened in the school premises in the presence and with the assistance of the teachers, or with their knowledge and permission. The boys would thus be not only directly benefited to that extent, but be also furnished with a standard for judging of the propriety, from a student's point of view, of the subjects for discussion in other places.

14. In conclusion, I beg to add that the sentiments I have expressed above are fully shared by the orthodox Mahomedan community in general, and I deem it my duty to place them prominently before the Government in order that this view of the questions under consideration may not be overlooked when arriving at a decision upon the same.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder
 Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet
 (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and
 many Bengalees, is not accurate as a representation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad

 story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder;
 and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen
 could give individual instances of Bengalee
 faithfulness almost unique in history, taking
 all the circumstances of our relation to India
 into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both
 courageous in the expression of his opinions,
 and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared
 speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five
 members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body
 of men small for that large province—who
 are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young,
 but grave and aged; some have, in the course
 of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted,
 so that on its return to them it has amazed
 none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however,
 cannot be denied.

In the forefront of this little band is the author of this book of travels, Baboo Sambhu
 Chunder Mookerjee—a writer of high repute,
 as I have said, also an administrator, as the
 reader will see from the title-page to this book.
 A keen, yet a kindlier satirist, one might seek for and not find. His use of the English language has astonished many an educated
 Englishman; and the quality of his reading is shown by his marvellous power of quotation;
 not merely from authors like Shakespeare, and Milton, and Macaulay, and men eminent in science, but from out-of-the-way old ballads,
 and little known old pamphlets, in the application of which he leaves one wondering—first,
 how he obtained the productions at all, and
 secondly, how, having obtained them, he learned to apply them so appositely to the
 subjects which he intends them to illustrate.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened
 the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens
 the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a
 Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice.
 A "far maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and,
 though the far maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a far maid,
 without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much
 might be said, and still leave much more to
 say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing
 in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles
 over their disputes, while he astonishes them
 by his command of the English language, and
 even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of
 his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in
 its cage, to his great distress, which is not however pained. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but
 of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to quark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell:

 [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen,"
 ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor
 Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah
 dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that
 bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian;
 not English. Where an English artist's mind
 would be filled with European ideas, the mind
 of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class
 of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive
 and certainly not less subtle and far reaching.

On the eve of one of his journeys, our author was placed in a dilemma of a kind
 not unknown to travellers in India, but not on that account the less stupid. He wished to go by a particular boat, and took time by the forelock for that purpose. The fare was at first stated as 90 rupees, to pay which he offered "a new crisp, fresh British India" note
 for 100 rupees. "It was," he adds, "fresh from the Currency Office, and had been received
 only the day before from another Government department." The rest of the story is
 thus told: [Extract.]

The humour of the little sketch is worth
 something. I can fancy the author laughing
 even in his dismay; for he can laugh well at others, and equally well at himself. I shall only venture on one more passage; and I give
 it as showing the spirit of the man who dares
 to call his newspaper Prince and Peasant.
 He desired to return to his home in Bengal,
 and to bid adieu, for a time at least, to Independent Tipperah, where he had been located
 "some two years." He received the Maha-rajah's permission to return home; but still he
 could not get away. [Extract.]

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of
 courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers
 and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest,
 the man whose plans are the wisest as plans;
 but the man who, with plans or without them,
 gives confidence to the people, and confidence
 not merely in his justice, but also in his con-siderateness and forbearance. A clever man
 once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has
 relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once
 more recall, as I easily and very vividly can,
 the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as
 known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kisto Das Pal, Dr. Manendra Lal Sengar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika;
 and I feel and say, with all earnestness and
 sincerity, that among these are men whom
 the Government of India would be wise in
 recognising and winning entirely to its side.
 They are men on whom no really generous
 word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times
 with men of kindred occupations at home,
 and I think that they are as a rule by far
 the truer gentlemen in good manners, and
 often in very much more than mere manners.
 May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless
 their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY
(Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

TO A BIRD.

BIRD of the wild and wondrous song,
I hear thy rich and varied voice,
Swelling the greenwood depths among,
Till hill and vale the while rejoice !
Spell-bound, entranced in rapture's chain,
I list to that inspiring strain !
Spread the forest's tangled maze
The thousand choristers to see
Who mingled thus their voices
In that delicious minstrelsy
I search in vain each pause
The choral band is still

'T is but the music of a dream—
An airy sound that mocks the ear—
But hark again ! the eagle's scream,
It rose and fell distinct and clear !
And list—in yonder hawthorn bush,
The red bird, robin, and the thrush !
Lost in amaze I look around,
Nor thrush, nor eagle there behold—
But still that rich, aerial sound,
Like some forgotten song of old
That o'er the heart has held control,
Falls sweetly on the ravish'd soul !

And yet, the woods are vocal still—
The air is musical with song—
O'er the near stream—above the hill—
The wildering notes are borne along !
But whence that gush of rare delight ?
And what art thou ? or bird or sprite ?
Perched on yon maple's topmost bough,
With glancing wings and restless feet,
Bird of untiring throat, art thou
Sole songster in this concert sweet ?
So perfect, full, and rich each part,
It mocks the highest reach of art.

Once more, once more, that thrilling strain !
Ill-omened owl, be mute, be mute !
Thy native notes I hear again,
More sweet than harp or lover's lute ;
Compare with thy impassioned tale,
How cold, how tame, the nightingale !
Alas ! capricious in thy power—
Thy "wood-note wild" again is fled—
The mimic rules the changeable hour,
And all the "soul of song" is dead !
But no—to every borrowed tone,
He lends a sweetness all his own !

On glittering wing, erect and bright,
With arrowy speed he darts aloft,
As though his soul had ta'en its flight,
In that last strain so sad and soft,
And he would call it back to life,
To mingle in the mimic strife !
And ever, to each fitful lay
His frame in restless motion wheels,
As though he would indeed essay
To act the ecstasy he feels—
As though his very feet kept time
To that inimitable chime !

And ever to the rising moon
The full orb the trees above,
The enchanting tune,
No wakes through all the grove ;
That soothes, in care's despite,
The weary watches of the night ;
The sleeper from his couch starts up
To listen to that lay forlorn—
And he who quaffs the midnight cup
Looks out to see the purpling morn !
O ! ever in the merry spring,
Sweet mimic, let me hear thee sing !

GO FORTH INTO THE FIELDS.

BY WM. J. PARODIE.

Go forth into the fields,
Ye dwellers in the city's troubled mart !
Go forth and know the influence nature yields,
To soothe the wearied heart.

Leave ye the feverish strife,
The jostling, eager, self devoted throng ;—
Ten thousand voices, waked anew to life,
Call you with sweetest song.

Hark !—from each fresh clad bough,
Or blissful soaring in the golden air,
Glad birds, with joyous music, bid you now
To spring's loved haunts repair.

The silvery-gleaming rills
Lure, with soft murmurs, from the grassy lea,
Or, gaily dancing down the sunny hills,
Call loudly in their glee !

And the young wanton breeze,
With breath all odorous from her blossomy chase,
In voice low whispering 'mong the embowering trees,
Woos you to her embrace.

Go—breathe the air of heaven,
Where violets meekly smile upon your way ;
Or on some pine-crowned summit, tempest-riven,
Your wandering footsteps stay.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

Seek ye the solemn wood,
Whose giant trunks a verdant roof uprear,
And listen, while the roar of some far flood
Thrills the young leaves with fear!

Stand by the tranquil lake,
Sleeping 'mid rocky banks abrupt and high,
Save when the wild-bird's wing its surface break,
Chequering the mirrored sky;—

And if within your breast,
Hallowed to nature's touch, one chord remain,
If aught save worldly honors find you blest,
Or hope of sordid gain—

A strange delight shall thrill,
A quiet joy brood o'er you like a dove;
Earth's placid beauty shall your bosom fill,
Stirring its depths with love.

O, in the calm, still hours,
The holy Sabbath hours, when sleeps the air,
And heaven, and earth, decked with her beautiful flowers,
Lie hushed in breathless prayer;

Pass ye the proud fane by,
The vaulted aisles, by flaunting folly trod,
And, 'neath the temple of the uplifted sky,
Go forth and worship GOD!

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

BOTH the Viceroy and the Lieutenant-Governor returned to the capital on Thursday. The entry of the lieutenant was private. The chief was accorded an enthusiastic welcome. The railway station was decorated and the whole route to the Government House and the houses adjoining it were crowded with spectators to have a last look of the retiring Viceroy. On the Grand stair-case there was a goodly array of officials—Civil and Military—Nawabs, Maharajas, Rajas, Rai Bahadoors, Khan Bahadoors, and other gentlemen—European and Native—and, what is more, ladies—European and Asiatic. The Viceroy arrived [punctual to the time and, as is his wont, had a kind word for everybody he met and shook hands with all.

LORD LANSDOWNE reached Aden on Tuesday the 27th November. His had not been all smooth sailing. Leaving Suez, the steamer experienced heavy weather which increased to a southerly gale on Monday. The new Viceroy and his party were, however, safely landed.

His Lordship arrives at Bombay on Monday and leaves that capital on Thursday. He does not stop at Allahabad. Captain Burn, A. D. C. to the Viceroy, has gone up to Bombay to await his Lordship's arrival.

THE Lieutenant-Governor of the North Western Provinces has gone into camp.

AN expedition under Wissmann for the relief of Emin Pasha, in the interior of Africa, leaves Berlin immediately.

A ST. PETERSBURG telegram—of the 26th Nov.—says that notwithstanding the death of Colonel Prejevalsky at Vernoe, the Russian exploring expedition to Tibet will proceed on its journey.

IN the Moylan appeal, Mr. Pugh, on behalf of the Recorder of Rangoon, applied to the Chief Justice last Saturday for a Special Bench. The request was a novel one and unprecedented, the Chief Justice thought, and my lord could not take upon himself the task of deciding the question. He applied to his colleagues of the Court and on Tuesday last announced the decision of the whole Court. There will be a special bench of three Judges sitting every Saturday commencing from to-day at 11.

THE Eastern Bengal State Railway prosecuted the Chitpore Gate Inspector W. C. Wilson, the shed gunner J. Peter, a carter Khaju and a contractor Bholanath, the first two for theft and the last two for abetment, of eleven bags of linseed. The case proceeded for some time before Assistant Magistrate Palit of Sealda. To save themselves costs of a prolonged trial, Wilson and Peter waived their right to be tried as British-born. The trial was nevertheless a lengthened one in time and money, and at last on Tuesday the Magistrate sentenced the two British-born to two months' rigorous imprisonment each and the carter to one month. Next day, there was an application to the District Magistrate to admit the first two to bail pending an appeal. Mr. Bolton at once granted the prayer. Counsel had no difficult task to persuade him. For the judgment—grammar, argument and all—was the most eloquent and convincing pleader for the convicted. It is well Mr. Palit revisits England on 3 months' leave. We only hope, he will utilise his opportunities there better this time than before.

PREPARATORY to his installation as District Grand Master, Lord Connamara was, on the 23rd November, in the Banqueting Hall, Madras, installed a Worshipful Master, in the presence of 35 installed Masters.

THE Odessa physician, Dr. Gambaleia, who claims to have found a preventive against cholera, is coming to this country—to perfect his method. He is due in March. What is his cue, we wonder. The bee in Dr. Koch's bonnet had the shape of a comma. He could not get over it. It buzzed so incessantly in the ears of the other experts of the German commission which came to this country to investigate the origin and nature and treatment of Cholera, that at last they thought they saw it. Is Dr. Gambaleia's tormentor a semi-colon or a dash? The poor colon is at a discount now-a-days. At any rate, we hope he will succeed in putting a period to the present uncertainty. We wish, but can hardly hope, that he will come with an open mind.

THE Sanskrit Title Examination for 1889 has been refixed for Monday the 25th February and the following days.

IN 1889, about 27,000 chests Patna Factory and about 30,000 Ghazepore Factory Opium will be brought forward for sale by public auction.

ORDERS have issued for the closing of Chanua and Shartha, in Balasore, as Customs Ports.

THE Bengal officers consulted—the Commissioners of Divisions and the Commissioner of Police, Calcutta—have reported against any amendment of the Factory Act XV of 1881. There are 90 factories in Bengal—of these 32 in the 24-Pergunnahs, 31 in Howrah, 8 in Calcutta. Since the operation of the Act, there have been 1,561 accidents, only 73 proving fatal.

THE examination for admission to the Mechanical Apprentice Department of the Sheebpore Civil Engineering College for the next sessions, is announced for the 21st and 22nd January 1889. Applications enclosing certificates of age (between 15 and 17) and of good conduct must be made to the Principal by the 10th January. The College Surgeon must certify to the physical strength, fitness for manual labor, and eyesight of every applicant before admission. There will be in February next no vacancy on the free list for Christian apprentices but on the reduced list (Rs. 5 per mensem) there are expected as many as nineteen. The Native reduced fee (Rs. 2 per mensem) list shews only five vacancies. The Board of Visitors are empowered to file these vacancies.

EARLY in the year, a Despatch was received in this country from the Secretary of State, for more expeditious transmission home of official reports, and for a better observance of the prohibition against their being sent to individuals or public bodies in England, except through the intervention of the India office. This order No. 87 dated the 15th December 1887, only emphasised the order of Sir Charles Wood of 16th December 1861. We give elsewhere the Despatch of 1861, with the covering letter of the India Government to the local Governments.

WE quote from the Gazette the following rules for payment of rewards in the interest of the Salt monopoly.

"I. In any case in which a penalty or confiscation has been adjudged by competent authority under any law for the time being in force for the administration or protection of the salt revenue, the Board of Revenue, or the undermentioned officers of the Salt Department, may grant, in such proportions as they may think fit, to any person or persons who may have contributed to the conviction of the offender or to the seizure of the property so confiscated, a reward not exceeding the proceeds of the salt confiscated, plus the amount for which any other article confiscated in the same case may sell, plus the amount of any fine imposed therein.

Provided always that the aggregate amount of the rewards thus granted in any one case shall not exceed—

	Rs.
If the award be made by the Board of Revenue ...	500
Ditto ditto by the Commissioner of Salt Revenue, Madras Presidency ...	200
If the award be made by a Deputy Commissioner of Salt Revenue, Northern Division ...	100
If the award be made by an Assistant ...	25

Provided also that the proceeds of confiscated salt shall be taken to be the amount of the duty leviable thereon, whether the salt be actually sold for consumption or destroyed as not fit for consumption.

II. In any case in which any person or persons may have been convicted of an offence against the salt revenue, but in which no penalty or confiscation may have been imposed or realized, or in which any person has performed any service of special merit in respect of the prevention or detection of any act of salt smuggling or of any offence against the Salt Laws, rewards may be granted as follows:—

	Rs.
By the Board of Revenue to an aggregate amount not exceeding ...	200
By the Commissioner of Salt Revenue, Madras Presidency, to an aggregate amount not exceeding ...	50
By a Deputy Commissioner of Salt Revenue, Northern Division, to an aggregate amount not exceeding ...	25
By an Assistant Commissioner of Salt Revenue to an aggregate amount not exceeding ...	10

III. The Commissioner of Salt Revenue, or the Deputy Commissioner with the sanction of the Commissioner, may incur at his discretion an expenditure, not exceeding Rs. 100 in each case, for the employment of informers, or for any other purpose connected with the prevention or detection of salt smuggling, or of any offence against the laws relating to salt.

IV. Proposed rewards and expenditure exceeding the sums above set forth, should be reported for the previous sanction of Government."

MR. JAMES MONRO, who could not agree with Sir Charles Warren, has been called in to fill the place of Chief Commissioner of the London Police, vacated by Sir Charles. We predicted as much.

A RUSSIAN four cent loan has been issued for one hundred and twenty-five millions of gold roubles—for repayment of the 1877 loan.

SIR HENRY ARTHUR BLAKE, just appointed Governor of Queensland, has been obliged to resign the office—because the Queenslanders do not want him.

FATHER BALLERINE, the director of the Civiltà Catholica newspaper, has presented to the Pope 5,000,000 lire in gold, being the offering of the Catholics of India and Australia to the Holy Father.

THE Governor has sanctioned the arrangements for the tramways in Madras city.

HERE is sensation indeed for the most canine appetite and truth into the bargain, for those who care for it:—

"The Frankfurter Zeitung publishes a letter from an American correspondent, who says that the town of Raleigh, in North Carolina, is threatened with desertion by its inhabitants, who have been thrown into a state of alarm and anxiety by continuous subterranean noises which make themselves heard above all ordinary sounds. The chief noise resembles that of rushing streams, as if masses of water were seeking new channels within the earth. The ground seems hollow to those who walk in the streets; loaded wagons passing cause a loud echoing rumble, as if the town was built over a vault. Naturally, the noises are more audible at night, and many persons have been so terrified that they have quitted the town. No subterranean explosions, have yet been heard, and those who have listened to the noises by placing their ears to the ground or to a wall declare that they resemble the sound made by a powerful rush of gush or steam. The most accepted explanation is that some internal changes are in progress in the neighbourhood, but borings and excavations which have been carried out have not furnished any data to support any view of the origin of the mysterious sounds."

We hope an expedition of experts will soon proceed to the scene of the terrifying accoustic phenomena for the purpose of ascertaining the cause. The Governments ought to take up the matter. So good an opportunity for advancing our acquaintance with Nature it were a pity to lose. Science might come upon a rich windfall.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THERE is no longer any hope of the Vaitarna turning up. Accordingly, a Court of Inquiry has been ordered. A mere matter of business formality. An inquiry where there is no knowledge! There is just this much information available to the Court that the vessel was last heard of off Porebunder and she was laden with 900 to 1,300 passengers. What became of this host and of the vessel's crew none can tell, or will. Their friends have now realised the full import of the dread designation of their bottom. The Vaitarna has taken them over her namesake water—the Indian Styx. They have passed the Rubicon into that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns. The language of the gentle Bard of Sheffield on the total disappearance, in the same Indian Ocean, of the Blenheim man-of-war, Admiral Sir Thomas Trowbridge in command, applies to the ill-fated party on board the Vaitarna, as to those who were last year on the Sir John Lawrence on her last voyage:—

Their native soil no more they trod,
They rest beneath no hallow'd sod;
Throughout the living world
This sole memorial of their lot
Remains,—They were and they are not!

AFTER a good deal of haggling, Messrs. Streeter & Co. have been empowered to work the Burma Ruby Mines on payment of Rupees four lacs annually by way of rent to Government and one-sixth of the profits. Such is the last announcement by telegraph. But the previous telegram was to the effect that the farm had been offered up to free competition without reservation of share in the business, and that one firm was prepared to take it on a yearly payment of twelve lacs of Rupees. If nobody came forward with a higher bid, the farm would naturally be given to the 11 lacs bidder. Of course, if there was any doubt of the party's ability to pay, security might be exacted. How comes the farm, therefore, to be now given to Messrs. Streeter & Co. on a different basis, and at a reduction? We are not prepared to suppose that, on such a commercial transaction, Reuter wired to India a false news. We can imagine no motive for so doing. We confess we have a sentimental leaning to the Streeters. The world is indebted to Mr. Streeter for advancing its taste. As for the Ruby farm, there is no doubt, that his firm has been at it from the outset, and it is but just that it should get it, if practicable. But what means this continual shuffling? There is evidently something rotten somewhere in Denmark. And now for a plain question on the final settlement, if there is to be a finality to this ever-dragging shifty business—How are the profits to be calculated?

POOR Ceylon! she is not big enough for a considerable event—even a great Golmal. She must doubtless feel the disadvantage of a little ricketty even though lively and vain sister before a tall brawny broad-shouldered and deep-chested brother. Just now, the noise of the Congress must have led her to an undesirable comparison. She has not room for a vast political agitation—for a great paninsular organization. Or else, the ambition is not wanting. Not to be behind the mainland, they have rechristened their Agricultural Society—the Ceylon National Association, and are proud of it. Perhaps, some of the islanders, demoralized by the Continental contagion, give themselves unnecessary swagger. Then they utilised their organization for a sturdy opposition to the project of an extension of the railway. No wonder, the officials down there are not better disposed to them and their national business than those up here are to us and ours. The Governor, in his despatch on the railway extension question, sneers at the opposition of "the somewhat grotesque clique, the so-called Agricultural Association"—thus quietly declining to take notice of change of designation. The inference is that the Agricultural pretence is contemptible enough, and the National banner is a huge humbug. To your guns, Young Ceylon! Surely, the question of national representation is not in the Island beset with the difficulties of the Continent.

MR. CUNNINGHAM having retired from India, the Health Society has secured the services of Dr. McLeod as its President. As a Past Health Officer of the town, the Doctor will speak more authoritatively about the deficiencies of our municipality. The Municipal Commissioners, in the meantime have been better armed by the new law for more useful and extended work of sanitation. The eyes of the world are now on Calcutta, and we trust the Corporation will now fulfil all legitimate expectations, and there will be no more friction between it and the Government.

THE gathering at Haribar Chhatra has been taken advantage of by the Hindus of Behar to form, out of the different Dharma Sabhas of the Province, a Central Hindu Dharma Sabha of Behar, under the Maharaja of Durbhanga as President, the Maharaja of Hutwa as Vice-President, and Baboo Paramessur Narayan Mathe of Mozufferpore as Honorary Secretary. A great meeting was held under canvas. We regret that the Maharaja of Durbhanga suddenly took ill and could not attend to take the chair, as had been arranged. The Maharaja of Hutwa presided and opened the proceedings. Lala Joogal Kishore, who represented the views of his master the Maharaja of Durbhanga, and Pandit Ambika Dutt Vyasa, the Pauranic Hindu Revivalist of Behar, addressed the meeting at great length to its evident satisfaction and good humour. All went merrily as a marriage bell, if inconveniently too as an Indian marriage. A mela within a mela—at any rate, a majli in the midst of a majma—the large pandal put up for the occasion could not provide accommodation for the vast crowd that flocked in a continual stream into the grounds.

FOR magnificence of "cheek" pure and simple, commend us to the Anglo-Indian official—of the genus Celestial! Having administered the country as a family preserve for a long time, they have come to regard everything as subordinate to their interests. Law and Courts are mere instruments to serve the great purpose. The only hopeful element is that there are Civilians and Civilians. Was there ever such impudence as that of Mr. Ross, C.S., late Registrar of the Madras High Court? Accused by his friend Morgan of taking advantage of friendship to commit rape on, and adultery with, Mrs. Morgan, on at least six different occasions, this gentleman was, after a regular judicial inquiry by a Magistrate of his own Service, committed on the lesser charge of adultery. He was leniently dealt with, even though the victim of an ungallant gallantry was the European wife of a European. A jury of his peers in the High Court let off the Registrar, thinking perhaps that he was sufficiently punished by the disgrace and the expenses of the defence. The consideration was wasted on the scotched Serpent. Instead of being grateful, and letting Time the great Healer give salve to his wound, while he exerted himself, by a course of good conduct, to recover character, the vain man nursed his sore to keep it open. He became a regular grievance-monger, and tried to reopen his case in another form if possible. He had evidently vowed vengeance against the wronged husband as the author of his disgrace. He applied for permission to prosecute him for perjury. A sympathetic Civilian Judge weakly gave it. Fancy the situation of the poor husband, whose domestic peace had been destroyed and who had further been ruined in substance in the effort to obtain that costly article, British Justice. Luckily for him, it is not all Civilian rule, pure and unmixed, throughout the land. The chief tribunal in each Presidency was one composed of a mixed personnel, and generally above personal influences. Accordingly, he applied to the High Court and has found relief, God be praised! and Bless the High Court!

THE Prajabandhu newspaper—the Age of Chandernagore—is in trouble again. There is not much of a constituency in the little French settlement, nevertheless the proprietor chose it for the base of his operations that he might escape the attentions of the British Indian Courts for free and unbridled criticism of men and things outside the French possession. But he was out in his reckoning; having only made the acquaintance of French Law under compulsion. Little thought he that the French Indian Courts afforded relief to those of the surrounding territory who applied to them. It is not long since the conductor was caught in a net of his own making, but escaped a criminal conviction after a costly appeal to Pondichery. The paper has again been brought into prominence. It published a letter from Hooghly reflecting on the conduct of the Vicar of Bandel. The Reverend gentleman repented the libel, and applied to the French Court for punishment of the offending journal. A plea was taken on behalf of the paper that costs were not deposited by the plaintiff, to meet the expenses of the defence in case the suit failed, and praying for a deposit of Rs. 500. The Judge considered the amount excessive, and ordered Rs. 200. The Prajabandhu then wanted time, but the Court would not allow it. To the case went ex parte. The Court believed the charge libellous and sentenced the editor to 3 months' imprisonment and fined the proprietor 2,000 francs, 1,000 whereof to be paid to the plaintiff by way of damages. The order does not come into operation till the time for review and appeal has expired. The damages are excessive. It is a terrible punishment for a poor vernacular paper.

FOR Struggling Respectability, there is often balm in Gilead—the Police and Small Cause Court and Insolvent Court departments of the newspapers. For those who find it difficult, if not impossible, in these hard times, after providing for themselves and families and meeting the demands of Government, to pay at due dates municipal rates and taxes, there is certainly a crumb of comfort in yesterday's Daily News, in which about a dozen of the fattest people going, including makers and dispensers of law, professors and professionals, men of light and leading and men of darkness profound, are proclaimed evaders.

Sir Henry Harrison has commenced the season smartly, doing his duty and giving "society" a fine topic for small talk. On Thursday when the Metropolis was on the tiptoe of its final welcome to the Viceroy, the wide-awake Chairman's faithful License officers were busy in attendance at the Police Court with their applications for summonses against a host of defaulters who had not taken out licenses for their carriages and horses for the first half year of 1888-89 long since expired.

"Among those who have been summoned are—the Hon'ble Mr. F. M. Halliday, C. S., H. M. Kisch, Esq., C. S., Dr. Raye, the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Chunder Madhub Ghose, Mon Mohun Ghose, Esq., Rajah Gobind Lall Rai Bahadoor, Rajah Tej Narain Singh, Rai Bahadoor, Baboo Raj Coomar Sarbadhicary, Dr. Rakhil Dass Ghose, Messrs. Milton and Co., Mr. W. R. Fink, Mr. J. R. Napier, Mr. C. T. Davis, and Baboo Ashootosh Dhur."

The "poor Natives"—ever poor for all their possessions and a' that—are in good company, at any rate.

To us of the quill craft there is also a satisfaction in the evidence of the impartiality of our Press afforded by the report. Mr. J. R. Napier is, we believe, the manager of the Daily News and for some time in entire charge of the paper. It would have been easy to keep his name out, if the gentlemen of it had cared for it. By showing no nervousness on the point, perhaps Mr. Napier has gained in distinction.

'Tis pleasant sure to see one's self in print!

sang Byron. And so it is—no matter how, or wherefore.

When British Honourables and native Rajas allow themselves to be summoned for not paying the public dues on their horses and equipage, lesser wights may well be tempted to withhold their taxes in order to have a quiet opportunity of coming to the front. Nor is this the first time that great names have been linked to what the vulgar deem pettiness. From time to time, the tiny nets of the small tax-gatherer hauls up before the court shoals of whales of power and lions of society. A few years back, half the "big wigs" and the wealth and chivalry of European society, from members of Council to leading leeches of the professions, were summoned for disobedience of a minor Conservancy regulation. They naturally lost their temper over it, but who ever thought them guilty of wilful wrong-doing?

WE are making substantial progress in biological science. The discovery of iodoform marks an epoch. Every day develops the marvellous vivifying powers of this agent. The latest wonder is the achievement of a German Surgeon. The following account is not a dart from a Yankee Longbow, but a record in a grave professional journal.

"A man accidentally cut off his left great toe in the middle of the first joint. The severed piece remained hanging to the foot, but the connecting skin was scarcely thicker than a thread; Dr. Klein sewed on the fragment, dressed it with iodoform, and had the satisfaction, in twenty-two days, of finding the wound healed and the toe perfectly sound and flexible. Encouraged by the unexpected result in this case, Dr. Klein was induced to apply the same treatment again. A recruit, in order to disable himself and so escape from military service, deliberately cut off his fore-finger with an axe at the second joint. The finger-end was lost, and could not be found until half an hour had elapsed. It was then cold and blue. Nevertheless Dr. Klein sewed it to the stump and applied a bandage of iodoform gauze. As early as the second day it was evident that circulation had been partially re-established throughout the finger; and in six weeks the man had not only left hospital but was doing the very rifle-drill which he had hoped to shirk. The finger was in fact, as serviceable as it had ever been."

That brings within the range of probability the marvels, told us in our childhood, of men who quietly obtained from executioners the bodies of decapitated felons, and, by joining the heads to their respective trunks, setting the sundered bones together in position and plastering up the seams with their vivifying ointment, and sewing up the skin brought them back to life. Strange as was the story, it was not ipso facto a fable. In our maturer years, we were disposed to believe in its possibility, though the secret may have been lost, and thought that sufficient care was not taken by States in the disposal and deposit of the bodies of executed criminals. Science, we were persuaded, would yet find out the modus operandi of the "miracle" and the necessary elixir. We confess we were not so very sanguine with respect to the stone dead—bodies so cold that, unless protected by special means, decomposition must have already set in, though invisible. But with bodies still warm, though severed from the head, revival seemed to us almost a question of mere fine surgery. We have never seen goats or buffaloes sacrificed, but we thought that, if our doctors could well adjust the separated parts together again—in the case of young animals, of course—the sundered bones and tissues would unite in no time, and the circulatory and nervous systems would again perform their functions as a whole. No doubt, many European students of science have experimented in this direction, but to little purpose, till the discovery of iodiform. And now Dr. Klein of Germany has obtained a substantial success in the direction, by grafting the cold severed, if not all dead, limb on to the living organism.

IN Babu Ganga Charan Sircar of Chinsura, we have lost one of the finest specimens of the old class of modern Bengalees. A man of will and energy, unsullied by vulgar avarice or criminal ambition, he, by his own efforts, rescued himself from the depths of poverty and raised himself to fortune and distinction. He was one of the old Senior Scholars of Pre-University Education. To a fine mathematical genius, he combined a turn for poetry. He was one of the ornaments of the Subordinate Judicial Service, from which he retired with honor a few years back. His personal qualities were high. A man of infinite jest, he was geniality itself. He was an mostentatious patriot and always responded to the calls on him. We hope his gifted son will give us a biography of this man of genuine worth.

THE Bengal General Jubilee Fund has closed. The Executive Committee recommended transfer of the balance in hand to the Lady Dufferin's Fund Bengal Branch. There was a proposition by that practical statesman Orator Surrender Not to apply the balance towards the founding of a technical College. Sir Comer Petheram, who is the Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University, with un lawyer-like naïveté, confessed that he knew not what technical education was. Only three subscribers of the aggregate amount of less than Rs. 100 authorized the application of half their subscriptions for the fad of the hour. There was a general meeting for the final disposal of the Fund and it accepted and adopted the recommendation of the Executive Committee.

THE Nawab Bahadoor of Moorshebad with his brother Mejla Saheb (Wala Kudr Hosein Ali Mirza Bahadoor) is now in our midst. Nawab Khurshed Jah, Amir-i-Kabir, Hyderabad, arrived here on Thursday. The Maharaja of Vizianagram has returned from his sojourn in Madras. The Maharaja of Blurtpore is expected on Monday next.

THE Calcutta Gazette of the week contains the following announcement:—

"The 24th November 1888.—Mr. J. Ghosal is appointed to be an Honorary Magistrate of the Sealdah Bench, in the district of the 24-Pergunnahs, and is vested with the powers of a Magistrate of the third class.

Mr. Ghosal is empowered to sit singly for the trial of such cases as may be made over to him, and as are within his competency to try."

Heaven help the poor suitors in the Sealdah Court!

Is this lift the reward for the Baboo's nominal Secretaryship to the Congress, or his assumption of English costume?

IN noticing the anniversary of the Mhow Native Music Club, the other day, we marked some passages from the address of the Chairman for comment and have had them lying with us in type, but have not been able to take them up.

The address was not equal to the occasion. We by no means mean to exaggerate the importance of the gathering against the chair, nor to minish this chairman against the chairmen of other gatherings of our countrymen. We have no such desire or provocative to invidious criticism. There was no extraordinary failure in the chair. We have known much worse heads of public meetings and institutions, and seen them receive thanks for their able conduct in the chair—in not fainting in it. Most of our native meetings are ex necessitate presided over by this sort of striking ability. Not unoften, the chair is credited with a speech which the poor occupier of it could not, if called upon, even read. Such things have been and are. And they receive some sort of countenance from the unreality which has crept even into the debates of the legislatures and even discussions in committee. A truce to play I we say. Times are changed. Our European fellow subjects are watching us, and, as must happen in the process of our evolution, we have parties and critics sprung up among ourselves. Under these circumstances, a strict adherence to fact is more than even called for, as well as a care for character and respectability. We should select our chairmen and spokesmen with reference to fitness rather than sentiment. Above all, speeches should not be published at random. Nothing should pass to the press except through a committee of papers. If would be better, if competent men were not to be had, to invoke the private aid of a European gentleman of education.

The Mhow speech, for instance, would have been better for such help, though if our Central Indian friend can bear the truth, it would have been best suppressed. There was not physical difficulty either way. It is not a bona fide report, although the make-believe of "cheers" is occasionally interspersed.

Here is a characteristic passage, of which we know not what to make:—

"All present here are well aware that this native music in the early stage of the world was in the hands of the Hindu sages who were its originators but it is now much honored in relanatin and if this state of things continues, a time may come for a collapse, but we are not altogether hopeless and as music is still rigidly preserved and practised by some classes of our countrymen, there is no fear of its annihilation and with legitimate efforts it may yet be rescued and enliven the souls of the sons and the daughters of its early masters to a greater extent than at present."

We are fairly out of breath in reading it, and are no wiser for our pains. The word italicised is new to us. We can not even resolve it into a misprint. We not only do not catch the drift of the whole, but fail to obtain a coherent idea from any of the parts of this sententious jumble.

Again:—

"Gentlemen, music not only imparts pleasure to the feelings but it strengthens devotion and cheers every act of worship and produces more lasting and permanent impressions in the mind than any transient form of words that are uttered in the ordinary method of religious worship (cheers.) We should summon our best energies to improve ourselves in this art and use our best efforts to perfect our knowledge of the Muses."

The Muses! What! all the Muses? Is this a cyclopædian society? But if "this art" only, why all the Muses? One would suppose that of this great art, these Mhow devotees were engaged in one branch, namely, the sacred. Why then trouble all the sacred sisters?

For a last example—

"Here is a good example of energy well displayed in this respect. A number of European ladies and gentlemen of this station has established a similar Club under the name of 'The Glee Club' which has more than once delighted us in their public performances. If we, too, act with a heart we must succeed. Music has charms of its own, it carries everything before it when well played. Our music books tell us that a perfect musician has this element in his power. He commands the clouds and he commands the animal nature and I hope the members of our Club will some day prove that this is not 'myth.'"

LORD LANSLOWNE arrives at Calcutta in the afternoon of Saturday next the 8th instant, and Lord Dufferin makes over the portfolio of office next Monday the 10th, and departs.

MR. E. C. COLVIN leads to the altar Miss Bayley and goes to Bangalore Assistant Political Agent under Sir Oliver St. John. Mr. P. C. Lyons, who is expected next week, takes up the duties of Private Secretary to the Lieutenant-Governor.

NEWS comes from Zanzibar that the Sultan is very ill and that the Germans have bombarded the town of Lindi—it is said, for a fiery affront by the natives on a German man-of-war.

THE Thien community of Malabar have been humbled—for the moment, at any rate. Their highest representative—Mr. Churia Kunhi Kaunan, Deputy Collector and Magistrate of Malabar, hitherto under suspension, has been sent to jail. He was accused of extorting and receiving a bribe of Rs. 1,000 as a public servant, and committed by the Joint Magistrate and convicted of only the second charge and sentenced by the Sessions Judge of South Malabar. He has been condemned to one month's simple and 23 months' rigorous imprisonment. He is not alone in his glory. He draws with him in the mire his brother Churia Anandan, a second grade Pleader practising in Calicut. That brother suffers, for abetting, one month's simple vegetation in gaol and 11 months' hard labor. They have also to pay to Her Majesty Rs. 3,000 and Rs. 500 respectively or undergo 9 and 6 months' additional incarceration. Such is the order of Mr. Lewis Moore. The brothers were spared the ignominy of the dock and were represented by Counsel during the trial. Messrs. Norton and Gantz very ably defended them. The brothers of course pleaded not guilty and the pleader brother in addition an alibi. Before they surrendered to receive judgment, the Magistrate brother received from his aged mother a cup of milk which she had herself drawn from the cow—the mother's last gift, as she said, to the son. Poor mother! to have such a son!

THE SCOTCH FOR EVER!

THE LAST ST. ANDREW'S DINNER.

THE dinner in honor of St. Andrew held annually at Calcutta, is one of the established institutions of the land. And it is a useful and interesting institution—all the more valuable for the dearth of similar occasions in this far off theatre of British activity. The name by which North Britons swear or are supposed to swear, may not be confidently traced to any historical character. But the creature comforts and luxuries of the table, which are served up in his honor and consumed doubtless for the good of his soul, are by no means mythical as the Saint himself. Both the dry items and liquid measures are substantial and strong. Of course, we speak only from evidence—not of our senses; the White Brahmans alone having the entrée to the Shradh of the Northern Saint. Nevertheless, we can report—at second hand—without envy or jealousy. We are a Saint ourself, of an exclusive Order, and have, strictly speaking, no business at such carnivorous réunions. It is true, all are not equally punctilious. Many of our people are found unfaithful to the laws of purity and puritanic observances of our forefathers. Some of them, having strayed far to the Land of the Leal, the celebration of whose virtues is the chief object of St. Andrew's Festival, have lost all dietary compunction, and are able to show the Saint that respect which is measured by the quantities of haggis maunched and of whisky-toddy absorbed. Others, less heroic of taste and stomach, are prepared to manifest their respect or do penance to the Northern Thakoor or idol, by eating oatmeal porridge, if necessary. But these exemplary Northerners are, to use an expressive Indianism, a pucca set. Even in their most generous enthusiasm, they do not forget the main chance. In their wildest race, they can draw in. In their profuse liberality, there may be marks of a contracted spirit, or the appearance thereof, and they don't care. So the Banqueting Hall on this occasion was by no means a Hall of All Nations—though the dinner was supplied by the landlords of the inn that goes by that name. The ethnic grouping was varied enough. There were representatives of many countries and creeds. All the races of the world were there, or might be, but one—the native Indian khas. For the matter of that, there might be the American Indian, but not the Indian of India Proper. The hybrid descendants of Manco Capac might be welcome, but not the pure progeny of Manu or Brahma. The Maori might be asked—never the Mahratta. The Baboo is, of course, the bête noire. There is not one Sanskrit or Arabic syllable in all the mass of names of the attendance of last evening. We are not savages all, any more than each of the persons who guzzled and gormandised to their hearts' content, in honor of St. Andrew, was the embodiment of perfection. Judged even from a European standpoint and by European standards, we have made some distinct advance, which, again, has been recognised and, in some instances, rewarded. We have native doctors and engineers and lawyers and professors. Our pleaders have been thought worthy of being promoted to the bench, even to that of the highest court. We have enlightened Zemindars and Nawabs. Last not least, we have learned men whom the savants and societies of Europe and America delight to honor. Many of the members of these several classes have been abroad and moved in the best society in the world. Not one of them is to be traced among the public guests or private friends of the hosts of last evening. They may have the freedom of all the most fashionable tables in London or Paris or Vienna, but they were not entitled to admittance to the distribution of cakes and ale at the Scotch Rishi's shradh or his father's. Not even old Manickjee, Calcutta's oldest citizen and Representative at this metropolis of Persia's Shah-in-Shah, was invited to this Sandy business. It almost looks like a masonic mystery.

On the publication of that charming but rambling and voluminous autobiography The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, Gent., the author was sneered at for crying over a dead ass. That objection is not, we are afraid, altogether extinct, any more than the criticism of the profound Senior Wrangler, who, after reading Paradise Lost asked what did it prove? is dead. Now tears for a deceased donkey are more to the point than mourning over a mythic ecclesiastic of a prehistoric period. And the marvel is the more that a hard-headed practical and perhaps a trifle prosaic people like the Scotch should deliberately, year after year, betray themselves in this weakness. The reason probably is that Protestant Christianity, particularly in the stern form in which it prevails north of the Tweed, does not afford many opportunities for festivity. The Scotch do not care for the Saint, but are glad to take advantage of the name for a gathering of the scattered units of their nation in this land of exile. There is no other name so suitable for the purpose—none with which to conjure on the Scottish heart. Burns may seem to be an exception, but then Burns is a modern. Scott is a notorious partizan. Even to the two great heroes of Scottish Independence, much as the nation is justly proud of them, there may be lurking ill-will in some breasts on account of family connections and so forth. But there can be no suspicion against the fetish of a mere name. St. Andrew is above suspicion. He belongs to no party or sect. He is only Christian. He alone is national.

In India, St. Andrew's Day has been, from an early period, kept sacred with the customary consumption of haggis and the customary libations of whisky. For, India is a Scotch land. The English are not so very modest a people that they would sacrifice one iota of their imperial claims out of courtesy to any of the brotherhoods associated in citizenship with them. But they dare not call it "English India," and so they submit to the compromise of "British India." Thereby they still detract from the preeminence of the Scotch. It is the same everywhere. A brilliant publicist and distinguished ex-minister, who, with his accomplished wife, is now among us, has a well-known book named Greater Britain—a golden word of his royal mint for designating the vast and glorious world of British power or influence, of the English language and literature, and of British liberty outside Great Britain. He might just as well have called it "Greater Caledonia" or "Scotia Abroad." We can challenge him to lay his hand upon his heart and answer how many of Scotland's hardy sons he has seen anywhere to one South Briton. Everywhere the Scotch element prevails. Talk of the Scotch being merged in the English! It is the Scotch that have swamped the English. It is the same at home as abroad. Nor is it a new thing. In fact, it is admitted, except in controversy. So notorious is the fact that the Scot brithers everywhere inconveniently jostle the weak kneed English and elbow them out, that the latter have been trying to find out the cause of their discomfiture. If they have not discovered it, they have hit upon a theory consolatory to their amour-propre. It is—the multitudinousness of the Scotch; their capacity for multiplication staggers Southerners and baffles English wits at competition. Mr. Thorold Rogers tells a good story—too good, perhaps—of how some years ago, a Scotchman, patriotically inclined, imported some thistle to Australia. It soon grew into such a nuisance in the new land that the legislature was compelled to interfere. An Act was passed denouncing a fine of £10 on every colonist who did not weed out his thistles. This pretty modern saga is, in the English imagination, the symbol of the Northern Hive overspreading the earth, at the expense of the so-called English valour, energy, and intelligence. A truer explanation of the phenomenon may be found in the memoirs of eminent Northerners. One cannot, for instance, go through the correspondence of Sir Charles Bell, the great anatomist, without noticing the awe in which, in London, the Scotch are held for their capacity and persistence. The truth is, the English are no match for their Northern neighbours. Mr. Rogers applies his Australian story specially to Scotch Rule in India in the last century. It applies with equal truth to this. Look at the number of the North Britons in this country! Speaking in the fashion of another 'o' of the brotherhoods, constituting the united people, most English in India are Scotch. Of late, that other brotherhood are entering appearance more largely than before, still the Scotch predominate. No wonder, that St. Andrew's Day would be a great day in India.

This year, the banquet was unusually interesting from the fact of the retiring Viceroy being the chief guest. It is many years since, a Viceroy has graced the occasion, and Lord Dufferin is not only the first man in the Empire, but one of the greatest diners-out—in the best sense of the term—in the world. He never goes to a party which he does not enliven. On this occasion, in return for the enthusiastic welcome he received, he gave the company a historic speech—one of the greatest orations ever delivered in India. The Chair was taken by the accomplished leader of the important community of Europeans unconnected with Government. The principal speeches, besides the Viceroy's, were two. After due reverence was done in silence to the Queen-Empress, Mr. Westland proposed the Saint himself, in a speech worthy of his reputation. Then the Chairman, Sir Alexander Wilson, in giving the toast of the guest of the evening, pronounced a very able defence of the closing administration. To say that the address was far above the level of ordinary after-dinner speaking, is to do it scant justice. It is not often that, on the political platform, we hear such a lucid statement of a large and complicated subject, and such a good case made out. Disdaining to descend to the small pleasantries which form the staple of post-prandial eloquence, the speaker confined himself to the one purpose of justifying the ways of Lord Dufferin and his colleagues to the Indian public and the world at large. The speech of the evening was, of course, that of the guest-in-chief. But great as was that effort of the master, it was not all sufficient by itself. Without the other, it was not complete; it would not be fully comprehended. The one was the natural complement of the other. And both should be taken together and read. Between the two, they constitute as good a general account in brief of the Dufferin régime as could anywhere be had, or almost be desired.

THE LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT.

ON Thursday evening, at the Scotch Dinner, the Viceroy had his last Indian opportunity for a "palaver," and he made full use of it. It was well expected that he would take his farewell of the public, in one of his neat and graceful speeches, though the wonder was how was he to do it—where, in the midst of his perpetual engagements, was he to find the time to collect his thoughts or arrange his ideas. That anticipation has been more than realised. Expectation has been overwhelmed with the rich result. His Lordship is a wellknown "caterer," who keeps a large stock and knows the taste of his customers of every class and the quality of stuff suitable to each occasion. It is no after-dinner small beer that he served up on Thursday. He produced the choicest of his vintage—the most recherche of his cellars—dry, of body, and mellow with years. He was even lavish. Like a man retiring from business, he did not care to disburden himself of the most closely guarded treasures of his most secret vaults. In thanking for the toast drunk to him, he delivered himself of a remarkable address. It not only fully sustained his Lordship's claims as a speaker but almost advances his reputation as a ruler. He knew it would be his last, and he contrived to make it his greatest. Among the numerous occasions on which, often against the grain, the Viceroy has, during his Indian term, harangued, his utterances on two special junctures stand preeminent. Excellent as his speaking has been on nearly all occasions of any note, remarkably eloquent as many of his short replies to addresses and deputations have been, the place of honor certainly belongs to his speech from the throne of India as Vice-Emperor on the day of the Jubilee and to his answer to the Calcutta Address of last year. Those were historic occasions, and the genius of the man of thought and action rose to the height of their demands. The imagination is whipped in vain to invest with dignity a palaver over a heavy dinner lightened by champagne—not to mention the national weakness—but the viceregal use of it ennobled it. That Dinner will always remain memorable for his Lordship's reply to the toast. That reply completed the Trilogy of the Dufferin state oratory in India.

Lord Dufferin always shows the finest taste in his public utterances. There is never any straining after effect, as was constantly visible in the sparkle of another literary statesman who filled the same office not many years ago—nothing meretricious. They are usually finished productions, but the art is dominated by the seriousness of the duty. As much brilliance as is consistent with the exactions of the position—as much sparkle as is naturally struck up—you get, and no more. So on the present occasion.

After a word of preliminary chaff, but that of the choicest, in obedience to the scene and the table, the Viceroy plunged in medias res into business. But it would not be quite accurate to regard the speech as a Defence of his Government. He deprecated the idea of making such a defence. There was no time, and the practical need which still existed last year had passed away. He, therefore, in bare justice to the chivalrous stand made for the Viceroy's reputation by the Chairman (Sir Aleck Wilson), just allowed himself one general word. Supporting Sir Alexander, he said, "in the four years of my Viceroyalty, I have had greater and more unexpected difficulties to contend with than have troubled the serenity of most of my immediate predecessors." That is a most important statement and the key to a right understanding of the merits or demerits of the administration. It is not the plea of an admirer or advocate, far less the idle utterance of irresponsible journalism. It is the statement of an English gentleman and man of honour. It is the statement of a statesman of world-wide reputation. More than all, it is the deliberate utterance before the whole world of the Viceroy of India, speaking under the eye of critics who are bound not to spare him in this behalf, his last three predecessors being alive. Notwithstanding all the drawbacks, his Lordship is able to say—

"Of one thing, at all events, I am certain—we have done a great deal more in these directions than anybody imagines."

He desired to correct one misapprehension in regard to Burma, lest it should crystallise into a popular belief, like, we suppose, some of the little but mischievous myths circulated by some of our native contemporaries. He dissipated the notion that the ill success in Burma—as the delay in the settling down, under a new and stiff uncompromising civilised alien rule, of a mostly wild country as large as France with a sparse population without means of communication or a civil organization, is called—is due to the niggardliness of the Supreme Government, or its neglect of arrangements or denial of help to the local authorities.

There the Viceroy ended and the man remained. Now he proceeded to speak not so much in his official capacity as in his inalienable character. Speaking still with the weight of a practised statesman, after four years of experience of the Indian Viceroyalty, he delivered a Lecture on Indian Politics to Young India and its friends. It is a Lecture which ought to be circulated in original and translated into every Indian vernacular, and sown broadcast throughout the land. It ought to be pondered over and laid to heart by every son of these Indies and every outsider who loves, or even professes to love, the people. Its statement of the Indian problem is for the space perhaps unrivalled, and its general answer to the crude demands of our younger generation and our philanthropic friends unanswerable, so far as it goes. He has powerfully suggested the hopelessness of applying representative methods to the government of such a seething mass of often conflicting and occasionally nebulous elements of nationalities and tribes and castes and creeds. It is a melancholy picture, and it will be the duty of Indian patriots to see wherein lies the chance of any practicable amelioration.

So far so good. So far even the moderate reformers on the Congress may thankfully accept the criticism on the programme of the Congress, and try to correct it and bring it within the range of practical politics. We regret we are unable to follow his Lordship in his attack on the fundamental character of its objects—the specific nature of its work. If he had condemned such an organization as, in the political circumstances of the country, premature and likely, though unwittingly, to cause mischief, we might understand him. He might or might not be, correct, according to the nature of the facts. If he had simply said that, in the present stage of Indian evolution, the time for any extensive political activity, even within the limits of the Constitution and of loyalty to the British Crown, had not come, it would be an intelligible and intelligent view, worthy of discussion. Perhaps his Lordship meant that, in that case he did not bring his mind out with his usual clearness. But to blame a political association for indulging in political aspirations and pressing forward constitutional and administrative reforms, is like, say, accusing the sun of shining. Social reforms are no doubt much needed, but they must be the care of other organizations. Lord Dufferin himself has given the best reason why Social Reform cannot be taken up by the Congress. To speak accurately, some of the subjects mentioned by him may be taken up and, in so far as they may be, we hope they will be attended to.

Lord Dufferin then echoes the charge preferred with such vigour by his Lieutenant of Upper India against the Congress, for circulating seditious stuff, exaggerated denunciations of the British administration, and so forth. We have lately dwelt on the subject, in noticing Sir Auckland Colvin's masterly letter to Mr. Allan Hume, and would here only ask the standing organization of the Congress to at once suppress such publications as may be really liable to reproach. It is impossible not to sympathise with the indignation and scorn of Lord Dufferin at the threat of physical force behind the back of their movement held out by the leaders of the Congress.

Here for once, at any rate, it was the Viceroy that spoke. Then the speaker closed in a reassuring vein. He is not an enemy, any more than Sir Auckland Colvin. And after chiding us as we deserved as naughty boys, he promised us a new cap—

"I have had ample opportunities of gauging and appreciating to its full extent the measure of good sense, of practical wisdom, and of experience which is possessed by the leading men of India, both among the great nobles on the one hand, and amongst the leisured and professional classes on the other, and I have now submitted officially to the home authorities some personal suggestions in harmony with the foregoing views."

There! There is the hand of an imperial ruler.

THE VICEROY AT DACCA.

Dacca, November, 23.

The Marquis of Dufferin arrived at Naraingunj, as already announced, at about 1 P. M., on the 26th instant. His Excellency's yacht was met at the mouth of the river Lakhia by the Commissioner of the Division, the District Judge, and the Magistrate of the District. His Excellency lunched with Mr. Henderson and viewed Messrs. David & Co.'s jute factory, and then proceeded by water to the Railway Station, where he was met by the Naraingunj Municipal Commissioners, who presented him an address of welcome. The reply made was of a pleasing and sympathetic character.

At about 4 P. M., Lord Dufferin and his party proceeded by a special train to Dacca and reached the station at half past four. The arrival of His Excellency at the Dacca station was entirely private, and only the officials of the town on duty, Nawabs Sir Abdool Guni Meah, K. C. S. I., Ashunnullah, K. B. and suite were allowed in it. The police lined the space outside the station in which a Captain's escort of the Surma Valley Light Horse were drawn up and escorted His Excellency to the Sudr Ghat. Suitable arrangements for the reception of His Excellency in Dacca took place at Sudr Ghat and were made by the police. There guards of honor of the Dacca Rifle Volunteers and of the Military police with band were drawn up. The road leading from the Railway station to the Sudr Ghat was decorated with flags, plantain-trees, &c., and five grand and triumphal arches were erected on the road.

The Marquis of Dufferin received the address presented to him by the Dacca Municipality in the evening of the 26th instant. At noon, on the 27th, His Excellency received the address of the Muhammadans of East Bengal, to which he made a graceful reply. Both the address and the reply were in Persian tongue. At about 4 P. M. of the same day, Lord Dufferin proceeded to the Polo Ground and there viewed polo played by the Manipuris.

At night, His Excellency attended the ball that was held at the private residence of Babu Rupal Dass. During His Excellency's stay here almost the whole town was splendidly illuminated, and the river bank indeed presented an imposing spectacle. The Europeans of the town adorned their houses with illuminated mottoes and words of compliment to, and admiration of, Lord and Lady Dufferin. Dacca has rarely witnessed such a grand and imposing spectacle. His Excellency leaves our town this morning.

DOES "BABOO" STINK?

It is somewhat late in the day perhaps to ask in the sceptical way you have done--Does "Baboo" stink?--for it assuredly does in young sensitive nostrils, though you, with your blunt ancient nostrils, may find it difficult to conceive that it can. If it did not, why should Joint-Magistrate Surjya Kumar Agasti of Burdwan have pulled up his nose at being "babooed?" He was, I hear, "baboo"ed, of course without meaning any insult, by an amla of the Sessions Judge's Court, at which he got sadly heartbroken and complained to his superior, the Magistrate of the district, with a view to redress. The Magistrate then brought the matter to the notice of the Sessions Judge, whereupon the Gazette order posting him to this station was looked up, with the result that it has been judicially pronounced that having been Governmentally designated "Mr.," he is entitled to the mistership he claims and that he shall henceforward be always "mistered." It is a pity that gentlemen with such excellent education as the Joint Magistrate in question must have had cannot rise above such ridiculous pettiness. Baboo Brajendra Kumar Sil, District and Sessions Judge, Bankura, though statutorily civilianed like Mr. Agasti, is still only a plain Baboo. It appears therefore that the statute at any rate does not necessarily exalt an officer promoted to the Civil Service to a mistership.---Yours faithfully,

Burdwan.

APPENDIX.

Extract from my letter, dated 28th June 1877, to the address of COLONELO. T. BURNP, Private Secretary to His Excellency Lord Lytton.

In 1873, when the question of the text-books of the Calcutta University attracted the notice of His Excellency Lord Northbrook, His Lordship nominated some gentlemen to a Special Committee to consider the subject. I was honoured with a seat on that Committee. From the conversations that I had with His Excellency, I was led to expect that the question would be taken up in a comprehensive spirit upon some well-understood predetermined principles. Although, in our report, it was deemed necessary to take high ground, the Committee practically made an offhand choice among the books which had been in the curriculum from the beginning of what is called high education in English in this country. One principle, from my representative character in that Committee, I did not, of course, omit to bring to the notice of my colleagues, and to insist upon, although it involved a condemnation of the carelessness not to say sectarianism, which had of late years governed the selection of books for the youth of India. As a Mahomedan, in particular I could not but object to Mahomedan boys without rhyme or reason being set daily to read unfounded calumnies and provoking sneers against their faith. After the evil practice of many years, I was almost grateful to my colleagues, therefore, for recognising the principle of religious neutrality in the literature for the "little go" at least; and one paper in Addison in particular (No. 94), which sinned against it, was rejected. The general views I had urged, together with my suggestions for carrying them, were, I fear, equally lost. There was no discussion in meeting, and no minute which may have been recorded on mine was circulated. A few opinions of some of the members had been circulated before I put in my minute. I beg to submit my minute, recorded on that occasion, as embodying some of my views which, confirmed by increased experience, are as applicable to the present phase of the question as they were three or four years back, for even the religious aspect of the question has not varied. To me, a native of India, it seemed even then a poor compromise to rule "that in choosing works to be read by the F. A. students all distinctly controversial passages in favour or against any religion should be expunged," as, in the first place, leaving open the door of controversy in respect of the whole body of University students besides; and secondly, as leaving ample loopholes for annoyance to the religious feelings and injury to the religious beliefs of Hindus and Mussulmans. But the compact, such as it is, has hardly been kept. It has either been ignored even in the case of the F. A. students, so formally taken under the protection of the Committee of 1873; or in the usual carelessness with which the selection of books is made, it has been broken through. It would be preposterous to suppose that the loophole has been availed of for the annoyance of Mahomedans by the choice of Scott's oriental romance, "The Talisman." It would seem that the deliberations of 1873 have been a dead letter, for I do not find Scott at all in the list of prose writers recommended by Lord Northbrook's Committee. Scott, no doubt, is a noble writer, and almost an indispensable one in English education here or elsewhere. But could no other work be found among the writings of a most voluminous author to set before Asiatic youth than one teeming with sneers and reproaches against the unfortunate East--a work, too, revelling in curses on the head of the Holy Prophet in almost every other page? I need scarcely say with what pain Asiatics, especially Mahomedan youths, must peruse such a book. Mahomedan guardians may well feel alarmed for the natural self-respect and religious integrity of their children, obliged to make such works their daily study. How little confidence they must feel in the measures of an educational administration in which the feelings of their community are negligently trifled with, if not wantonly insulted. I trust His Excellency will not consider this as a sentimental grievance. I beg to assure His Lordship that the objection to "The Talisman," for instance, does not originate with me. The complaint came in most doleful terms from several Mahomedan fathers before I looked into the book. I agree in their opinion of the objectionableness of the romance as a text for an Indian University. I am loath to quote the foul expressions, but just mark some of them in the accompanying copy of the book. After all that I have done, through more than a quarter of a century, not wholly without success, to induce my Mahomedan fellow-subjects to take kindly to Western knowledge, I feel it my duty, even at the risk of being laughed at for my bigotry by the wise men of the West, to submit this matter to His Excellency that he may be pleased to remove this gratuitous source of alienation. Western literature is in itself de-Orientalizing, de-nationalizing, and so forth, enough without choosing text-books especially calculated to repel or annoy. Western culture thus pursued, instead of being a social distinction, must be viewed with suspicion by all respectable members of our society. It might be some excuse for provocation if the ends of culture could not be served without it--if, for instance, all or most English works were liable to the same objection. Fortunately for the feelings of the Mahomedans and the credit of Government, the range of English literature is extensive enough for any choice, however scrupulous.

Public Paper.

No. 828, dated the 31st January 1862.

From---W. GREY, Esq., Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department.

To---The Secretaries to the local Governments, and Chief Commissioners.

I am directed to transmit, for information and guidance, the accompanying copy of a Despatch from the Secretary of State, No. 145, dated the 16th ultimo, prescribing restrictions with regard to the communication of official papers to private persons in this country, as well as with regard to their transmission to private persons in England.

2. The following points, it will be observed, are those to which attention is specially enjoined:--

(I.) That no official papers are to be sent to individuals or public bodies in England, except through the India Office in London.

(II.) That official papers are not to be communicated to private persons in India, until they shall have been forwarded to the Secretary of State.

(III.) That a copy of every paper printed for publication, or circulation beyond the officers of Government, is to be sent to the Secretary of State by the first opportunity after it leaves the Press.

No. 145, dated London, the 16th December 1861.

From---The RIGHT HON'BLE SIR CHARLES WOOD, BART., M. P. AND G.C.B., Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India,

To---His Excellency the Right Hon'ble the Governor-General of India in Council.

I beg to draw the attention of your Lordship in Council to the

"I would observe that copies of this translation were sent to the persons to whom copies of printed official documents about the indigo crisis had been sent.

"Numerous copies had been sent, as if by the authority of the Government of Bengal, to Members of Parliament and public bodies in England, to some parties at a distance in this country, and to the amount of no less than twenty copies to the office of the Secretary of State in London."

where, by the public authorities in India.

2. I am aware that it has for some time been the practice in India to give early publicity to official papers of importance; and, although the practice has, in some instances, led to the circulation in this country of the proceedings of the Government in India before they have been transmitted for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, the publication of such documents may sometimes be highly expedient, provided the time and manner of such publication be reserved for the decision of Government, subject to any restrictions which Her Majesty's Government may from time to time think it necessary to impose.

3. It can seldom, however, be necessary or desirable on public grounds that official papers should be transmitted, under official sanction, to individuals or public bodies in this country; and, taking into consideration the mischief and embarrassment which have occurred from the circulation of the Nil Durpan, ostensibly, though not in reality, under the sanction of the Bengal Government, I have to request that you will at once issue orders which will put a stop to direct communications of this nature, and that in any cases where it may be desired by Government to forward public papers to bodies or individuals in this country, the transmission be made through this office.

4. I have, at the same time, to call your attention to the practice which appears to prevail to some extent in the public offices in India, of communicating official documents to private individuals in that country. By this means papers of importance have, from time to time, reached this country, and obtained a wide circulation, before they have been officially received at this office. As a case in point, I may mention that a copy, printed in London, of the Report of Mr. Morris on the Indigo Districts was privately placed in my hands, together with an elaborate paper upon it, by the "Landholders' and Commercial Association of British India," a considerable time before the Report came to me from the Government of Bengal. Such occurrences are calculated to place Her Majesty's Government in great difficulty and embarrassment. I direct, therefore, that the practice to which I have referred may be discontinued, and that no copy of a public document, of an official nature, be communicated to private individuals, in India till the same shall have been forwarded for my information. I have further to request that a copy of every paper published for general information, or printed for circulation to other than the officers of Government, by order of your Excellency in Council, or of any Lieutenant-Governor or Chief Commissioner in India, subordinate to your Government, may be transmitted to me by the first opportunity after leaving the Press.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

tation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonagoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to qiark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled, to

leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "He serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that heart of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of anyone with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no ready generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY (Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression. It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

Important News for India,

WHERE FEVERS AND CHOLERA REIGN SUPREME.

A RECENT TRAVELLER ON THE Chinese Coast found that District remarkably FREE FROM TYPHOID FEVER and CHOLERA. He soon discovered the cause. The people there do not drink cold water from tanks or wells, often extremely impure, but keep a pan of water constantly boiling, into which from time to time they drop a little Tea, and when thirsty THEY DRINK HOT TEA! If the weak and adulterated Teas of China can do this, what may not the pure and strong Teas of India be expected to effect?

Also in tins ½ lb to 10 lbs of various qualities to suit all tastes.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE Jubilee festivities, according to Truth, cost the Queen £60,000. A very probable figure, certainly. We hope, however, there will be some more authoritative confirmation of what is now the gossip of a society paper. The information has an importance in India which it has nowhere else. It will surprise many of the ill-educated mass—not to say anything of the masses—to learn that Her Majesty has been put to any expenditure on account of the Jubilee. They have been taught rather to imagine that she only drew a heavy dragnet, without being a farthing out of pocket for fishing requisites or in wages. We hope every Indian paper will make a point to circulate this information.

CALCUTTA is flooded with notabilities, Eastern and Western, and the inundation is still on the rise. From all directions, are flowing princes and princelings or their representatives, Nawabs and Khan Bahadoors, Rajas and Rai Bahadoors, and men of different kinds of eminence, to bid the retiring Viceroy and Lady Dufferin farewell, and receive their successors. Already, rents have run up to fabulous demands.

LAST week we noticed the arrival of the Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad and his brother Nawab Wala Kudr Hosein Ali Mirza; Nawab Shumsool Omrah Amir-i-Kabir, of Hyderabad, and Sir Gajapati Razu, Maharaja of Vizianagram.

ACCORDING to our announcement, the Maharaja of Bhurtpore arrived on Monday and was received with suitable honours.

THE cis-Sutledge State of Nabha (whose Chief was at Lahore to receive their Excellencies and followed them to Puttiala) has sent members of its Council as representatives. Trans-Sutledge Kapurthala is represented by Sirdar Bhagat Singh, Member of Council there.

ONE of the most interesting arrivals is Mahamahopadhyaya Sirdar Sir Attar Singh, Chief of Buddhou, the most learned of the elder generation of the Khalsa. He is accompanied by his stalwart heir. It must do the heart of every native good to look at such grand specimens of Indian humanity as all our visitors from the Panjab are.

THE leading Talooqdars and Reises of Oudh are now well represented at the metropolis by Kunwar Harnam Singh Ahluwalia, C. I. E., of the Kapoorthala family and manager of the Kapoorthala Estates in Oudh, Secretary to the Talooqdars's Association; the Honourable Rana Sir Shunker Buksh Singh, K. C. I. E.; Chowdhri Nasrat Ali Khan Bahadur, of Sandila, and Moonshee Newul Kishore, C. I. E.

NEARER home, we have the Maharaja of Bettia, looking fresh and bright since his relief from the load of care by the recent arrangement with respect to his enormous debt.

AS a sort of contrast to him, is the stout but active and intelligent Raja Ram Narain Singh, the intelligent and prudent lord of Khaira, Monghyr, who has come this week.

ON Wednesday, arrived Rai Dhatri Nath Bahadur, uncle of the minor Chief of the Tributary State of Mhorbhanj in Orissa.

THE same day, the Maharaja of Durbhunga, K. C. I. E., came by appointment to see the Viceroy but not to stay, although he had taken house and sent his people long before. After the interview, Sir Luchmessur Singh Bahadoor left for Durbhunga by the same evening's train. We regret to learn that there is sickness in the Maharaja's family, which required his presence at home. He will be coming again, of course, as soon as practicable.

THE Sutlej which brought the Viceroy elect to India had a troublous passage from the British Channel, all through almost, except in the Mediterranean. Lord Lansdowne travelled through the Continent by rail; taking the vessel at Brindisi. The savage Red Sea frowned so that she could with difficulty approach the rock of the Asiatic Gibraltar on the Arabian coast. The Arabian Sea was in a rage. According to our Oriental superstition—which often comes true, somehow—we should suspect the presence of some wretched Anglo-Indian on board to whom this mishap was due, and recommend the institution of a moral quarantine to keep out surly churls and other evil company. The fine weather from Brindisi to Egypt was, of course, due to Lord and Lady Lansdowne. Certainly, they made the most of it, and contributed not a little to the happiness of the party on board. They were lucky in their Commander, who, besides being an expert seaman, was a splendid Boniface. So much so, that he obtained an address from the passengers which Lord Lansdowne presented to him, adding to its value by a speech from himself.

The steamer bearing its freight of invaders of the Government of India, awoke Bombay by its cannonade at dawn of Monday. It was boarded by the Governor of Bombay's Military Secretary, Col. Lytleton, and an A.-D.-C., and Mr. Nugent the Chief Secretary, the Governor himself awaiting at Government House. In the pavilion erected near the landing, His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught was in attendance, at the head of a large concourse of the official and non-official classes. His Royal Highness presented the military officers and the Political Secretary presented the foreign consuls and the Native Chiefs. Then the Hon'ble Mr. Sayani, at the head of the Corporation, presented their address, to which Lord Lansdowne made a long and cheering reply. His Lordship and Lady Lansdowne were then driven to Government House, where they were received by Lord Reay.

To-day, Lord Lansdowne arrived at the Howrah terminus at 4-33 and came direct to Government House. The usual honours attended him. He did not, however, enter upon his office immediately. The ceremony of installation will take place on Monday. The members of Government will assemble on that day in the Throne Room and at 9 in the morning, his Lordship at their head will proceed to the Council Chamber, where Her Majesty's commission, appointing him Viceroy and Governor-General of India, will be read by the Home Secretary. Lord Lansdowne will then take his seat in Council under a salute of 31 guns. Besides the high officers of the Government, and the various Foreign Consuls, the ceremonial will be witnessed by any of the public who may desire to attend. A quarter of an hour more, and the Marquis and Marchioness of Dufferin and family will leave Government House for ever. The outgoing Viceroy will be accompanied by Lord Lansdowne to the Howrah Railway Station, where he will be received by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal and the Members of Council. The honors and distinctions of the Viceroy shall all continue to be given the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava as far as Aden, in accordance with precedent. The same ceremonial with which Lord Lansdowne was received on his arrival and journey through India will be observed on the occasion of Lord Dufferin's departure. After the ceremonial of the morning, the Sheriff of Calcutta will proclaim the new Viceroy's assumption of office in the High Court, as part of the attendant ceremonial.

ANOTHER proof, if proof were still needed, in refutation of the calumny so obstinately circulated, that Government is pursuing an aggressive policy towards the Native States, and that, pursuant to it, Lord Dufferin has been trying to introduce an English administration into them by forcing on them European Civil or Military servants as Ministers! We are authoritatively informed that the Begum of Bhopal having expressed a wish to again try a Mahomedan Minister, the Government of India has acquiesced in her wish, and Munshi Imtiaz Ali of Lucknow will be appointed to the post.

MR. G. M. GOODRICK has taken six months' extension of his leave from the Secretary of State on sick certificate. That is, he draws half pay. Meanwhile, for his thorough and wholesale dishonesty in the discharge of his duty, the Board of Revenue has recommended his total severance from the service. But we are afraid the Board is no match for the Petticoat.

AS a test of popularity, the Lieutenant-Governor's late tour has been a great success. The following account received by us gives an interesting example of how he was waylaid as it were for honour.

"There were gay doings Wednesday week at Mysadal, an out of the way town in the sub-division of Tumlook, district Midnapore. This place is the seat of the Garga Rajas who, it is said, settled there three or four centuries ago, with the help of some Portuguese soldiers, whose descendants at Gewankolly are now hardly distinguishable from our countrymen amongst whom they live, except by their names and Christian faith. Here Sir Steuart Bayley, with Messrs. Nolan and Colvin, passed at about 4 P. M. of the 28th November. The Raja decorated the banks of the canal near his house, for a long distance, with triumphal arches of evergreens, bunting and flowers. There were also illuminations and fire-works which threw up a blaze of light, giving the whole town a fairy-like look. The Raja with his retinue and the boys of the school were, of course, on the spot. There were also the Police Inspector, the Lal Puggrees and the Sub-divisional officer. The latter were to have guarded the entrance of the tidal canal into the Rupnaryan and the Hooghly—at Gewankolly where all passengers by the canal experience the greatest difficulties, and where His Honor slept in the Aurora during the small hours of the next night. But they did not like the idea of being outdone in ceremonies by a non-official and in their own Bumbledom. Was it not better for them to palm off the grand preparations of the Raja on the ruler?"

But the Raja also arranged for pyrotechnical exhibitions at Gewankolly while the locks there were illuminated by the local toll officer. His Honor took the yacht Clytea at 5, arriving at Kidderpore, at 9 O'clock Thursday morning.

These spontaneous receptions which greeted the Lieutenant-Governor at such out of the way places, where far from landing, the programme of this tour does not shew if he was to pass through, show that Sir Steuart Bayley is the most popular Lieutenant-Governor that we have ever had; his administration, unlike that of his predecessors, commending itself to the people of all classes and creeds.

These receptions are got up by non-officials, but they are enjoyed by officials generally. In bearing the cost thereof, our people have no eye to what is called the main chance. Some of them may have a lurking desire for titles, but these cost Government nothing, nor is their gratitude like that of placemen, "a lively sense of future favours." Yet what a pity it is that sometimes they are not even introduced, by the District officers, to the ruler they delight so much to honour, or if they are introduced at all, they are put behind Deputies and Munsiffs who are perhaps sons of their own employes. This should be noted by the powers that be who taunt our educated countrymen for their hankering after Government service and yet open to them no other career.

Our District and Sub-district officers should also take a leaf out of Mr. Hare's book in regard to the Dufferin Reception Committee at Dacca, where that gentleman so pertinently explained how it would have been better for him to have kept himself aloof from the Committee's proceedings. Some tact and a judicious exercise of this power may shortly give them over the people the position which they wish to obtain by thrusting their nose in such matters, but so long as both merit and sycophancy are the passports to promotion, native officials who are wanting in one, must needs have recourse to the other."

MR. BONNERJEA, before the close of his lecturing tour in England, took the precaution to write to our brother Baboo Sishir Kumar Ghose to stop any attempt at a silly exhibition of him, by way of a welcome on his return. Perhaps, he ought to have applied to Baboo Surrender Not as the master of juvenile enthusiasms, instead of the recluse of the Purishnath hills. Hence, notwithstanding Mr. Bonnerjea's express desire, there was an attack on him attempted by straggling parties of young patriots. Fortunately, they had no General to use them for a combined operation; indeed, the Port Commissioners opportunely withdrew their draw-bridge which connects the two banks, thus effectually preventing the passage of the little army, whose leaders had not acquainted themselves with the days and hours on which the

But, whatever the theory, practically they were for life. Once a governor, always a governor, and woe betide the man that, without the help of an army under command or of conspiracy or assassination, should seek to succeed to him with only the grant of the Supreme Authority! That Power itself could hardly oust its own servant on easier terms. Hence, it, rather easily, gave away the right to such difficult succession. Hence, it did not scruple to sell the same office to several competitors at the same time, leaving them to effect entry by their own power and skill. Such scrambling for the office of ruler could not fail to be calamitous to the ruled. These contests were often bloody conflicts. Nor, when at last the appeal to the sword decided for the stout arm or the plotting head, was the after prospect more cheering to the subject population. Government in such circumstances ceases to be a state, to become an estate. It descends to a private possession. It must be doubly personal, in the worst sense.

Such is our pure Eastern experience. How do we find the matter in British hands! There is never a bloody conjuncture of planets, but always a peaceful solution. Every day the personnel of great posts—Kadiships of large tracts and Sadrships of the whole country, Nazimships of Districts and Divisions—even military commands of vast areas—is changed by a simple notice in a newspaper, and never is there a hitch—evasion being impossible, and disobedience out of the question. The succession to satrapies of Provinces equal for extent, population, wealth and intelligence to great kingdoms, is constantly taking place, and always noiselessly. Not a shot is fired, except in joy. Every four or five years, this monster empire of India—a dominion vaster than Aurungzebe's and stronger far than Asoka's—changes hands, and nobody is the worse for it. The whole thing is managed in the most quiet business-like way, like the transfer of joint stock shares. No force or fraud, no cajolery or threats—nothing underhand! All fair and transparent! The dogs of war are not in requisition. If the military, in large numbers, appear on the scene, that is only by way of compliment. There is no thought of contumacy—no clinging to the post.

And so it was to-day. The incoming Viceroy and the outgoing Viceroy received each other as brothers. They would have done so even if they had not been old family friends. And so in cordial union will they remain, talking over state affairs until the formal charge is given and taken, and the one remains and the other goes away.

Such is the spectacle presented by the British genius for kingcraft in India. And such is the difference between Political Civilization and Political semi-Civilization. It is a thing for us to ponder upon. Are we prepared to undertake the government without fear of bringing back the old confusion? The difference in question is one not simply of methods, but of character.

THE MARQUIS OF DUFFERIN AND, AVA.

AN INSCRIPTION ON THE ADMINISTRATION.

And now it is time for us to bid the departing guest good-bye. We will not prolong the tender moment with many words; any words must be vain at this time. Still less, will we cloud this fleeting occasion with melancholy remembrances and idle controversy. It is the time for burial as it were of the Last Four Years' Administration. One line by way of epitaph is only admissible. One of the ablest and bravest of the last seven Viceroys, the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava has been the most misunderstood. No one since Canning the Righteous has had such difficulties to contend with (a great Famine only was wanting for his cup to run over). But he subdued them all by skill, by patience, and by intrepidity. We as Indians can never perhaps be thoroughly reconciled to the seizure of Burmah, but we can understand the needs of an imperial military policy. If, however, he has annexed Burmah, he has loyally, under great difficulties and temptations, supported the independence and dignity of the Native States in India. His liberality at home has been marked. Again, under manifold embarrassments and under temptations to resentment which none but the soundest and calmest souls can resist, he has given us protection and justice. But he has favoured none at the expense of any others. Tros Tyrinsve, his light has been the daylight—for all; that is all who care to see. That was unpardonable sin in certain quarters. In the way of progressive Government, besides consolidating the past and maintaining the previous advances, he has given some substantial tokens and laid the foundations for large reforms in every direction. He has sympathised with our political aspirations and made liberal, if not extravagant, provision for it. All the same he is the bête noire of our discerning and grateful "patriots." The fact is, what he is, though warm-hearted in temperament, cautious by habitual exercise of weighty responsibilities; and though gracious beyond most men, he will not stoop to flattery or effusiveness. And, if the truth must be told, we have been decidedly spoiled by his predecessors. If the epitaph on himself by the good European Emperor—"Here lies Joseph II. who failed in everything he undertook"—suit one of them admirably, that for Lord Dufferin might well be—Here lies one who was misunderstood in all that he essayed or achieved. We speak only of their Indian careers, and, under any circumstances, we pray that, in God's goodness, the hour for such a tablet may, in each case, be as long-deferred as possible.

THE VICEROY'S NEW TITLE.

THERE is a great deal in a name—pace the good Juliet. Whatever young misses in fiction or the sillier herd of gentlemen, young and old, in real life, may say, the real philosophers hold differently. The great Bentham himself—the apostle of Utilitarianism and the foe of all kinds of superstition and nonsense—understood the importance of nomenclature. At this day, the Old Indian who is the most brilliant journalist in Great Britain, understands it even better, as endowed with an imagination and a fervid temperament to which the more creative publicist was a stranger. His paper never loses an opportunity of insisting on the value of a good name—in other than the Iagoan sense. The Spectator, indeed, is always great on the subject of decorations and distinctions and Nomenclology in general. But, for once, its criticism has practically failed. Our London contemporary considers the title "Earl of Ava" bestowed on the Viceroy too much for a Marquisate, for "Ava" is in history the name of the whole Burmese Empire, not of its old capital only, and an earldom of Canada, or a Marquisate of Australia, would hardly be more mouth-filling. We admit the principle, but join issue on the application. A subtle fallacy underlies the argument, and the comparison suggested. Ava as an Empire is quite obsolete in history. The old kingdom had long since been merged in Burmah—the designation by which the country as well as the State is, and has been, for generations, known. At this day, Burmah itself has been lost, the old familiar face having, under the spelling reform of the Oriental movement, been changed in print to Barma, with the inevitable result of unsophisticated John Bull pronouncing it Bâr-mâ. The writer is evidently drawing upon his Indian experience of a quarter century back, when many of the older natives of Bengal, unacquainted with English still talked of the “Hâwâ Moolook”—the country of Ava. In the progress of events and the diffusion of a European tongue, that tradition has completely disappeared. For Europeans and Indians alike, Ava is now but a name of no great significance, and small is the number of those who have even heard of it. Under the circumstance, it could not be vanity that suggested that locality for a new title to the departing Viceroy. We suspect it was the phonetic and scriptural convenience, and, we may add, literary too, that recommended the name to him. A name is often a burden without being a reproach—sometimes it is a veritable nuisance. Even where such a name happens to be an inheritance, many voluntarily drop it for a better one, unless it has been rendered supportable by the associations gathered around it. Where it happens to be a condition of enjoyment of property, it is endured in patient silence. Yet, we occasionally see people assuming on their elevation to the peerage the oddest designations. The possession of an estate of the particular name does not justify the imposition on one's descendants to the remotest generation of an unpronounceable or a ludicrous label. Our Viceroy was under no such obligation and, indeed, he was scarcely the man, under any circumstances, to commit a blunder in such a matter.

We think the examples of the earldom of Canada and the Marquisate of Australia are not well put together. They do not form a class for the writer's argument. They are not at par in suggestion. Would an earldom of Canada violate the proprieties? We doubt it, particularly seeing that there were more than one Canada. The Marquisate of Australia is a different business. Australia is too great for anything short of Empire. Polynesia or Oceania can hardly, with any sense of the fitness of things, be attached to a title of less than sovereign power; still less can the great compact island in the Southern Hemisphere be granted away even on paper as a mere phrase to a subject, however exalted. Australia is a Continent not a country—far less a Province. You may just as well call a man a Duke of Asia.

It is suggested that had Lord Raglan lived, he would, after the fall of Sebastopol, marched through Russia to Petersburg and conquered, and the British would have founded another India nearer home. Was Russia a Bengal or a Burma, and the Czar a Seraj-ood-dowla or a Theebaw? Was Europe asleep? They are not the friends of Lord Raglan's memory who harp on the possibilities of his career had he lived. It was well for his peace and his reputation, that the poor used up soldier of a past era of war died so opportunely. There is a tradition in many quarters in Europe and Western Asia, that he shuffled off the mortal coil by his own act. As far as we can remember, we believe there was a mystery about the manner of his end.

To bring its objection to strong relief, the Spectator says: “The Queen might almost as well have created Lord Raglan, if he had survived and been victorious, Earl of Russia.” Here, too, the hypothesis is not to the point, and is rendered nugatory by the qualification. The idea of the Queen creating—say, even almost creating—Lord Raglan, if he had survived and been victorious, Earl of Russia, is neither here nor there. Such a creation would have been more absurd than if Lord Dufferin had been created Earl, Marquis, or Duke of Burma, for the simple reason that the one creation could not be made and the other could. Not only all Europe would have laughed the British down, but Russia would not have permitted such an impertinence, and war to the knife would have been the consequence of persistence in any such foolish play of title-making—a war in which Russia would have been strengthened by the alliance of many Powers and the voice of civilization. There is no similitude between the two cases. Burma has been conquered and annexed and absorbed within the British dominions—the so-called Burman Empire with all its Provinces and appanages, including the ancient Raj of Ava. Whereas, Lord Raglan, considering the vast extent of Russia and the distance of its capital from the seat of war on the Black Sea, may be said to have been dancing the fly's dance on the end of the Great Northern Bear's tail.

The Mirror comes to the rescue of Lord Dufferin, but not in kindness. Its care is for itself. It consoles its wounded heart with the remark—“This is a far-fetched objection characteristic of the Spectator. If Ava was once the seat of Empire, it is now a small village, and is neither a capital nor a seat of Empire.”

And why not an Earl of Russia? That is, supposing the Empire were conquered and annexed, or dismembered. The writer selects the more insignificant title to produce a point. If he went a rung or two higher up the ladder, he would be confronted by the old Duke of Muscovy.

We do not see anything in the objection. The new title is very far from being without precedent, European or Indian. Lord Amherst was created Earl of Arracan—the Burma Province he conquered—and Arracan had been a great and powerful kingdom even before Burma or Ava, and had not in 1826 been yet reduced to a mere name.

The Viceroy had not much room for choice. Indo-Chinese names do not sound pleasantly to European ears, and he had to take care against being possibly confounded with the Marquis Tseng. Besides, he was restricted to Upper Burma. The Viceroy could not well abandon the title by which he is best known to fame. Dufferin is a handsome name, but being already handicapped with three syllables, he could not go in for another long affair. Under the circumstances, the selection has been a lucky hit. Ava is not only a mouth-filling name but also a sweet-smelling one, and a musical one into the bargain.

SPEECH OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE MARQUIS OF DUFFERIN AND AVA AT THE ST.
ANDREW'S DINNER.

Calcutta, 30th November 1888.

Gentlemen, before attempting to return thanks for the kind and hearty manner in which you have drunk my health, I feel that, above all things, it is necessary that I should justify my presence amongst you upon this occasion. This is especially a Scotch dinner, and it is held in commemoration of an eminent personage, who was next door to having been born and bred in Scotland (laughter). Well, Gentlemen, I may claim as much right to Hooghly Floating Bridge is opened for egress and ingress of bulkier craft and masted shipping. Thus was Mr. Bonnerjea saved. But there is no escape from other forms of the same enthusiasm. He has to submit to missiles darted from a distance. Cheap postage has its evil as well as its good. Mr. Bonnerjea must have received a mass of addresses and letters and no end of postcards. These he could lay aside without reading. Then there are the rockets and fire-balloons let off in every direction in his honour. How on earth could he help noticing them? He has heard the noise—usually the shriek—and seen the fire—usually the smoke—before he realizes that he, poor soul, is the object of all the activity and the attentions. He is not yet prepared to elect to retire to a sylvan nook or a Himalayan cavern, and so long as he lives in the world he cannot well keep his eyes and ears shut. He must look at the papers—those at least of the party with which he has cast in his lot—and it is these latter in which he is doomed to be perpetually reminded of his great doings during his last visit to Europe. The prose of these rewards is a trial sufficient for the patience of a practising barrister who has got daily to face his fellows in Court or in Club, but the poetry—he is truly to be commiserated on the pottery! Here are some specimens of

That we can, sure, achieve a success grand.

You 've shown you are my country's trusty stays;
This wide extensive land rings with the praise
Of you, who served her in the time of need,
And proved yourselves her champions true indeed.”

We give another whole piece of—genuine national pottery:—

“Hail, meek and able Hindu mild?
Our Peerless Norton, come!
Come back, great England's worthy child!
Our Bonnerjee, come home!

A nation's gratitude and love
Await you in this place;
Naught can our thankfulness remove,
We are a grateful race.

Ye, India's sons, rejoice! Arise,
To welcome Bonnerjee
And Norton, from that land where lies,
The home of all that's free!

With shouts of joy, come, let us meet
Our friends, returning here!
With cheerful looks, come, let us greet
The men we hold so dear!

Just England has begun to know
Our people's woes aright;
These two did labour much to show
Things in their proper light.

May we receive more rights so just,
As righteous Ripon gave!
Our hopes in England's justice rest,
And in our Congress brave.

May He, the Wise Almighty Lord,
Show'r bliss upon these shores!
May He His help to us accord,
And aid us in our course!

Our end and aim is freedom true,
Our watch-word-peace to all!
We wish each man should have his due!
We wish for no one's fall!”

Fall, to be sure!

REFERRING to Lord Dufferin's speech at the St. Andrew's dinner, Mr. J. M. Maclean put the question in the House of Commons—Whether most of the Native Princes and leaders of the Indian Mussulman community had represented to the Government of India the evil effects that would arise from the speeches made by delegates of the Congress and from the pamphlets published and distributed by them, and what the Government of India intended to do regarding further meetings of the Congress. The answer was short. Sir John Gorst said that Government had no information as yet regarding the intentions of the Government of India in the matter.

THE following honors—all personal distinctions—have been Gazetted:—

Raja.—Sardar Hira Singh, Bahraich District, Oudh; Kunwar Shiam Singh, Tajpur, Bijnor District, N.W. P.
Khan Bahadur.—Shaban Ali Khan, of Salempur, in the Lucknow District, Oudh.
Rai Bahadur.—Chaudhri Debi Singh, of Asaura in the Meerut District, North-Western Provinces.
Sardar.—The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur Behechardas Veharidas Desai, of Bombay [Presidency.]

THE Conference on Provincial Finance will meet shortly in this city. Mr. Westland will guide the deliberations. Only four local Governments will be represented, namely, Madras by the Hon'ble H. E. Stokes; Bombay by the Hon'ble J. R. Richey; Bengal by the Hon'ble C. P. L. Macaulay; and the N. W. Provinces by Mr. R. Smeaton.

THE Hooghly bridge connecting Calcutta and Howrah has been declared free from the 1st January next. Could not the advent of Lord Lansdowne be associated with the abandonment of an inconvenience to the travelling public?

THE holy village of Bhatpara, on the sacred Ganga—the abode of the spiritual guides (Gooroos) of the Brahmanocracy of Bengal—within the Naihati Municipality is up in arms, for the extension to it of the latrine sections of the Municipal law. They evidently do not appreciate or require the night-soil service, which is being forced on them. The principal inhabitants are loud in their complaint. They are too poor living on the bounty of others—to pay for a service which is calculated to confine human dirt within their own sacred precincts and to introduce in the village new-comers whom they would avoid, whose very presence is contamination. The resolution asking the local Government to extend these provisions of the law, they say, was passed at a meeting of the Commissioners in which only the number required for a quorum were present, and in which the members of the village were not. We do not suppose sufficient notice of the meeting was not given, but certainly it would have been better if the resolution were carried at a large meeting, in the presence of representatives of all the place most interested. We do not know what induced the Chairman, and his colleagues who voted with him to carry the introduction of a doubtful sanitary measure. We hope they were not led away by the rage of the hour. Are they satisfied that the natural conservancy is worse than the Municipal. The night-soil service of the law may be a good thing for crowded towns, but is it necessarily good for all Mofussil places? In most cases, the remedy proves worse than the disease. It would have been more to the purpose, if those who night-soiled the roads and passages, were tempted to resort to public latrines for which, we understand, provision was used to be made annually in the budget, and the rest enjoined not to be a nuisance to themselves and their neighbours. The earth-closet is the best of all closets, and if it can be made general, nothing like it. In jails, this system prevails, and if free people resort to it, what harm? They ought to be encouraged. The trenching-grounds now-a-days in vogue are an abomination. We hope these, at any rate, will not be inflicted on Bhatpara.—We shall return to the subject.

We have also received complaints in regard to the Income Tax assessment, but more hereafter.

THE workers under electric light of 1,00,000 candle power get a kind of disease characterized by a painful sensation in the throat, face and temple, irritation about the eyes, coppery red colour of the skin, which subsequently puts off in five days. It is the excess of light and not the heat which produces the nervous symptoms.

REFERRING to the recent article of the Englishman on the Congress the Amrita Bazar Patrika writes—

"We cannot, however, agree with the Englishman that the Mussalmans have any strong good sense. Only a hundred years ago, the Mussalmans were masters of Bengal. The Nawab Nazim made over the task of collecting revenue to his English allies and retained the control of the criminal administration in his hands. Why do not the Mussalmans, if they have any good sense, insist upon the British power to fulfil the terms of the treaty entered into by that power with the Nawab Nazim of Bengal? Indeed, if the present Nawab, who is no longer a Nazim, had been paid his just dues, he would be able to provide for thousands of Mussalmans, who are now starving. They complain that the mashim fund has not been properly utilized. But what is the mashim fund compared with the fund of the Nawab Nazim. Indeed, there may be some difficulty on the part of the Government to make over the control of the criminal administration of the country to the Mussalmans, but there can be no difficulty whatever in paying the Nawab his just dues. If the Mussalmans really possess any good sense, they should continue to force the Government to pay its just debts to the Nawab. This done, the Mussalmans will have ample funds to establish Mosques and Madrasas, and provide for thousands of their co-religionists."

"But what is the mashim fund?" we ask in the Patrika's own words, before we can follow its comparison. We know all about the Nizamat, including all its funds, but never heard of this. Indeed, from the suggested comparison "with the fund of the Nawab Nazim," it is possibly something distinct. Is it so?

That note has other startling assertions. Englishmen may, after more than two centuries' misunderstanding and injustice, find it necessary to flatter the Mussulmans in India while they still in Europe abuse and bully the Turks. But surely it is no part of our urgent duty, as Hindus, to join issue on the language of courtly palaver. At any rate, the best method of rescuing our Mahomedan brethren from the seductions of the charmers is not by trying to prove that they do not deserve the compliments paid them.

But supposing it were necessary to show the Englishman wrong, even at the expense of proving the Mussulmans fools, the way to set about it is not by flying in the face of all history. "Only a hundred years ago," we are told, "the Mussulmans were masters of Bengal." Were they, so late as that?

THREE memberships have fallen vacant in the Bengal Legislative Council, by the efflux of time. Messrs. Allen and Macaulay, and Moulvi Abdool Jubber have gone out. The first two have been re-elected, and the Mahomedan community will now be represented as best it may by Prince Ferokh Shah. Dr. Gurudas Banerjee's place in Council will be filled by Dr. Rashbehary Ghose. This is an unexceptional selection, which will carry the whole public with it. It will, we suspect, be generally regarded as a sort of compensation, however inadequate, for repeatedly overlooking the claims of the ablest of the Pleader bar. Anyhow, we congratulate Sir S. Bayley on the discernment shown by him in hitting on so proper, though rather unknown, because unpushing, a man as Baboo Rashbehary, to succeed so successful a Councillor—so ready a debater as Baboo Gooroodas Banerjee, now a worthy Judge of the High Court. The propriety of the succession extends to the veriest externals. Both are graduates of the same university, both eminent vakils, both Doctors of Law, and both have been Tagore Professors. If Dr. Banerjee is senior in the profession by one year, Dr. Ghosh has been longer in the High Court bar, at the same time that he is the Senior Doctor and the elder Emeritus Professor. If Mr. Banerjee has been called to the Bench, Mr. Ghosh was at least in the running for the judicial office.

BEING their last in Calcutta, the week has been an extremely busy one with Lord and Lady Duffrin. What with addresses, deputations, interviews and preparations for return journey, their Excellencies have had hardly left breathing time. They took their final farewell of Calcutta society at the Garden Party on Friday. The Viceroy stayed till he had bade good-bye to the last of the multitudinous guests on the grounds.

MR. J. E. D. EZRA succeeds Dr. Mahendralal Sircar in the shrievalty of Calcutta. A good selection. Mr. Ezra is above the emoluments of the office, which will now be considerably curtailed. The Mirror, as is usual with it in the case of all appointments, is wroth with the appointer and ready to call the appointee names. It complains that the rulers of the land delight to torment it with surprises. As for poor Mr. Ezra, he is nobody—not even an one anna Mirror without the mercury at the back. It is now all love for the Faithful, and would have preferred a Mahomedan to a person representing "a really 'microscopical' community of Calcutta, if, indeed the local Jews take him for their representative." Of course, it is too opaque to see Jews other than those of Calcutta. Mr. Ezra need not be disconcerted by the comments of a paper whose abuse has come to be almost a sine qua non of respectability and worth. A millionaire who knows the use of wealth can afford to be amused by such attack.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1888.

THE MEETING OF THE PLANETS.

TO-DAY is a noteworthy day in our Calendar—the day of the Grand Conjunction. The hour fixed by the astronomers was after 4-33 in the afternoon, and exactly at that moment—such is the accuracy of science or punctuality of civilization—the particular planet from the Western heavens was visible at Howrah station. There, as all along its course over India, it was hailed with the joyous acclamations and demonstrations naturally called forth by such an auspicious phenomenon. Soon it came, not rushing like a meteor, but quietly and kindly, over the broad still Hooghly and over the metropolis, greeted as before, by thousands of welcoming watchers, to meet the fixed star at Government House. It was no meeting of Greek and Greek when comes the tug of war. It was a meeting of peace. There was no conflict or clash, and, therefore, no crash or crush. The two great stars met in a fraternal embrace. There was no danger to themselves or their neighbours. And now for the moment they are so merged, the one in the other, as to be indistinguishable. And so they will remain till the hour comes for separation on Monday morning, when the planet that has completed its four years' course in the Indian sky will move forward on its Western journey.

Not without purpose do we thus dwell upon this union of the heavenly bodies. For all who are interested in the progress of mankind, it is a cheering and enlivening sight—this friendly mutual approach and harmonious blending. To us of the East, the pleasure of seeing it is saddened by the reflection that it is a phenomenon confined to the Astronomy of the Western heavens. At any rate, in our indigenous history, as in ruder times and spheres in Europe, a peaceful succession to even a salaried office, specially when it is a great office of power, is rather the exception than the rule. Perhaps this was one of the cardinal efficient causes, if not the cause, of appointments and places degenerating into hereditaments. This was peculiarly the case with distant governments, except when the central authority was unusually wide awake and persistent—in fine, strong. These offices were not even tenable during good behaviour, being simply tenancies at will, so to say.

your consanguinity as St. Andrew himself; for in those distant days to which we both belong, I also, as represented by my remote forefathers, was a countryman of your own (applause). Indeed, I may still call myself by that honourable appellation, the only difference being that I have been very much improved by having been an Irishman during the last three hundred years (cheers and laughter). You, Gentlemen, represent the raw material in its protoplasmic condition; ---Mr. Barbour, my eminent Financial Colleague, whom I am happy to see keeping me in countenance, and myself, are specimens of the manufactured article, and the developed organism (laughter and cheers). But, for all that, the old Adam ---I do not allude to the Father of the human race, but to one Adam, an ancestor of my own, who like his namesake, was turned out of your Northern Paradise, and that, too, for being too submissive to a lady, who was not even his wife, but Mary Queen of Scots (laughter)---the old Adam I say, will still betray itself and kindle a glow of brotherly enthusiasm in my breast whenever I find myself surrounded by a company of kindly Scotchmen (cheers). And now, Gentlemen, having made good my locus standi amongst you,---my foot being, so to speak, on my native heath---I desire, from the bottom of my heart, and with all the earnestness that words are capable of displaying, to convey to you my deep sense of your goodness in having extended to me so friendly and so gracious a welcome (cheers). Although I cannot take credit to myself for all the appreciative and indulgent encomiums which your Chairman has been pleased to pass upon my administration, I am not the less sensible of the good-will and sympathy implied by the enthusiastic cheers, which greeted his utterances. It is quite true, as Sir Aleck Wilson has observed, that, in the four years of my Viceroyalty, I have had greater and more unexpected difficulties to contend with than have troubled the serenity of most of my immediate predecessors. The first and the greatest of these has undoubtedly been the fall in the value of silver, which, by depleting the revenues of India to the extent of more than three millions a year, has crippled the energies of my Government in every direction, and imposed upon me the ungracious duty of---well, I will not damp the gaiety of this joyous festival by alluding further to so disagreeable a subject (laughter and cheers). Indeed, I do not intend to trouble you to-night with egotistical references to my own administration, or with any attempt to vindicate the general policy of the Government of India. The verdict upon both has passed out of my hands, and it will be the pen of the Historian that will determine whether my colleagues and myself have succeeded in any adequate degree in contributing to the peace and security of the country, in dissipating some formidable dangers, and in inaugurating such reforms and improvements in its administration as the time and the circumstances of the case either permitted or required (applause). Of one thing, at all events, I am certain---we have done a great deal more in these directions than anybody imagines. Still there is one misapprehension into which the public has fallen, which I am desirous of taking this opportunity of correcting once for all, lest it should crystallize into a popular belief, and that is, that the difficulties which we have had to encounter in Burma arose from an attempt of the Indian Government to effect the conquest of that kingdom in too economical a manner, or, to use a vulgar expression, "on the cheap." Such an idea is entirely unfounded. There may have been mistakes, but they did not arise from that source. On the contrary, the Government of India has never refused, from first to last, the local authorities of Burma a single requisition, whether for money, for troops, for civil officers; or for police, which they have ever submitted to us (cheers). Nay more, we encouraged them from time to time to make further demands on us in every one of these respects. With regard to the strength of the original force, it must be remembered that the expedition to Mandalay was essentially a riverine expedition, and that the number of troops that could be despatched upon it was limited by the riverine transport at our disposal. As a matter of fact, owing to the existence of the Irrawaddy Flotilla Company, the facilities of transport were very considerable; but, for all that, its capacity was strained to its utmost extent. Happily, however, the forces it could accommodate were amply sufficient for the immediate purpose in view, as was shown by the surrender of the Burmese army, the capture of the king, and the occupation of his capital in the course of a fortnight (applause). The very day that Mandalay was taken we telegraphed to both our civil and military representatives to enquire whether or no the additional reinforcements which we had ready to start in support should be sent off; but the difficulties which subsequently occurred were not difficulties which could be overcome by the application of mere brute force as represented by numbers. They were inherent in the very nature of the case,---the enormous extent of the country, its complete disorganisation, the absence of all roads, and the vastness and impracticability of the jungles. Impediments like these could not be successfully dealt with at once, especially as the rainy season soon intervened to hamper our endeavours. Roads had to be cut, telegraphic communications established, military posts constructed, and a hundred other preliminary arrangements introduced. Above all, a Military Police had to be organised, for the Government of India does not keep on hand, as a grocer does pepper, a ready-made supply of Military Police for casual emergencies; but such a body, who are the real restorers of order, have to be painfully and laboriously enlisted and drilled. Even so, as Sir Aleck Wilson has stated, within a little more than two years and a half, we have succeeded not only in tranquillising the country, but in furnishing it forth with all the appliances of a civilized State (cheers). All the big dacoit bands have been dispersed, and their leaders disposed of. Crime in Lower Burmah is now less than it was before the war, and even the return of the dry season has not shown any perceptible recurrence of it in Upper Burmah. It is true, during the winter, we shall have to punish some of the wild mountain tribes both in the north and in the west, who have been raiding Burmese villages and head-hunting on Burmese territory. But these troubles are as common to the borders of India as they are to those of Burma. If we remember that, when Lord Dalhousie took possession of Pegu---though he undoubtedly displayed in everything he undertook the greatest vigour and energy, and though Pegu was only a sixth of the size of the country that we have recently dominated---it took him seven or eight years to reduce it to reasonable submission, I think we may be satisfied with the result (loud applause). Indeed, it was only the other day that I was reading a life of Lord Minto, who mentions incidentally, that in his time whole districts within twenty miles of Calcutta were at the mercy of dacoits, and this after the English had been more than fifty years in the occupation of Bengal; while, even in our own days, large bands of robbers in Central India are baffling all the efforts of the Indore Government to put an end to their depredations. The fact is, dacoity is a peculiar sort of crime, and one far more difficult to deal with than even the organised opposition of regular armies. I have been led to dilate more fully upon this subject than I had intended; but I have felt it my duty to do so, not so much in the interests of the Indian Administration, as from a desire to vindicate the conduct of those eminent Civil and Military officers who, in the teeth of a great deal of misapprehension, have been carrying out with exceptional ability, and with acknowledged success, their responsible and thankless duties (cheers). And now, Gentlemen, what else am I to say to you? As a rule, I do not think it is a desirable thing for the Viceroy of India to make speeches. I have carefully avoided doing so as much as possible; but perhaps, as I am so near the day of my dissolution, I may be permitted to utter a few words of warning and advice to those to whose affairs I have been giving such unremitting attention for so long a period. You will understand, therefore, that it is not so much the Viceroy that is addressing you as a departing, pale, and attenuated shade, or rather shall we say, some intelligent traveller who has come to India for three months, with the intention of writing an encyclopedic work on its Government and its people, and who is therefore able to speak in a spirit of infallibility denied to us lesser men (loud laughter). Well then, Gentlemen, what is India? It is an Empire, equal in size, if Russia be excluded, to the entire continent of Europe, with a population of 250 million souls. This population is composed of a large number of distinct nationalities, professing various religions, practising diverse rites, speaking different languages---the Census Report says there are 106 different Indian tongues---not dialects, mind you---of which 18 are spoken by more than a million persons---while many of them are still further separated from each other by discordant prejudices, by conflicting social usages, and even antagonistic material interests. Perhaps, the most patent peculiarity of our Indian "Cosmos" is its division into two mighty political communities---the Hindus numbering 190 millions, and the Mahomedans, a nation of 50 millions---whose distinctive characteristics, whether religious, social, or ethnological, it is of course unnecessary for me to refer to before such an audience as the present. But to these two great divisions must be added a host of minor nationalities---though minor is a misleading term, since most of them may be numbered by millions---who, though some are included in the two broader categories I have mentioned, are as completely differentiated from each other as are the Hindus from the Mahomedans,---such as the Sikhs, with their warlike habits and traditions, and their theocratic enthusiasm;---the Rohillas, the Pathans, the Assamese,---the Biluchees, and the other wild and martial tribes on our frontiers,---the hillmen dwelling in the folds of the Himalayas;---our subjects in Burma, Mongol in race and Buddhist in religion;---the Khonds, Mairs, and Bheels, and other non-Aryan peoples in the centre and south of India,---and the enterprising Parsees with their rapidly developing manufactures and commercial interests. Again, amongst these numerous communities may be found at one and the same moment all the various stages of civilization through which mankind has passed from the prehistoric ages to the present day. At one end of the scale we have the naked savage hillman, with his stone weapons, his head hunting, his polyandrous habits and his childish superstitions; and at the other, the Europeanized Native gentleman, with his refinement and polish, his literary culture, his Western philosophy, and his advanced political ideas, while between the two lie layer upon layer, or in close juxtaposition; wandering communities with their flocks of goats and moving tents; collections of undisciplined warriors, with their blood feuds, their clan organization and loose tribal government; feudal Chiefs and Barons with their picturesque retainers, their seigniorial jurisdiction, and their mediæval modes of life; and modernized country gentlemen and enterprising merchants and manufacturers, with their well-managed estates and prosperous enterprises. Besides all these, who are under our direct administration, the Government of India is required to exercise a certain amount of supervision over the one hundred and seventeen Native States, with their Princely Rulers, their autocratic executives, their independent jurisdictions, and their fifty millions of inhabitants. The mere enumeration of these diversified elements must suggest to the most unimaginative mind a picture of as complicated a social and political organisation as has ever tasked human ingenuity to govern and administer (loud applause). But, even within India itself, we have not reached the limits of our accountability, for we are bound to provide for the safety and welfare not only of Her Majesty's Hindu, Mahomedan, and other Native subjects, but also of the large East Indian community, of the indigenous Christian Churches, of the important planting and manufacturing interests which are scattered over the face of the country, as also to secure the property and lives of all the British residents in India, men, women, and children, whether employed in the service of the Government or pursuing independent avocations, in the midst of the alien and semi-civilized multitudes whose peaceable and orderly behaviour cannot, under all circumstances, be implicitly relied on (cheers). To these obligations must also be added the duty of watching over the enormous commercial interests of the mother-country, represented by a guaranteed capital of over two hundred and twenty millions of pounds sterling, which, to the great benefit of India, has been either lent to the State or sunk in Indian Railways and similar enterprises; for, it would be criminal to ignore the responsibility of the Government towards those who have sunk large sums of money in the development of Indian resources on the faith of official guarantees, or who have invested their capital in the Indian funds at the invitation of the Imperial Indian authorities. The same considerations apply with almost equal force to that further vast amount of capital which is employed by private British enterprise in manufactures, in tea-planting, and in the indigo, jute, and similar industries, on the assumption that English rule and English justice will remain dominant in India (loud applause). If, again, we turn our eyes outwards, it will be found that our external obligations are hardly less onerous and imperative than those confronting us from within. India has a land frontier of nearly 6,000 miles, and a seaboard of about 9,000 miles. On the east she is continuous with Siam and China, on the north with Thibet, Bhootan, and Nepal, and on the west she marches, at all events diplomatically, with Russia. On her coasts are many rich and prosperous seaports—Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, Kurrachee, Rangoon—and every year we are made more painfully aware to how serious an extent our contiguity with foreign nations, whether civilized or uncivilized, and the complications arising both out of Eastern and Western politics, may expose us to attack, and of the necessity of walking both warily and wisely in respect of our international relations, and of taking those precautions, however onerous or expensive, which are incumbent on every nation that finds itself in contact with enterprising military monarchies or rival maritime powers (cheers). It is then for the outward protection and for the internal control,—it is for the welfare, good government, and progress of this congeries of nations, religions, tribes, and communities, with the tremendous latent forces and disruptive potentialities which they contain, that the Government of India is answerable; and it is in reference to the ever-shifting and multiplying requirements of this complicated political organisation, that it has been called upon from time to time to shape and modify its system of administration. In the earlier stages of England's connection with India, and even after the force of circumstances had transmuted the East India Company of merchants into an Imperial Executive, the ignorance and the disorganisation of the Peninsula consequent upon the anarchy which followed the collapse of the Mahomedan régime, necessitated the maintenance of a strong uncompromising despotism, with the view of bringing order out of chaos, and a systematised administration out of the confusion and lawlessness which were then universally prevalent. But such principles of Government, however necessary, have never been congenial to the instinct or habits of the English people (applause). As soon as the circumstances of the case permitted, successive statesmen, both at home and in India itself, employed themselves from time to time in softening the severity of the system under which our dominion was originally established, and strenuous efforts were repeatedly made, not only to extend to Her Majesty's subjects in India the same civil rights and privileges which are enjoyed by Her Majesty's subjects at Home, but to admit them, as far as was possible, to a share in the management of their own affairs (cheers). The proof of this is plainly written in our recent history. It is seen in our legal codes, which secure to all Her Majesty's subjects, without distinction of race or creed or class, equality before the law. (cheers). It is found in the establishment of Local Legislative Councils a quarter of a century ago, wherein a certain number of leading natives were associated with the Government in enacting measures suitable to local wants. It lies at the basis of the great principle of decentralised finance, which has prepared the way for the establishment of increased local responsibility. It received a most important development in the Municipal legislation of Lord Northbrook's administration. It took a still fuller and more perfect expression during the administration of my distinguished predecessor, in the Municipal and Local Boards Acts; and it has acquired a further illustration in the recommendations of the Public Service Commission, recently sent home by the Government of India, in accordance with which more than a hundred offices hitherto reserved to the Covenanted Service would be thrown open to the Provincial Service, and thus placed within the reach of our native fellow-subjects in India (applause). [To be continued.]

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE OLD MAN'S REVERIE.

SOOTH'D by the self-same ditty, see
The infant and the sire ;
That smiling on the nurse's knee,
This weeping by the fire ;
Where unobserved he finds a joy
To list its plaintive tone,
And silently his thoughts employ
On sorrows all his own.

At once it comes, by memory's power,
The loved habitual theme,
Reserved for twilight's darkling hour,
A voluntary dream ;
And as with thoughts of former years
His weakly eyes o'erflow,
None wonders at an old man's tears,
Or seeks his grief to know.

Think not he dotes because he weeps ;
Conclusion, ah ! how wrong !
Reason with grief joint empire keeps,
Indissolubly strong ;
And oft in age a helpless pride
With jealous weakness pines,
(To second infancy allied)
And every wo refines.

How busy now his teeming brain,
Those murmuring lips declare ;
Scenes never to return again
Are represented there.

* * * *

He ponders on his infant years,
When first his race began,
And, oh ! how wonderful appears
The destiny of man !
How swift those lovely hours were past,
In darkness closed how soon ;
As if a winter's night o'ercast
The brightest summer's noon.

His withered hand he holds to view,
With nerves once firmly strung,
And scarcely can believe it true
That ever he was young.
And as he thinks o'er all his ills,
Disease, neglect, and scorn,
Strange pity of himself he feels,
Thus aged and forlorn.

HOPE.

FROM THE GERMAN OF SCHILLER.

How many there are who sing and dream
Of happier seasons coming,
And ever is fancy, to catch a beam
Of a Golden Era, roaming.
The world may grow old—and young again—
And the hope of a better shall still remain.

Hope comes with life at its dawning hour ;
Hope sports with the infant creeper ;
Hope cheers up the youth, with her magic power,
And when, too, the gray-haired weeper
Has closed in the grave his weary round,
He plants the tree of hope on the mound.

It is not an empty, vain deceit,
In the brains of fools created ;
It speaks to the soul of a state more meet,
Where its longings shall all be sated.
And the promise the in-dwelling voice thus makes
To the hoping soul—it never breaks.

HAMLET IS THE NATION.

FREILIGRATH'S "DEUTSCHLAND IST HAMLET."

Translated from the German.

Deutschland is Hamlet. Nightly round
His walls doth buried Freedom stalk ;
With mute appeal, in woe profound,
Crossing the warders on their walk.
There stands the ghost in steel arrayed,
And to the doubting falterer saith,
"Be my avenger, draw thy blade !
My sleeping ear was drugged to death."

The story of that deed accurst
Through all his tortured soul doth send
A dreadful light, a burning thirst
For vengeance :—aye, but mark the end !
He ponders, plans ; what should he do ?
His weak heart wavers, doubt assails him ;
For deed of prompt and vigorous hue
The prompt and vigorous spirit fails him.

He has lived in fact too like a drone,
Lying and reading long abed ;
His blood wants motion, and he's grown
Fat, heavy, scant of breath ; his head
With metaphysics crammed ; a mere
Do-nothing, transcendental thinker ;
Of, Wittenberg, thy lore, thy beer,
He has been a too assiduous drinker.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

So lacking resolution, he Pretends he 's crazed, trusts all to time,
 Soliloquizes plenteously,
 And breathes his cholera out in rhyme ;
 In pantomime he vents it too ;
 And, once seized with a fighting fit,
 He sticks Polonius Kotzebue,
 And lets the right man go unhit.

Thus lives he sadly, dreamily,
 And still his own faint heart impeaches ;
 He lets them send him over sea,
 And comes back armed with—caustic speeches.
 If bitter words could kill the king,
 None more expert than he to use 'em ;
 But downright action ? That's a thing
 Of which his worst foes can't accuse him.

At last his sword is fairly out :
 Something he will do now or never.
 Alas, five acts to bring about
 This tardy and ill-starred endeavour !
 Lifeless beside his felon foes,
 The self-undone, behold he lies ;
 And Fortmbras, while none oppose,
 Walks in and makes the realm his prize.

Thank God, we 're not yet come to that,
Our fifth act is not begun.
 Beware, my hero, lest as pat
 Even to the end the likeness run !
 Here sit we hoping, hoping still ;
 O for one proof of manhood ! Haste
 With heart and hand, with wit and will
 To right the poor ghost whilst thou mayst.

Strike while 't is time ; strike bravely now !
 Ere treacherous Laertes come
 With poisoned blade from France, and thou
 Be foully slain ; ere trump and drum
 An army from the north proclaim
 Heirs of thy spoils ;—as for the region
 Whence we may now expect the same,
 I greatly doubt if it's Norwegian.

But one resolve ! Away with sloth !
 Tread valiantly the path before thee !
 Bethink thee of thy sacred oath ;
 Think whose the voice that doth implore thee !
 Why all this quibbling sophistry ?
 But can I chide, fantastic schemer ?
 Myself am but a part of thee,
 Thou evermore unready dreamer !

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

THE First Levée of the new Viceroy, as was expected, was a crowded one. The Private Entrée List gives a total of Europeans and Asiatics at 103, 28 whereof were Natives. Europeans, including in that term such of the Natives who affect European style in name and costume, who were admitted through Public Entrée, were 752 in number, the new Presentations being 158, and the Unavoidably Absent 211. The Native List gives much lower figures. Public Entrée 243, New Presentation, 93 and Unavoidably Absent 106. The Europeans mustered strong, the total number who passed or meant to pass before Lord Lansdowne being 1196. Whereas the Native total is only 470. The hour fixed for the Levée was 9-30 at night, and it closed at 11-30.

THE Drawing Room, much less crowded than the Levée, was a brilliant affair. The fair ones with their fairer costumes of all colors made the scene picturesque. Forty of them were of Private Entrée, 179 Public, 109 New Presentations and 112 could not be present—a total of only 440.

THE Indian Daily News of the 20th has a wise article on the Levée. Our contemporary gives due prominence to the discomforts of, and discourtesies at, that dangerous Durbar of the European type. The whole article is worth study, both within and without Government House. We have space only for the concluding portion :—

“ We hear complaints also of the presence of people who have no claim to be present on such occasions. On this subject we are not in a position to say anything authoritatively. We understand that there are lines drawn which the etiquette of St. James's requires to be observed. These rules were somewhat relaxed during the time of a popular Viceroy, who said it was not his wish to exclude any one who was respectable, and who desired to show respect to the Queen's representative. We have been informed that orders were subsequently sent out to adhere strictly to the practice of the Court of St. James. Whether this has been done, we cannot say. There has been an opinion expressed frequently of recent years that the list would bear weeding with advantage.

Another complaint we approach with some delicacy, but do not on that account forbear to name it, hoping that the object will not be misunderstood. It is well known that the full dress of Europeans is of a sombre hue, and that our native fellow-subjects generally dress in a way that lends picturesque effect to any assembly. We have no desire that they should do otherwise. For the most part, they dress most becomingly, lending colour, richness, brilliancy, and variety to the scene. This they do not only traditionally, but as a matter of respect to the assembly of which they form a part, and especially to the representative of the Sovereign. But it was remarked that many natives were present on Monday night, who must have forgotten what was due to the occasion. They are not expected to appear in swallow-tails or to sport white kid gloves. But there is an obligation on their part to appear in a style becoming the ceremony, which many of them failed to do. We put it to their fellow-countrymen whether it was decent to pass before the Viceroy and his court in costumes more befitting a costermonger than an Indian gentleman. Some wore white trousers, which, from their crumpled and soiled condition, must have had at least two days' wear. Others had checked or colored continuations, with their shoulders enveloped in faded shawls that had seen many days, or in a species of nondescript over-coats which, like Tennyson's words, 'half-revealed and half-concealed the soul within.' Others, again, were not conspicuous for the purity of their linen, dirty shirt-cuffs peeping beneath velvet robes, while not a few had their necks swathed in mufflers, which, however comfortable outside, certainly ought not to have been taken into the Throne Room, and worn in the presence of the Viceroy. The head-dresses of some looked as though they had seen many winters, or even summers, judging from the evidences of perspiration which dimmed their lustre. We do not ask or require that every native gentleman who attends Government House shall be clothed in purple and fine linen, or be resplendent with jewels. But, apart from the respect which every gentleman owes to himself and his own position, we do claim that proper respect shall be paid to the Viceroy, not only as due to himself as a distinguished nobleman, but as the representative of one of the greatest Sovereigns and Powers on the face of the earth. We may acquit offenders of designed insult ; but we cannot acquit them of a want of consideration in presenting themselves before the Viceroy in the guise we have above truthfully described. There is no people on the face of the earth more exacting in matters of ceremony among themselves than are the natives of this country, and we see no reason why there should be less strictness or consideration when paying ceremonious visits to the representative of the Sovereign.”

Probably the Chief Justice of Bengal attracted the most notice on Monday evening. Sir Comer Petheram appeared in black instead of in scarlet in which the other Judges were robed. We understand Sir Comer called a meeting of the Judges to impress on them the dignity of the black gown, but they, according to a ruling of Sir Barnes Peacock, preferred to appear in scarlet. Sir Comer stuck to his black.

NEW YORK is now exhibiting a wonderful block of agatised wood. It weighs 4,200 lbs., and measures 4½ inches, by 33 inches, and is 34 inches high. It was found in the petrified forest at Chalcedony Park, Arizona. It makes fine table tops and is capable of handsome ornamentation. The hardness is such that the time taken up for cutting one piece of the wood is the same for sawing up 200 pieces of marble.

"A Mr. Endo, a native of Nagasaki, has devised an instrument for walking on the water. The vernacular press describes it as something in the nature of foot-gear, made of iron, paper gum elastic, and wood, elliptical in shape and having gutta-percha tubes attached. There is also a life belt. The apparatus filled with air, the wearer is raised out of the water, but by what means he is enabled to preserve an upright position is not stated. Should the waves be rough, the foot-gear is emptied of air and the body is suffered to sink up to the waist. A rate of progress of three miles per hour is supposed to be attainable. The apparatus weighs only 2½ lbs., and it is claimed that the wearer will be able to carry a load of 25 lbs."

THE Government of India, has, in the interest of Native States, wisely ruled that "when a Medical Officer is permitted to attend a Native Prince or Chief, the fee to be paid for such attendance must be settled by the Government of India or the Local Government (as the case may be), to whom the amount of the fee proposed should be reported by the Political Agent or Officer performing analogous functions for sanction, before it is communicated to the Medical Officer concerned."

A Teacher heads the list, but none appears in Class I. 2 have won in each of the 3 Classes in Mathematics, the General Assembly's Institution being prominent. In Natural and Physical Science, in the Chemistry Branch, 3 have passed in Class I; in the Physics, 1 in I, and 4 in II, and in the Physiology and Zoology only 1 in Class II. A teacher stands second in Chemistry. The Muir Central College returns the second in Class II, in Physics and the Metropolitan Institution passes the only student in Physiology and Zoology. The rest in Natural and Physical Science come from the Presidency College.

MISS VALERY WIEDMANN, the daughter of a pastor of North Germany, sued in the Queen's Bench Division Mr. Robert Horace Walpole, heir to the Earldom of Orford, for breach of promise of marriage and for libel, the damages being valued at £10,000. According to the Plaintiff's statement, she met Mr. Walpole in September, 1882, at a hotel in Constantinople. He at once conceived a liking for her which depended into affection, and he wanted to make her his wife, but she at first said she would not marry him as she would go back to Germany. In the next scene, she had returned late from the opera and was sitting for some time at the open window in her robe de nuit—in her room which she thought she had bolted. In came Mr. Walpole and, notwithstanding her protestations, talked of love and ultimately overpowered and seduced her. He repeated his proffers of love, paid her a cheque—for £100—and as a pledge of promise of marriage put his signet ring on her finger. Then they separated. It seems they never met again.

She, however, addressed many telegrams and letters to him, imploring, for the sake of his unborn child, to write to her and make her an honest woman. The child, a boy, was born in June 1883, and it still lives. In cross-examination, she refused to give any information about the child or to her own condition in November 1882, saying excitedly "I will not have it; it is disgraceful; that is not the purpose I am here for, and will not have it. It is ridiculous to put such questions, and I will not answer them." She only admitted that the child still lives, but refused to answer other questions such as the date of the birth of the child. She preferred to go out of court than answer the question. "They are impertinent questions," she said. "After six years to put such a disgrace upon me. It is a shame to humanity. Gentlemen should be ashamed to put such questions." The Judge, Baron Huddleston, threatened her with contempt of court and custody. She protested it was not contempt of court. His Lordship said he was bound to deal with it accordingly. She repeated that her claim was breach of promise, and said that the defendant had no right to ask after the child. The Judge then directed the Jury to return a verdict for the defendant and judgment was entered accordingly.

The defendant denied the promise and the publication of the alleged libel and pleaded privilege as to the libel. As regards the promise, he pleaded that if made it was made in Turkey, where no action was maintainable.

THE late Hon'ble V. The collection, which comprises over 1,000 volumes, has been handed over in two glass cases furnished by the donor, one only condition being attached, namely, that the books be kept separate in a part of the College Library with labels affixed to them bearing the name of the donor Mr. Ramiyengar.

THE Russian Novosti traces the Whitechapel murderer to a Russian lunatic. A native of Tiraspol, in South Russia, he was born in 1847 and graduated at the Odessa University. In 1870 he developed into a fanatical Anarchist and went to Paris and out of mind. The reform of the fallen women was his theme and it struck him that their only way to salvation was being murdered. He followed this bent of his mind by a number of murders in the French capital. He was arrested but not put to trial being found a maniac. He was therefore confined in an asylum for about 16 years. He was pronounced cured and released. He then went over to England shortly before the Whitechapel murders commenced. He lived there with several compatriot refugees but his friends have lost sight of him now.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE Fourth Session of the National Congress will be held at Allahabad, opening on the 27th December. Mr. W. C. Bonnerjea, accompanied by Mr. W. Digby, the Agent of the Congress in England, left last evening for the scene of operations. The veteran leader Mr. Allan Hume—the Raglan of the invading host—is already there. Mr. Lal Mohan Ghose does not go.

The place of meeting is Lowther Castle, the old Government House, now belonging to a Mahomedan who, we hope, will not at the last moment send our patriots to the right about.

There are ugly rumours of a collision of races, for which we believe there is no foundation.

MAUNG OON, C.I.E., A.T.M., of Rangoon, has been Gazetted an Additional Member of the Governor-General's Council.

This is a departure, but a departure in the right direction. This is the first time that a Burman has been elevated to the Chamber of the whole Empire. We owe the appointment to the late Viceroy's initiative, doubtless. We take it as the first taste of the liberality in this sphere that he has promised. We cordially welcome Maung Oon to the metropolis and to his high office.

But who is this Oon? our readers may ask. As the title A. T. M. shews, he holds a medal for good service done to our Government. On or more properly Oon is a pensioner. He was the 2nd Judge of the Rangoon Small Cause Court. He and his elder brother, the late Moungh Khine, also Judge of Rangoon after the 2nd Burmese War, are better known as sons-in-law of the famous Moungh Taulay of Pegu. Taulay had been an influential Chieftain in Burma. Disgusted with his own Government, he emigrated to Arracan with 10,000 followers and retainers, and founded the town of Moulmein. He was of much assistance to the British since the breaking out of the first Burmese War. In reward, he was made a Judge of Moulmein. He died at the good old age of 94. There is a direct descendant of the Chief in this city in the person of Mrs. Moungh Hla Oung, the wife of the Assistant Comptroller General, Civil Account Department.

Mr. Oon is not versed in English. He carried on his judicial duties in his native vernacular.

WE have not hitherto noticed a hole and corner business which took place during the last Long vacation, but we may as well give it as a piece of news and an illustration of the tactics of our professional agitators.

It seems that the National Congress affords no sufficient field to our patriots. There, rather, they feel tied down by stringent rules as to length of speeches and choice of subjects. They therefore got up what they called the Provincial Conference and called those who cared to attend. The Bengal delegates, of course.—Nothing short of a Delegate in these days! These amiable gentlemen denied themselves rest during the holidays. They came over to Calcutta, when Calcutta was out of town, and met at the silent chambers of the British Indian Association, passed several resolutions in support of the doings of the Indian Association—to rescue their fellow countrymen from their present political degradation. They chose for their head the Hon'ble Dr. Mahendralal Sircar, who opened the proceedings with a "Wigging" on them for having troubled a physician in large practice and an enthusiastic student of science in general into the bargain who had no sympathy with their favorite "fad" of Technical Education.

SIR STEUART BAYLEY has surprised everybody who knew him in his earlier life, by the invincible politeness which he has invariably observed towards all who have approached him since his elevation. No extravagance puts him out. He forgives every stupidity. He dismisses deputations with the success of a practised diplomat. Yet he is not given to finesse, but is often blunt enough in his refusal. Still he takes care to avoid unnecessary pain. His reply to the Mahomedan address presented to him at Cuttack, during his late tour, is typical of his execution. Here is the most important part:—

"In regard to Mahomedan educational endowments, you are doubtless aware that the subject has recently been very fully examined by a Committee to which my Secretary, Mr. Nolan, was attached, and which was composed of gentlemen probably the most fit who could be found for such a duty in the Province. At their suggestion the law applicable to suits for the better management of endowments has been simplified, and Government has undertaken to defray the cost of conducting all cases instituted with the approval of the Advocate-General. The proposal which you now put forward, that a body should be permanently constituted with extensive powers for the investigation of the affairs of educational endowments, with a view to disclosing the real facts, was fully discussed by the Committee, and was abandoned in consequence of the strong opposition of some Mahomedan members, apparently representing an influential section of that community. Indeed, it is the want of unanimity among Mahomedans themselves which is the great difficulty in the way. I do not think that you should repudiate as strongly as has been done in the address the advice to help yourself in this matter, taking such assistance as is given by the law, and by the pecuniary support of Government. The Committee's report indicates that in Balasore itself the Mahomedans professing an interest in this matter have done little or nothing to obtain an accurate knowledge as to the institution of the local endowments."

Orissa seems to be the Bæotia of Islam in India. Its representatives there gratuitously brought this rebuff on themselves and their community by vexing the travelling L. G., on a subject the A. B. C. of which they had not learnt. Lucky for them that they had not Sir Ashley Eden to deal with.

WE are pained to learn that a Mahomedan Assistant in a Government office in Calcutta, is being very badly treated by the head of that office, who is a Hindu. This poor man is the only Mahomedan in that office, the rest of the officers being all Hindus. We are told that he is an eyesore to the man clad in brief authority, simply because he is a Mahomedan. Is this the way for the Hindu gentlemen to win the Mahomedans to join them in their political aspirations?

A PRIVATE letter from England received this week contains the following information, which will doubtless be interesting to the many friends and admirers of the first Chief Justice of the Bengal High Court.

For some time past, Sir Barnes Peacock has not been well. He is chiefly troubled with cold and cough. Under medical advice, he winters in the South of France where he now is. He is much better there, and will not return to England till spring.

THE Lieutenant-Governor gave a garden party on Wednesday. It was well attended by native and European gentlemen and ladies. A company of native acrobats attracted the guests to their corner of the grounds, and kept most of them interested, until the appearance of the Viceroy and Lady Lansdowne and the party from Government House, when the interest centred in them. Sir Steuart Bayley was as gracious as ever, making a point of giving his hand to every guest at coming and at parting. Former Lords of Belvedere used to descend, like a god, on the scene after the guests had assembled and to confine their notice to their personal friends and favorites. In fact, they allowed themselves to be surrounded by a cordon of native satellites, which it was impossible to penetrate for the faint-hearted, who often went away without so much as a sight of the great host.

We hope all the native gentlemen who attended on Wednesday will go to Belvedere and write their names in the visiting books.

WE read in the Madras Standard under the head "Pudukota,—12th December"—

"At the Sessions of this month, a Mussulman was fined Rs. 100, and sentenced to a week's simple imprisonment on a charge of perjury. An application was made to the Chief Court, in which it was asked that the sentence might be suspended, pending the disposal of the appeal. The Judge, on the appellate side, declined to take the subject into his consideration, as he could not do anything in the absence of the Chief Judge who was then out of this station on leave. At once the Dewan-Regent who was at Madras was made aware of the fact by a telegram, and he issued orders that the prisoner should be let on bail. The Dewan-Regent has, indeed, played an active part in the exercise of his authority over the Pudukota Chief Court."

This is the way in which the veteran Minister who now rules over Poodocota is being, for so many years, hounded by a pack of irresponsible scribes, place-hunters, and litigants. If the far from lucid phrase, "The Dewan-Regent has, indeed, played an active part in the exercise of his authority over the Pudukota Chief Court" has any meaning, the Dewan-Regent ought to be commended for his energy in not sleeping over one of his most important functions. As his authority is not questioned, is it the activity that is at fault? The case cited is a clear one for interference, and the Dewan-Regent deserves great credit for the promptitude with which he exercised his legitimate authority in the interest of justice. Some of our British magnates might with advantage follow this black statesman.

AGAIN :—

"The State prides upon the relationship borne by some of the highly-paid officials. There is the Dewan-Regent at the helm of the State. He has his nephew as Guardian for the young Rajah. In this capacity he is much eulogised by his uncle. The District Collector and Magistrate (Dewan-Peishkar) has a Subordinate Magistrate in the person of his own brother. The latter is to be checked by the former in the discharge of his functions. One is employed as Joint Magistrate and Deputy Collector, (Deputy-Peishkar), while his brother is an Overseer in the Public Works Department. There are other minor relations which need no mention for the present. If a list of men, imported into the State service, were taken, it would show that the present mode of administration is on a very bad scale."

And is that all? Can untiring Malice, with her microscopic eye, discern no other flaw in the administration of the Principality than that some of the officials are relations? We shrewdly suspect that the charge is exaggerated. But taking this correspondent at his word, it amounts to nothing worth a reply.

MR. F. HENVEY, Agent to the Governor-General for Central India, is on his cold weather tour. He reached Ujjain on the 15th. Governor Sir Michael Filose, at the head of his officials and the local magnates, received him at the railway station which was grandly fitted up for the occasion. The Agent, Governor-General was presented with an address from the municipal committee and the merchants. It was, very properly, in vernacular. Accordingly it could be, as it was, read by the Chairman of the Corporation, Seth Sevaram Samuntram, who is no English scholar, and could be answered without reproach, as it was, without the intervention of a middle-man. Of course, it was businesslike and to the point, without any dash at transcendental politics. It expressed the "special gratitude" of Malwa to Mr. Henvey, for his recommendation to the Government of India, for the good of the Gwalior subjects, of the proper persons for the supreme charge of the State during the minority. To that recommendation, they believe, they owe the "appointment of the junior Ranee Saheba, who is an accomplished lady Regent, and Bapooahel Jadhoo as the President of the Council of Regency. The latter gentleman, we need hardly state, is eminently suited to the high and responsible office not only by reason of his personal qualifications and experience but has the hereditary privilege of holding such post of honor and power, and since the appointment of such an honoured and honorable gentleman to the head of the administration of the state, many of the difficulties, inconveniences, and innovations, which have crept in the administration since the death of His Highness the late Maharaja Jiajeerao Sindia, will soon be removed and none is more conscious of the fact than ourselves that you are the first cause of such reform."

The Address indeed is eminently practical and does credit to its framers. It insinuates in respectful attitude and economy of phrase some important points. Here in a single sentence are compressed the best of them :—

"We now confidently hope that the beneficial measures of His Highness the late Maharaja Saheb will be invariably followed and that on the erection of the palace here, His Highness the Maharaja Saheb will be pleased to reside therein to the great joy and benefit of his subjects of this part of country."

There is more than what the running reader unacquainted with the affairs of Central India might suspect. The first part of the sentence doubtless refers to the hasty and unsuitable changes introduced during the late régime since the death of Maharaja Jeyaji Rao Bahadoor, at enormous cost and to the detriment of efficiency in administration. The second part contains a statesmanlike suggestion. Malwa has a right to expect that her Ruler should reside within her territory, during a good part of the year at least. We trust there is no reproach against the climate. The absence of proper accommodation will be remedied when the new Palace is ready. The necessary improvements will follow when the Maharaja comes to take up his residence there. Gwalior, although now adorned by one of the finest palaces in India, is but a Lushkar settlement—an encampment turned to a capital. Ujjain is an antique—an Indian Rome the Eternal.

The Addressers do not forget their obligations to their Governor :—

"We further beg leave to express our gratitude to Sir Michael Filose to whose untiring zeal and recommendations we owe the beneficial improvements inaugurated in this town in the public works, trade, education and other general improvements such as the establishment of High School and Library, &c."

THE French are confessedly the politest people in Europe, masters of the minor graces.

"Gay sprightly land of mirth and social ease, Pleased with thyself, whom all the world can please."

is Goldsmith's apostrophe to France. The Poet with equal truth might have written "who" instead of "whom" in the last line quoted. He would not have any objection, on that score, either, seeing that, later on, he notices the facility of the people at compliments and the inordinate hunger for them developed by it. This mutual complimentation

Here passes current ; passed from hand to hand
It shifts in splendid traffic round the land ;
From courts to camps, to cottages it strays
And all are taught an avarice of praise ;
They please, are pleased, they give to get esteem,
&c.,

That, of course, is the coarse Briton's, or rather the Anglo-Irishman's explanation of a matter in which he is no expert. It is poor philosophy, not to say arrant barbarism, to resolve grace and graciousness into a passion for praise—an infinite capacity for "blarneying." Be that as it may be, it is undeniable that the French excel all other nations in the art of pleasing. The other day, they charmed the Queen of Portugal. Before quitting Paris, she expressed her satisfaction with the hospitality which the French people had shown her. At the Railway Station of Orleans, in a saloon decorated with foliage and flowers, where she was received by the superior Railway authorities, she requested Colonel Lichtenstein, who represented the President of the Republic, and the Count of Ormesson, who had come to salute her in the name of the Foreign Minister, to convey her cordial thanks to them. Her Majesty was not content with the formality of pronouncing merely the official acknowledgments. With a touching grace, as the train was about to be put in motion, she said to Count Valbon, her ambassador—doubtless so as to be heard by others—"I carry the best and dearest souvenir from Paris."

In like manner, were the Grand Dukes of Russia conquered. They had taken part in several chases. The Society of Chases of Rambouillet invited them to hunt at Clairfontaine. The Duchess of Waldemar followed the course with much animation. Among the personages present were MM. de Leuchtenberg, Polosoff, Duc de Dondeauville, Viscount Tudern, Baron Hottinguer, and Baron de Rodortes.

At Rambouillet, the President of the Republic, too, in honour of the Grand Dukes, got up a hunt, which was preceded by an entry into the town adorned with the Russian and French flags. Their Imperial Highnesses were much touched by the kind attention of the inhabitants.

BAROO Kally Nath Mitter's time is up in Council. Raja Rameswar Singh Bahadoor, brother of the Maharaja of Durbhunga, has been selected to fill the vacancy.

SIFTING OF OUR REPRESENTATIVES.

THE MALCONTENT PRESS AND ITS CHIEF IRRECONCILABLE.

At the outset of a new vicereign and in view of the great questions of the day, it is a measure of common prudence to put our house in order. This is the time for the periodical thorough repair so necessary to the comfort, health and even safety of the inmates—nay, to the preservation of the very premises. If a complete overhaul is a formidable prospect—if extensive additions and alterations are an arduous and costly undertaking—your home should, at any rate, be placed in a habitable condition, made air- and water-tight, and neat at least, if not elegant without, and decently furnished within. That is the subject on which we should like, at this juncture, to preach to all the communities of India, most of all to our own. Our text is simple:—"Wanted a Thorough Repair and Refurnishing before regular occupation." There is a time for everything, and this is the time for this. There is no particular time for urgent repairs for safety, but periodical examinations and repairs and change of furniture are among the prime requirements of wise household management, and the beginning of a fresh administration seems a proper season for that necessary operation. At this moment, when we are all engaged in criticising the ruler just retired, may we not, with more advantage, form a judgment on the critics of administration and on our politicians in general? Just now, the Marquis of Lansdowne is the chief topic of Indian ignorance. Are we sure we have no better occupation than the desperate task of interpreting the great Sphinx just landed on our shores? We are ready to discuss the new Viceroy threadbare at the threshold of his Indian career—to assign a character to a stranger whom nobody knows, and to evolve a policy out of cautious commonplaces meaning nothing in particular, uttered under the compulsion of saying something polite in answer to formal addresses. Had we not better take stock of our own possessions—ask ourselves what we are, and what we have been doing, and how we mean to conduct ourselves in the future immediately before us?

To our mind, instead of wasting our thought in strictures on the ruler who is gone, or in vaticinations on him who is just come, we would be more profitably employed in judging our own leading men and publicists. One of the cardinal duties of the Indian community at this moment, seems to be to examine and ascertain the capacity of these gentlemen for their respective positions—to review the past and to forecast the future. We are sick of the cant term "representative men." But are our men of leading "representative men?" If they are, the prior question must be confronted, Are we worthy of ourselves? Are we, in fact, "a good lot"? Whatever we may be, are we prepared to be represented by our so-called "representative men?" Do we not even care to keep up appearances? A great responsibility rests on our people in this matter. We are accountable, how we allow ourselves to be judged by those who pose before the public as our representatives. It is time enough that we should have a thorough sifting of our representation and a recasting of leaders. The subject, no doubt, is one of difficulty and delicacy, but there is no help for it. The question has assumed an urgency which cannot be mistaken. We must do something for our character, and that instanter.

Beyond question, the first step is to set our press in order. Here, at all events, there is no such difficulty. It may be difficult to recognise the true leaders, and no less so to deal with them. But the Press is an institution always before the public, and it is easier to influence it. We have suffered much from its sins. There is scarcely a dozen thoughtful men in the country who will deny that our Press has of late worked incalculable mischief. It is this press that paralyzes the efforts of the best men of the community to effect a decent rapprochement between not only the governing body and the subject population, but also between the two races, European and native, inhabiting this great Empire, side by side, whose main interests are indissolubly bound up together. Is it possible that there can be either social peace or political progress in a community broken into different camps, always at war, overt or incipient? The very idea is out of the question. What is the good of one-sided efforts by different members or branches of a great Imperial household? Do our enthusiasts seriously hope that a strong external power will concede any extensive privileges to a subject population which, besides being not in harmony with itself, has not the common prudence to live on decent terms with the members of the ruling race? Will any number of monster meetings of natives, supported by stray Europeans, at different centres of the Empire, realise adequate expectations, so long as the great society of ruling Englishmen and influential Europeans and East Indians and Eurasians, look on the business with amused indifference or affrighted vexation?

For this unhappy result, we confess with pain our Orators answerable, but, above all, our Press. Great as is the effect of foolish speech on the young, the ill-educated and the unthinking, the range of the nuisance is still limited by physical conditions. The living voice can reach but a few hundreds, and it is only when the Press aids the Platform, in circulating its rubbish, that the spouters become most mischiev-but then the one agency is merged in the other. It is our malcontent Press that is the chief and most widely diffused pest. We say "our malcontent" advisedly, to distinguish the nocent from the innocent. Happily, the Press is not one, nor all in the same boat. Composed of different units, it is diverse in character. Of late years, no doubt, nocence had been on the increase, but we already discern a silver lining in the horizon. Still the sky is overcast with a murky gray opacity, surcharged with masses of frowning clouds. Till the atmosphere is farther cleared, there will be cause for anxiety. The malcontent Press is even more loud than it is numerous. So long as we fail to improve it, we must be content to go without character, and be the object of legitimate suspicion with our neighbours. On a subject which so deeply concerns our national honour and welfare, we cannot stand on delicacy, but will speak out with courage, regardless of misunderstanding, be the consequences to ourself what they may. We must not leave our meaning enveloped in generalities. For a concrete example, we name the Indian Mirror. That one paper is itself a host—the type and arch-transgressor of all the malcontent brood. It has earned for itself an unenviable notoriety. We have long since given up reading it. Since the late Keshub Chunder Sen and his brother the accomplished and wise Krishna Bihari abandoned it, there never was much to interest one in it. Since poor Roderigues left it to the dogs, it became simply unreadable, except on occasions when it got extraneous help. With age, its worst vices have been more and more confirmed, growing at once in inanity and insanity. For the last few years, notwithstanding the exertions of friends who value the importance of a daily organ, it has, for the most part, been a regular sink. It knows but one policy—that of everlasting discontent. It is probably the one thorough Irreconcilable in the land. Its rudeness is proverbial. Grossly ignorant, incapable of thought, deficient in information even on passing subjects, because unable to distinguish between the true and false of what reaches it, notoriously credulous, a prey to the delusions of the hour, a slave to dancing Derwishes and painted prophets, its sole mission seems to be to misjudge and misrepresent men and measures, and to vilify authority. Without forbearance or toleration, it cannot understand honest difference. It can never forgive the shadow of a shade of opposition. Moderation is its special abhorrence. It maintains a standing snarl at Europeans and the European community. The Government is, of course, its bête noire. It opposes without sense, and abuses without wit. It is the Little Kala Pahar—the puny but troublesome enemy of everything respectable.

It is not necessary to specify the offences of a journal whose breath is poison. Any issue will show to the candid and discerning what we mean. A week's consecutive issues will prove the charge to the hilt. The proof, indeed, is now patent. Its very friends have given the Mirror up. Poor Mr. Hume clung to the last to the only native daily, but he at last found the connection insupportable and found a formal disavowal necessary. We are assured by him that the same is the case with the best men of the Congress, in all parts of the Empire. They were all afraid of sinking, Congress and all, in that rotten bottom, and they took care, like knowing rats, to desert it and land the rich cargo on the shore just in time.

As we do not look into the paper except the 3rd page, containing selections from other papers, we will give two crucial instances of malcontent wisdom and propriety which have fallen under our notice. The other day, we chanced to light upon an article on the Marquis of Salisbury's speech at Edinburgh. The Marquis was reported by the London Correspondent of the Bombay Gazette to have called Mr. Dadabhai Narojee "a black man." Such language can be justifiable, if ever, only in the heat of electioneering. From the point of view of our stately Oriental manners, it is rude to savagery. To our Indian ears, such an expression towards Brother Dadabhai is simply shocking. An Indian journalist would naturally resent it with warmth, and might be excused for retorting on the occasion with bitterness. What does the Indian Mirror do? Without waiting even for confirmation, it kicks up a d—l of a row. Were not such exhibitions quite common with it, there would certainly have been a requisition by friends for doctors. The report might be subsequently contradicted, or the expression might be retracted. It was evidently a slip. Perhaps, it was a mere party shot of a rotten egg of speech, and, if so, very unbecoming the hand of the leader of the House of Lords. At the worst, it was an ebullition of temper. There was no want of principle in the matter. No man's honour was touched on either side. Yet this veteran Bengali journalist—this Indian of light and leading—called Heaven and Earth to witness the great wrong to India, and iniquity of England's Prime Minister, and urged—entreated—conjured the whole Empire—Great Britain and her greatest Dependency—to combine, on pain of everlasting disgrace, for driving Lord Salisbury out of office, neck and crop, bag and baggage. Nothing short of the ignominious disgrace of the base bad man will satisfy this knight of the quill sans peur et sans reproche—this patriot of such a mealy mouth that butter does not melt in it—this publicist who was never betrayed into an angry word!

The next illustration we shall take, is the talk of the whole town and, we may add, the disgrace of native society. How the Mirror misbehaved last year at the time of Lord Dufferin's leaving for Simla, will probably never be forgotten. It was imagined that, after its discomfiture on that occasion, it would, for its own sake, preserve silence on the subject of that Viceroy ever after. Not a bit of it! It welcomed his Lordship to the capital with studied insolence, and, after hounding him throughout, now continues to send its vials of abuse after him since he has left it for ever. Not content with that, it pursues his very shadow—the slightest traces of that nobleman—with unappeasable malignity. Look at the vicarious sacrifice in the person of the late Private Secretary of the late Viceroy! Such vindictiveness is probably unparalleled. Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace had ceased to exercise the functions of Private Secretary to the late Viceroy from Simla, Mr. Hewett of the Indian Civil Service taking his place. No matter! It is enough that he was Lord Dufferin's once. Not only is he abused, but Lord Lansdowne too. And the queerest part of the business is that, in obedience to a hint from their Prophet, the malcontents are ostentatiously loyal and patronisingly kind to the new Viceroy. But the astute game is abandoned at the sight of the Dufferin rag—red, of course. Nay, not only Lord Lansdowne is repeatedly reproached for taking in a seasoned Private Secretary for the nonce, but Lord Dufferin also is denounced for Lord Lansdowne's choice. Was ever anything so unconscionable and without conscience?

This matter of the appointment of a Private Secretary has, in our contemporary's columns, all the importance of a grave policy of State. The Mirror devoted the best part of a whole issue to a leading article on the subject, and returned to the attack with another on the following day. On the first occasion, among other things, it treated its readers to such stuff as this :

"We know that he had originally considerable difficulty in securing a suitable Private Secretary, till at last he found Colonel Ardagh, a man after his own heart. When Lord Lansdowne left England, it was settled that Colonel Ardagh was to be his Private Secretary in India. It was after His Excellency's arrival in India that we heard of the new disposition of the office of Private Secretary in Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace's favor. It was originally announced, before Lord Lansdowne left England, that Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace would leave India at the same time as Lord Dufferin, the latter sailing for Europe, and his Private Secretary journeying home overland through Central Asia. A subsequent announcement said that Lord Lansdowne not having been able to secure a Private Secretary, Sir Donald would act as one for a short time. The services of Colonel Ardagh having been, after all, obtained by the new Viceroy, Lord Dufferin's organs in the Press informed the public, so far as we recollect, that Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace would, after all, go home. Once more, the same newspapers contradicted their former announcement, and said that Sir Donald was deputed on special work, the speciality of the work remaining unspecified—Mr. Hewett acting pro. tem. as Private Secretary. This announcement was, after a short while, supplemented by another, which informed the public that Sir Donald would remain in India, even after Lord Dufferin's departure, to complete his special work. We, therefore, can only infer, on the strength of the facts we have placed before the reader, that the ex-Viceroy must have asked his successor to take over Sir Donald as Private Secretary."

What a picture of a miserable man of his own painting, have we here! How he was exercised by the unauthorised news that the papers, from time to time, laid before the public! He was, of course, not a bit wiser by the different rumours than before.

"We may be wrong in our inference, but we think this sort of arrangement to be decidedly objectionable on all grounds, and we maintain that it is fair neither to Colonel Ardagh, the Private Secretary-elect, nor to Lord Lansdowne himself. The Government of India is so peculiar, we were going to say so unique, that we do not, and the public does not, know what could have been the circumstances or the objects, which led to such an extraordinary arrangement. Now, if we possessed the right of interpellation in our Legislative Councils, we could, in the exercise of the right, get at these circumstances and objects. But in the absence of the right of interpellation, we are completely in the dark about them."

What a confession! The man knows nothing about the matter. No! not exactly so. He knows one thing, assuredly; knowledge or no knowledge, his cue is abuse; his vocation is galie. In fact, he does wrong with full knowledge. "We may be wrong," says he; but never mind. We are free to abuse. It is a fine occupation. How the Baboos in the offices gape at our wit and spirit! How the half-educated and quarter-educated lionise us! If facts are against us, so much the worse for them. Patriotism pure is not bound to proof.

Fancy the audacity and stupidity of proclaiming, without the slightest warrant, that Lord Dufferin forced his former Private Secretary on his successor, as if the accomplished and able Mackenzie Wallace were a bad bargain difficult to provide for! And for what purpose? Why for the purpose, forsooth, of perpetuating the slavery of India and the despair of the Mirror and the malcontents. The nation is yet far from being able to breathe freely. Machiavelli has, no doubt, left for ever, but then he has left behind Mephistopheles—his secret Gooroo—guide, philosopher and friend.

The writer incidentally discloses the extent of his party's aspirations, which are now under discussion in connection with the Congress movement. He naïvely confesses the use they would make of a representative Legislature, or of the right of interpellation in even a partially popular Chamber, whenever it was granted. After this, it is idle to find fault with Lord Dufferin and others, who are afraid of the obstruction to business—not to say of danger to the best interests of the State—from the presence in the Legislature of any number of irresponsible politicians of this kidney, with the power to put all manner of questions to Government. It never occurred to the writer how frivolous such a question would be as he would like to ask. Our would-be Honourable member might just as well interpellate Government as to the Viceroy's tailoring or cooking arrangements.

The new Viceroy has missed a great chance. He is a most promising young man and might have got on tolerably, by a diligent study of that repertory of the wisdom of the East—the Indian Mirror, but for that arch-schemer Dufferin. Lord Lansdowne is not apparently a well-known person at the Mirror office, but he comes certified by the London agent of the Advocate of India, and "our own information"—from some of the passengers of the P. and O. steamer—is also favourable. But cui bono? The trail of the Serpent is over him. Dufferin's own Private Secretary is still here to "coach" the new Viceroy's Private Secretary for a few weeks or months. What hope of India under the circumstances!

On another day, the Mirror, in the course of a long article, writes this glorious rubbish:—

"Unfortunately for the Viceroy and unfortunately for us, His Excellency has to deal with the legacy, Lord Dufferin left to his successor at the last moment. What does the retention of Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace, as the Private Secretary to the new Viceroy, portend? This gentleman is now officially gazetted as being appointed Private Secretary to Lord Lansdowne with effect from the 10th instant. That is to say, on the very day Lord Lansdowne assumed the Viceroyalty, Sir Donald also was sworn in, in his old post. What does this arrangement mean? If any thing, it means that Lord Dufferin made up his mind at the last moment that he and his policy should not be easily forgotten in this country. We regard Sir Donald Wallace's fresh lease of office with not only a sense of foreboding, but with positive mistrust. The Englishman has attempted to soften the bitterness of the announcement by saying that Sir Donald Wallace's appointment implies no change in his plans, and that his stay in India will be merely temporary. But we are not satisfied that his stay in this country should be even temporary. A week, a month, and the mischief is done. Lord Lansdowne will, indeed, be a man of rare courage and individuality if he can lift himself above the influence and counsels of his Private Secretary. Our only hope is that His Excellency will prove just such a man. He has entered upon his duties at one of the most critical periods of British Indian history. We are sure, Lord Lansdowne will not be carried away by self-laudatory and fanciful pictures of peace and financial solvency, drawn by the ex-Viceroy over the social glass after a valedictory meal. Lord Dufferin with characteristic complacency told his hosts of the Byculla Club at Bombay night before last that he had restored the 'equilibrium' of the Treasury, and maintained profound peace in the country. This was meant to assure people that he left his successor an easy and simple task of Government; whereas the fact is that Lord Lansdowne's work will be unusually arduous. Lord Dalhousie in a similar manner left India, enjoying peace. But history witnessed the legacy of woe he left to his successor. We know it will be exceedingly difficult for Lord Lansdowne to resist the influence and counsels of the officials surrounding him, but we entreat him to do so for his own sake, and for the sake of the millions, committed to his care. The old regime has done its best, it seems, to have the old policy continued. While Sir Donald Wallace is at His Excellency the Viceroy's elbow as Private Secretary, Mr. Evans, we see, re-nominated to the Supreme Legislative Council to represent, we believe, the Dufferinian sentiments. We do not know how often Mr. Evans has been re-appointed to the Council. We are absolutely ignorant of his special merits, which have entitled him to this oft-repeated honor. Are there no other Barristers to be found fit for the post? Is Mr. Evans to be made a life-member of the Council? Why should he be allowed to make a monopoly of the office? Lord Lansdowne could positively know nothing about Mr. Evans. Was not, then, this gentleman's re-nomination to the Council practically the work of Lord Dufferin? We only hope that the Viceroy will have the will and the courage to trample upon what seems to be nothing less than an attempt to perpetuate the old regime."—Indian Mirror, Dec. 16.

So it is not enough that Sir Donald has long ceased to be Lord Dufferin's Private Secretary and would soon leave India for good. Having once served the late Viceroy, he has ipso facto been disabled and outlawed. He should not be allowed to tarry a moment on these shores. We wonder whether the disability extends to the clan Mackenzie and all the descendants of William Wallace.

But it is not the Private Secretary who is the only eyesore. Every belonging of Lord Dufferin's is bad and wrong. The country should be purged of the Dufferin taint.

This is Dufferinophobia and no mistake!

Such is the journalism to which we are linked, which is daily compromising our credit and endangering our country's and people's cause!

MAHOMEDAN POLITICAL REPRESENTATIVES.

I confess I cannot approve of elaborate uncalled-for exposure of the Mahomedan Delegate from Dacca by your correspondent "A Mussulman of Bengal but never Chamar." By such a graphic account of his unmentionable antecedent and questionable character "H. Bux" has undoubtedly obtained the notoriety which he so eagerly longs for. Not only he but his brother Patoolges will remain ever indebted to your correspondent for this great publicity. When it is well known to the intelligent public that the enlightened Mahomedans of Dacca in a body refrained themselves from joining the Congress and publicly expressed their anti-Congress views, like the citizens of Bombay, Lahore and other places, it is unnecessary then to handle the "Hindu-elected Mahomedan Delegate" from that historical city in a first rate journal like Reis and Rayyet and to reiterate his non-representative element.

Your correspondent should not be surprised to see that one of the audacious and plucky Patoolges has been hailed as a representative of the Dacca Mahomedans when all grades and spheres of logis such as Attarlogis, Mahbullogis, Chaprawlogis &c., are every day playing wonders and aspiring higher and higher above their station. "English education" is itself a satanic spell. It makes its possessor at once a gentleman, and leads him to think that he is in no way inferior to any Reis or gentleman of the land. Many such spell-bound individuals consider the old-school gentry and Kulin Indians no better than barbarians or the rude aborigines. Such is the talisman of a smattering of reading and writing in the language of the rulers. What wonder, then, if Mr. Bux with his little English claims to be a representative of the respectability of one of the proudest Mussulman cities in India.

Your masterly leader on the historical genealogy of the Indian Mussulmans in your issue of the 22nd September last has, it seems, been very much misunderstood by the Congresswallahs disappointed in their search for Mahomedans of leading and light to sit with them in their annual gatherings, they are unscrupulously picking up persons bearing Mahomedan names and painting them in the brightest colour imaginable. The agitators only want a number of so-called Mahomedans whom they can easily make highly respectable and educated by a dash of their pen, on the mere supposition that all Mahomedans are of good birth and lineage. If such is not the case I would ask these political agitators to answer me the following questions:—Can the so-called Mahomedan Delegates read, write and understand English in which important speeches and lectures are being delivered? How many Mahomedans are there who can sufficiently understand political problems? Did the simple-minded and obliging country Meers, Syuds, Khondkars, Mahomedan Chorodbaries, &c., ever look into any book or tract on the wants of India, or of Bengal or Behar? Did they shew any aptitude to do good to their community and country at large? Did their names ever figure in the Press as those of public-spirited men? When they are indifferent and deaf and dumb to the dire necessity of their co-religionists who are losing their position in Society every day, how can they be the exponents of their community in ambitious movements of any kind?

Dec. 18.

KHAJA KHEZER.

SPEECH OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE MARQUIS OF DUFFERIN AND AVA AT THE ST. ANDREW'S DINNER.

Calcutta, 30th November 1888.

[Concluded from p. 573.]

So again with regard to technical education. The Government of India may recommend to the local Governments the policy and the arrangements which it considers to be suited for the establishment and spread of this useful and necessary branch of instruction, and the local Governments may improve upon those suggestions, or may apply them with the utmost zeal and wisdom; but it is the educated classes—those who are most intimately acquainted with the internal economy of the homes of India and the natural aptitudes of their inhabitants—who alone can give energy and vitality to the movement. Well, Gentlemen, as I have already observed, when the Congress was first started, it seemed to me that such a body, if they directed their attention with patriotic zeal to the consideration of these and cognate subjects, as similar Congresses do in England, might prove of assistance to the Government and of great use to their fellow-citizens, and I cannot help expressing my regret that they should seem to consider such momentous subjects, concerning as they do the welfare of millions of their fellow-subjects, as beneath their notice, and that they should have concerned themselves instead with matters in regard to which their assistance is likely to be less profitable to us (applause). It is still a greater matter of regret to me that the members of the Congress should have become answerable for the distribution—as their officials have boasted, amongst thousands and thousands of ignorant and credulous men—of publications animated by a very questionable spirit, and whose manifest intention is to excite the hatred of the people against the public servants of the Crown in this country (cheers). Such proceedings as these no Government could regard with indifference, nor can they fail to inspire it with misgivings, at all events of the wisdom of those who have so offended. Nor is the silly threat of one of the chief officers—the principal Secretary I believe—of the Congress that he and his Congress friends hold in their hands the keys not only of a popular insurrection but of a military revolt, calculated to restore our confidence in their discretion, even when accompanied by the assurance that they do not intend for the present to put these keys into the locks (loud applause). But Gentlemen, though I have thought it my duty in these plain terms to point out what I consider the misapprehension of the Congress party as to the proper direction in which their energies should be employed, I do not at all wish to imply that I view with anything but favour and sympathy the desire of the educated classes of India to be more largely associated with us in the conduct of the affairs of their country. Such an ambition is not only very natural, but very worthy, provided due regard be had to the circumstances of the country and to the conditions under which the British administration in India discharges its duties (applause). In the speech which I delivered at Calcutta on the occasion of Her Majesty's Jubilee, I used the following expression:

"Wide and broad, indeed, are the new fields in which the Government of India is called upon to labour, but no longer, as of old, need it labour alone. Within the period we are reviewing, education has done its work, and we are surrounded on all sides by Native gentlemen of great attainments and intelligence, from whose hearty, loyal, and honest co-operation we may hope to derive the greatest benefit. In fact, to an Administration so peculiarly situated as ours, their advice, assistance, and solidarity are essential to the successful exercise of its functions. Nor do I regard with any other feelings than those of approval and good-will their natural ambition to be more extensively associated with their English rulers in the administration of their own domestic affairs, and glad and happy should I be if, during my sojourn amongst them, circumstances permitted me to extend and to place upon a wider and more logical footing the political status which was so wisely given a generation ago by that great Statesman, Lord Halifax, to such Indian gentlemen as by their influence, their acquirements and the confidence they inspired in their fellow-countrymen were marked out as useful adjuncts to our Legislative Councils." To every word which I then spoke I continue to adhere (cheers); but surely the sensible men of the country cannot imagine that even the most moderate constitutional changes can be effected in such a system as ours by a stroke of the pen, or without the most anxious deliberations, as well as careful discussions in Parliament (applause). If ever a political organization has existed where caution is necessary in dealing with those problems which affect the adjustment of the administrative machine, and where haste and precipitancy are liable to produce deplorable results, it is that which holds together our complex Indian Empire, and the man who stretches forth his hand towards the ark, even with the best intentions, may well dread lest it should shrivel up to the shoulder. But growth and development are the rule of the world's history, and from the proofs I have already given of the way in which English statesmanship has perpetually striven gradually to adapt our methods of government in India to the expanding intelligence and capacities of the educated classes amongst our Indian subjects, it may be confidently expected that the legitimate and reasonable aspirations of the responsible heads of native society, whether Hindu or Mahomedan, will in due time receive legitimate satisfaction (cheers). The more we enlarge the surface of our contact with the educated and intelligent public opinion of India, the better; and although I hold it absolutely necessary, not merely for the maintenance of our own power, but for the good government of the country, and for the general content of all classes, and especially of the people at large, that England should never abdicate her supreme control of public affairs, or delegate to a minority or to a class, the duty of providing for the welfare of the diversified communities over which she rules, I am not the less convinced that we could, with great advantage, draw more largely than we have hitherto done on Native intelligence and Native assistance in the discharge of our duties (loud applause). I have had ample opportunities of gauging and appreciating to its full extent the measure of good sense, of practical wisdom, and of experience which is possessed by the leading men of India, both among the great nobles on the one hand, and amongst the leisured and professional classes on the other, and I have now submitted officially to the home authorities some personal suggestions in harmony with the foregoing views (cheers). Gentlemen, I have

Holloway's Pills.—The Great Need.—The blood is the life, and on its purity our health as well as our existence depend. These Pills thoroughly cleanse the vital fluid from all contaminations, and by that means strengthen and invigorate the whole system, healthily stimulate sluggish organs, repress over-excited action, and establish order of circulation and secretion throughout every part of the body. The balsamic nature of Holloway's Pills exercises marvellous power in given tone to debilitated and nervous constitutions. These Pills dislodge all obstructions, both in the bowels and elsewhere, and are, on that account, much sought after for promoting regularity of action in young females and delicate persons who are naturally weak, or have from some cause become so.

sometimes seen in the newspapers formidable indictments drawn up against the British administration in India. I do not now refer to them for the purpose of controverting the charges which they formulated, but they have certainly indicated one blemish which the Government of India frankly recognizes and had already begun to deal with, namely, the present constitution of the police. There are undoubtedly great defects in this branch of the public service. It is, however, by no means an easy matter to deal with, the difficulty lying in the low morale prevailing in the classes from which alone the police can be drawn, in the supineness and ignorance of the people themselves, and still more, on account of the additional expenditure which would be entailed by any really effective amelioration of the force (applause). Again, with regard to the separation of Judicial and Executive Offices in the early stage of the service and in the lower grades. This is a counsel of perfection to which we are ready to subscribe, though the reform suggested--where it has not been carried into effect--and it has been largely effected--is by no means so simple a proceeding as many people suppose. But here also we have a question of money. With regard to both these subjects, however, I have to make one observation. The evils complained of are not of recent date: they existed long before my time, and had they been as intolerable, as is now stated, they would have been remedied while the existence of surplus funds rendered this practicable; but, as this was not done, it is fair to argue that, even admitting that there is room for improvement in both the above respects, we can afford to consult times and seasons in carrying these improvements into effect (applause). Be that, however, as it may, I confess, I always lay down these incriminating documents with a feeling of relief at finding that more serious shortcomings cannot be alleged against us (cheers). When I consider the difficulties of our task, the imperfection of the instruments through which we must necessarily work, the multiplicity of the interests with which we have to deal, the liability of our most careful calculations to be overset by material accidents over which we have no command, the complexity and centrifugal might of the forces we are called upon to harmonize and co-ordinate, the extraordinary tendency in the East for two and two to make five, and the imperfection which stamps the conduct of all human affairs, my wonder is that our miscarriages should not have been infinitely multiplied. In reading these criticisms I am reminded of a story of a young man who afterwards became a very powerful public speaker. On his first appearance on the hustings he was so embarrassed by the novel circumstances of his situation that he made but an indifferent effort at his speech; but when some one in the crowd ill-naturedly jeered at him, he cried out, "you just come up here and do it yourself--you won't find it so easy," which pertinent observation at once won for him the sympathy of his audience (loud laughter). At all events, we have the satisfaction of knowing that there is another side to the picture; for in these diatribes, to use Sir Auckland Colvin's eloquent words, "of the India of to-day as we know it; of India under education; of India compelled in the interests of the weaker masses, to submit to impartial justice; of India brought together by road and rail; of India entering into the first class commercial markets of the world; of India of religious toleration; of India assured for terms of years unknown in less fortunate Europe, of profound and unbroken peace; of India of the free Press; of India, finally, taught for the first time that the end and aim of rule is the welfare of the people and not the personal aggrandizement of the sovereign,"--he might have added of India that within the last 28 years has accumulated 110 millions of gold and 218 millions of silver, "we fail to find a syllable of recognition (cheers)." At all events, Gentlemen, you may be sure that, whatever our sins, whether of omission or of commission, the English Government in India will continue faithfully, courageously, and in the fear of God to endeavour to discharge its duties, to amend whatever may be amiss, and still further to improve the good which already exists, indifferent to praise or blame, and as unresentful of the hard things occasionally said of us by those for whose sake we are labouring, as we shall always be grateful for the appreciation of those, and they are the great majority, of our Indian fellow-subjects who have the intelligence to understand and the generosity to acknowledge what we have done for them (loud applause). And now, gentlemen, it only remains for me to thank you, not only for your hospitality and for the friendly reception you have given to the mention of Lady Dufferin's name and my own, but for the patience with which you have listened to this somewhat lengthy speech. It is a great regret to me to think that I am looking round for the last time upon so many friendly and familiar faces. In another week I shall have discharged my trust, and transferred my great office to the hands of one of England's most capable Statesmen, a nobleman in the prime of life, and already distinguished for his sound judgment, his moderation, his wisdom, and the industry with which he applies himself to public affairs. That he will by the intelligence, the impartiality, and the sympathetic character of his rule, gain and maintain the good-will and the confidence both of Her Majesty's Native and English subjects in India, I have not the slightest doubt, and this conviction to a great deal consoles me for my regret in quitting your service. Gentlemen, I again thank you from the very bottom of my heart for all your kindness and goodness (loud and continued cheers).

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder
 Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet
 (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and
 many Bengalees, is not accurate as a representation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad

 story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder;
 and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen
 could give individual instances of Bengalee
 faithfulness almost unique in history, taking
 all the circumstances of our relation to India
 into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both
 courageous in the expression of his opinions,
 and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared
 speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five
 members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body
 of men—small for that large province—who
 are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young,
 but grave and aged; some have, in the course
 of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted,
 so that on its return to them it has amazed
 none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however,
 cannot be denied.

In the forefront of this little band is the author of this book of travels, Baboo Sambhu
 Chunder Mookerjee—a writer of high repute,
 as I have said, also an administrator, as the
 reader will see from the title-page to this book.
 A keener, yet a kinder satirist, one might seek for and not find. His use of the English language has astonished many an educated
 Englishman; and the quality of his reading is shown by his marvellous power of quotation;
 not merely from authors like Shakespeare, and Milton, and Macaulay, and men eminent in science, but from out-of-the-way old ballads,
 and little-known old pamphlets, in the application of which he leaves one wondering—first,
 how he obtained the productions at all, and
 secondly, how, having obtained them, he learned to apply them so appositely to the
 subjects which he intends them to illustrate.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened
 the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens
 the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a
 Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice.
 A "fair maid of Sonangoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and,
 though the fair maid and he are divided by
 race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face,
 without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much
 might be said, and still leave much more to
 say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing
 in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles
 over their disputes, while he astonishes them
 by his command of the English language, and
 even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of
 his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in
 its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but
 of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to quark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell:

 [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one
 that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen,"
 ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor
 Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah
 dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that
 bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian;
 not English. Where an English artist's mind
 would be filled with European ideas, the mind
 of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class
 of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive
 and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

On the eve of one of his journeys, our author was placed in a dilemma of a kind
 not unknown to travellers in India, but not on that account the less stupid. He wished to go by a particular boat, add took time by the forelock for that purpose. The fare was at first stated as 90 rupees, to pay which he offered "a new crisp, fresh British India" note
 for 100 rupees. "It was," he adds, "fresh from the Currency Office, and had been received
 only the day before from another Government department." The rest of the story is
 thus told: [Extract.]

The humour of the little sketch is worth
 something. I can fancy the author laughing
 even in his dismay; for he can laugh well at others, and equally well at himself. I shall only venture on one more passage; and I give
 it as showing the spirit of the man who dares
 to call his newspaper Prince and Peasant.
 He desired to return to his home in Bengal,
 and to bid adieu, for a time at least, to Independent Tipperah, where he had been located
 "some two years." He received the Maha-rajah's permission to return home; but still he
 could not get away. [Extract.]

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of
 courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers
 and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "It? serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest,
 the man whose plans are the wisest as plans;
 but the man who, with plans or without them,
 gives confidence to the people, and confidence
 not merely in his justice, but also in his con-siderateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even ginneers and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has
 relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once
 more recall, as I easily and very vividly can,
 the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as
 known to me many years ago. I see him, as
 I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra
 Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Aurita Bazar Patrika;
 and I feel and say, with all earnestness and
 sincerity, that among these are men whom
 the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side.
 They are men on whom no really generous
 word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times
 with men of kindred occupations at home,
 and I think that they are as a rule by far
 the truer gentlemen in good manners, and
 often in very much more than mere manners.
 May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless
 their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINI DASSY
(Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Astukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohini's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

Important News for India,

WHERE FEVERS AND CHOLERA REIGN SUPREME.

A RECENT TRAVELLER ON THE

Chinese Coast found that District remarkably FREE FROM TYPHOID FEVER and CHOLERA. He soon discovered the cause. The people there do not drink cold water from tanks or wells, often extremely impure, but keep a pan of water constantly boiling, into which from time to time they drop a little Tea, and when thirsty THEY DRINK HOT TEA! If the weak and adulterated Teas of China can do this, what may not the pure and strong Teas of India be expected to effect?

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE TROOPER'S SONG.

UP, comrades, and saddle! To horse, and away
To the field, where freedom's the prize, sirs!
There hearts of true metal still carry the day,
And men are the kings and the kaisers.
No shelter is there, where a skilker may creep,
But each man's sword his own head must keep.

From the earth has freedom vanished quite,
And left but the master and master'd;
Chicaning and falsehood have fasten'd them tight
On the hearts of the fool and the dastard.
The soldier hears death in the teeth,—and he,
Alone of all mortals, alone is free.

Life's cares and its troubles, he doffs them by;
No fear has he, and no sorrow;
He shows a full front to his fate!—for why?
It comes, at the latest, to-morrow.
And if then to-morrow, to-day let us drain
The heart-stirring cup,—we may never again.

We toil not, we moil not, but snatch for ourselves
The joys that from heaven down tumble.
The serf, sorry drudge, he digs and he delves,
In hopes on a treasure to stumble.
He digs and he shovels, while life flies fast:
And digs, till he digs his own grave at last.

Unwelcome guests are the trooper tall
And his coal-black so fiercely ridden:
When the lamps are bright in the bridal hall,
He comes to the revel unbidden.
He woos not with speeches, he woos not with gold,
But bears off the prize like a reiver bold.

A kiss, wench, at parting! Why, never take on,
Your tears will be dried by some new love.
We are here to-day, and to-morrow are gone,—
Can a soldier know constant and true love?
We are tost to and fro, like the restless wind,
And are true, while we may, to the lass that's kind.

Then up, boys, and saddle. Huzzah for the fight,
Where the pulses beat high, till they madden;
Youth boils in each vein, in each nerve dances light,
Up, up, ere its spirit can sadden.
Strike home, and remember in battle strife,
The man that fears death has no chance for life.

WHY THUS LONGING?

WHY thus longing, thus forever sighing
For the far-off, unattained and dim,
While the beautiful, all around thee lying,
Offers up its low perpetual hymn?

Wouldst thou listen to its gentle teaching,
All thy restless yearning it would still;
Leaf and flower and laden bee are preaching
Thine own sphere, though humble, first to fill.

Poor indeed thou must be, if around thee
Thou no ray of hope or joy canst throw;
If no silken cord of love hath bound thee
To some little world, through weal and wo.

If no dear eyes thy fond love can brighten,
No fond voice can answer to thine own,
If no brother's sorrow thou canst lighten
By daily sympathy and gentle tone.

Not by deeds that win thee crowds' applauses,
Not by works that give thee world-renown,
Not by martyrdom, or vaunted crosses,
Canst thou win and wear the immortal crown.

Daily effort, though unloved and lonely,
Every day a rich reward will give:
Thou shalt find, by hearty striving only
And truly loving, thou canst truly live.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

WE are relieved to find the report about the death of Mr. D. S. White contradicted. The dangerous condition of the patient, brought on by inflammation of the bladder, had led anxious wights to prematurely mourn his loss.

DURING the nine months ending 30th September, the seven railway companies in England reported as personal accidents, only 696 deaths and 6086 injuries.

MR. H. B. H. TURNER, of Messrs. Turner Morrison & Co., has been elected President of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce.

A SEVERE shock of earthquake was felt at Calcutta on Sunday night at 10 hs. 50m. 50 $\frac{1}{2}$ s. It lasted about a minute without causing any damage to speak of. The wave travelled through a wide area. Reports of the disturbance have been received from Rajbari, Rungpur, Rampur-Buleah, Monghyr, Ansellgunge, Sitarampur, Muddehpura, Nattore, Goalundo, Raneegunge, Midnapore, Jalapahar, Burrisal, Saidpore, Burdwan, Chandernagore, Ranaghat, Howrah, Kishnaghur, Duttapookur, Cooch Behar. In none of these places was the shock more protracted or severer than it was here.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

PARLIAMENT was prorogued on the 24th, with a Speech from the Throne.

THE Muir Mills Company, Cawnpore, have sued the Victoria Mills Company, of the same place, for infringement of a trade mark, and, pending the final disposal of the suit, have obtained a temporary injunction against the use of the mark by the Victoria Mills.

A FORGED order on the Agent, Lucknow Branch, Bank of Bengal, for a draft on the Cawnpore branch for Rs. 5,000, was timely detected, but the presenter made himself scarce.

A YOUNG Burmese prince has been put in the Bareilly College under the special charge of the Head Master. The master and pupil are wholly ignorant of each other's language, and there is only a dumb show, for the education is being imparted by signs and motions. That reminds us of the poor Hollander who went over to England to make a living and retrieve his fortunes, by teaching Dutch to the natives, but found to his mortification that his ignorance of English was an absolute bar to his start in the profession.

THE Acts to prevent cruelty to animals have been extended to the Taki, Badooria, Bassirhat, Goverdanga, Baraset, Naihaty, North Barrackpore, South Barrackpore, Barranagore, Rajpore, Barripore, Joynagore, South Suburban, North Dum-Dum and South Dum-Dum Municipalities, under the order of the Lieutenant-Governor, dated the 22nd December, published in the Gazette of the 26th December, 1888.

MR. E. G. COLVIN, Political Assistant, 3rd Class, officiates in the same capacity in the first class, and has been posted as Assistant to the Resident in Mysore and Secretary to the Chief Commissioner of Coorg.

JAMES Young shot a man for ruining his daughter. Mr. Justice Cave stopped the case without calling upon the defence. And Young was acquitted. Movements are springing up in India, under the guise of friendship or philanthropy, for ruining the women of India. The women who have divorced themselves from the sacred associations of Hindu homes are naturally the greatest offenders, and they are helped in their work of destruction and ruination by the authorities in the belief that they are helping in a good cause.

MR. VIZETELLY has been convicted of publishing "an obscene libel" —translations of the French writer Emile Zola's books. Sir Edward Clarke, the Solicitor-General, prosecuted. Mr. Vizetelly at first pleaded not guilty, but afterwards said he was guilty of a fault, and desired to call witnesses as to character. The Recorder, in passing the sentence of the Central Criminal Court, said :—

"I do not believe that you deliberately did this in order to deprave the public mind. As to the works themselves, my opinion is that they are of the most repulsive description—they are not attractive, fascinating, or seductive—but they are repulsive and revolting to the last degree. You must pay a fine of £100, and enter into your own recognisances in £200 to be of good behaviour and keep the peace for twelve months."

THE Bombay Millowners Association, at a meeting held at the Chamber of Commerce and presided over by the Hon. Sir Dinshaw Maneckjee Petit, have passed the following Resolution :—

"That the secretary, assisted by the committee, prepare a memorial, setting forth the different conditions of factory labour in England and India, showing how unnecessary and inapplicable the English Factory Act would be for Indian mills; pointing out how such a legislative measure would be a source of hardship to adults by reducing their earnings, and the manner in which it would be the means of preventing thousands of young persons and children from earning their livelihood. Respectfully calling to mind the sacrifice that India was compelled to make in the interests of Lancashire in repealing the Import Duties; and lastly, pointing out that the factory legislation in the direction agitated for by Lancashire competitors is meant, and would tend, to cripple an industry, which it is to the best interests of the State to foster and encourage by every legitimate means; the progress of cotton and kindred manufactures in India being the only true safeguards against famine and want in a country otherwise dependent on agriculture for the people's support."

PRINCE Ferdinand has offered 2,000,000frs. towards a national Bulgarian University at Sophia. That is a princely gift, in every sense.

THE serious accident at Borki, has given another impetus to the plan for the nationalisation of all the railways in Russia.

HERE is an explanation :—

"The following explanation is given why the year 1900 will not be counted among leap-years. The year is 365 days five hours and forty-nine minutes long; eleven minutes are taken every year to make the year 365¼ days long, and every fourth year we have an extra day. This was Julius Cæsar's arrangement. Where do these eleven minutes come from? They come from the future and are paid by omitting leap-year every hundred years. But if leap-year is omitted regularly every hundredth year, in the course of 400 years it is found that the eleven minutes taken each year will not only have been paid back, but that a whole day will have been given up. So Pope Gregory XIII, who improved on Cæsar's calendar in 1582, decreed that every centurial year divisible by four should be a leap-year after all. So we borrow eleven minutes each year, more than paying our borrowings back by omitting three leap-years in three centurial years, and square matters by having a leap-year in the fourth centurial year. Pope Gregory's arrangement is so exact, and the borrowing and paying back balance so closely, that we borrow more than we pay back to the extent of only one day in 3,866 years."

THE leading hero of the Detective Police in India, is Rai Bahadur Bala Prasad Pandit, Assistant Superintendent of Police, Rajputana-Malwa Railway. Certainly, no Police Officer in Rajputana and Central India has a brighter record. He distinguished himself in the famous robbery of arms and ammunition. After Colonel Burlton and the European Inspector had failed to find any clue, Sir Lepel Griffin employed Bala Prasad Pandit, and he in no time spotted the Borah who had secreted the stolen goods in his house. In the very first search he came upon 35,000 cartridges, besides other ammunition and arms. Since then more Loot of the same kind was discovered on the same premises. Sometime after, when there was a panic in the cantonment, in consequence of constant house-breaking and burglary, Colonel Burlton had recourse to the services of the smart detective Pandit. These were lent to the cantonment and soon public confidence was restored by Bala Prasad's success in detection of theft and recovery of the lost goods and prosecution of their purloiners.

Latterly, he has been called up from the Central Provinces for employment on the Railway, in consequence of the prevalence of robberies which could not be traced to their authors. He has succeeded in stopping the nuisance, by promptly catching the perpetrators and helping them to retire within the four walls of the prison or leave the country for its good. He has now added another triumph to his roll.

It appears that, during the Mohurrum in September last, a strong box containing Rs. 1,200 in silver, a silver chain, two gold finger rings, besides seals, bunches of keys, a string of beads, ten mitaks of arsenic &c., was missed from the house of the Mhow Cantonment Committee overseer, Munshi Abdulla. All the efforts of the Mhow Police being unavailing, the famous Assistant Superintendent of the Rajputana-Malwa Railway was called to the scene. His detective resources and energy were crowned with their usual success. He traced the goods to the house of a former orderly of the Overseer named Abdul, and the man has confessed and got two years of rigorous incarceration. We are glad that his wife and sister-in-law have been released for want of evidence.

For their recent raids on British villages, the Lushais are to be punished. An Expeditionary Force has been ordered, consisting of 250 men of the 2nd (Queen's Own) Bengal Light Infantry; 250 men of the 9th Bengal Infantry (already in the Chittagong Hill Tracts); 400 men of the 2nd Battalion, 2nd (Prince of Wales' Own) Gurkha Regiment (Head Quarters wing) and 200 men of the 4th Madras Infantry (Pioneers) and two guns of No. 2 Bombay Mountain Battery, under command of Colonel V. W. Tregear, General List, Infantry. The force will be concentrated at Demagiri, the ammunition per man being 70 rounds in pouch, 30 on coolies and 100 in reserve. Two months' rations will be collected in the first instance. A telegraph line will be laid between Chittagong and Demagiri.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL John Withers McQueen, C. B., Bengal Staff Corps, last in command of the Hazara Field Force, has obtained a good service pension from the 6th June 1888, in place of Major-General Sir William Hamilton, Bart., succeeded to the Colonel's allowance.

THE Secretary of State has sanctioned the 156¼ miles of the Assam-Bihar State Railway from River Kosi to Dinajpur, including the Manihari Branch, at the cost of Rs. 1,15,53,822.

It is significant that the candidates who successfully passed the last M. A. Examinations of the Calcutta University all bear native names. There is only one of Europeanish name, J. T. White. But he is not of Europe nor of European parents. He may be described as J. Tsawoo White, son of Moung Tsaw Illa Phroo, Extra-Assistant Commissioner, Arracan.

THE Privy Council has disallowed the claim of Bhai Rabi Dat Singh, a distant relative of the late Maharaja, to the Bulrampore estates, and has dismissed his appeal to set aside the adoption of Udit Narain Singh. The claimant has been saddled with the costs of the appeal—an awful punishment for at worst a venial fault!

AN old unmarried advocate at Rome has left, by his will, 1,000,000 lire (£40,000) to the Pope, his valuable library to a monk, and only a monthly allowance of five lire to his sister. She, as a matter of course, has been advised to contest the will.

THE Lieutenant-Governor rejected the appeal for mercy for the wife-murderer Suddhabodhe Bhuttacharjee. He was executed this morning.

THE Senate has accepted the recommendation of the Lower House for abolition of capital sentence in Italy. Switzerland had abolished it but has taken to it again.

A fakir calling himself Padam Naryan was charged before the Magistrate of Cawnpore with obtaining food, habitation, service, &c., from the Newalkishore Press at that town, by falsely representing himself to be the gooroo of the Raja of Bhonti. The accused had asked Kunjbehari to deliver a letter to Munshi Newal Kishore. That letter purported to be from the said Raja of Bhonti recommending the fakir as his gooroo to the Munshi. He was treated well, of course, but the letter, on a reference to the Raja, was pronounced a forgery, and the fakir has been sent to jail for 2 years including 3 months' solitary confinement.

BEFORE the last Doorga Pooja, we drew pointed attention to the laxity of character prevailing in the Education department. The morals of the masters are no more immaculate on the Bombay side than they are on this. The students of a High School had made serious charges of immorality against their Brahman Head Master, and the latter has hauled his accusers up for defamation in the Court of the Magistrate of Poona. There is great sensation, in consequence. The case is being watched with anxious interest by Government and the Education Department, as well as the people.

MR. WESTLAND'S Conference for revision of the Provincial Contracts has ended and he goes home on leave—preparatory to retirement, it is believed.

THE New South Wales is still troubled with rabbits, and the reward of £25,000 for their extermination remains unclaimed. M. Pasteur has, of course, failed. His scientific atrocity is no good—in any sense.

SIR BARROW ELLIS'S bequest of Rs. 25,000 to the inhabitants of Rutenagiri, yielding an annual income of Rs. 1,000, will be applied to the encouragement of handicraft industries in that district.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE event of the week is the Congress now in session at Allahabad.

WE publish elsewhere the first portion of Mr. Nolan's report on Burma as a field for emigration from Bengal.

IN another part of this issue will be found a Government House Notice under the hand of Lord William Beresford, Military Secretary to the Viceroy. It is an invitation to ladies and gentlemen having the entree at Government House, that is, all, whether natives or Europeans, who have been presented at the Levee or the Drawing-room, are accepted as eligible guests at the viceregal mansion. As that will be the first general reception held by their Excellencies the Viceroy and Marchioness of Lansdowne after their initial Levee and Drawing-room, we hope there will be a full attendance.

THE High Court was closed for only 3 days for the Christmas Vacation—on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. The general "public holidays" extended to Thursday following. But the Bengal Secretariat Offices do not open till Wednesday next, the 2nd January 1889, having appropriated the holidays hitherto enjoyed during this season by the High Court.

The Congressists have taken this curtailment of the Lesser Long Vacation to heart. For those who meant to attend the gathering at Allahabad, the innovation may be inconvenient. But it is foolish to suppose that it is due to a desire on the part of the Chief Justice to spite the Congress. The idea is ridiculous. Complaints have been again and again raised against the paucity of working days in the Courts, and Sir Comer Petheram, when he came himself to look into the list, must have blushed at the too-muchness of—the good thing. Hence the application of the shears. For which he deserves the thanks of the public.

It is possible that there has been an official correspondence on the subject. The Secretary of State himself may have drawn the attention of the Government of India to the small amount of work performed by the Bengal Court. Be that as it may, we see the Chief Justice doing a proper thing, and we are bound to acknowledge it. It was certainly not without some difficulty that he has effected the change. Jack having been demoralised by sugar-plums and having nothing to do, naturally kicks at any the slightest encroachment on his wide leisure. And Jack in ermine is no better than Jack in small clothes. But the Chief was firm and the Little Long Vacation was sacrificed.

We understand that Mr. Justice Norris of the Original Side announced that he would not take up defended cases on Friday. As Monday and Thursday are devoted to the undefended, and no court is ever held on Saturday, and as Tuesday next is New Year's day, the practitioners on the Original Side of the Bengal High Court had practically a leave to go to the Congress or anywhere they pleased, without hurt to business.

IN the Supreme Legislative Council on the 21st instant, the Hon'ble Raja Doorga Charan Law made a philanthropic move. On the Hon'ble Mr. Scoble's motion that the Railway Bill be referred to a Select Committee, he suggested that a clause be inserted providing retiring-room accommodation for third-class passengers, saying that the absence of this necessary convenience was a crying grievance, especially in behalf of Native females. The Hon'ble Mr. Scoble promised that the subject would be considered in the Select Committee, and any other suggestions the Honorable Member might wish to make.

THERE were at least two Indian candidates—both Bengalis—for the office of Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police in England vacant by the resignation of Sir Charles Warren. Sir Stuart Hogg, formerly Chief Commissioner of our Calcutta Police, was one of them, and he doubtless calculated on the strength of the Hogg connection, specially in the Metropolitan Force. The English climate has restored his health, and he is pining for want of occupation. The pay, too, £1,500 a year in England, with other advantages, is an attraction to even an Indian Civilian. The other Bengali is, of course, Mr. Monro, who has got the appointment. He had retired four years back from the Bengal Civil Service, to be the head of the Detective branch of the London Police, in succession to Mr. Howard Vincent. It is said he could never pull well with his superior, the Chief Commissioner, and at last the other day resigned. He has, however, again been recalled with honor, to take the place of his former chief himself, Sir Charles Warren. That shows that Government appreciated his former services to the Criminal Investigation Department, which he had almost reorganised, or, at any rate, into which he had infused new life and understanding, and that he had been reluctantly permitted to go out in fairness only to the Chief Commissioner. We are glad for himself and our London fellow-subjects that he has returned to the Police, and in a position of advantage. As head he will be above thwarting, and his energies will not be consumed in endless correspondence and efforts to set himself right with his superior. He will be free to work out his views and plans. Sir Stuart Hogg would have done well from his Indian record. Mr. Monro ought to do better from his English experience superadded to his Indian. We offer him an Xmas present of a knighthood by New Year's Day 1890.

THE Foreign Mission Committee of the Church of Scotland have at last seen fit to purchase peace of the Revd. William Hastie of the Pigot-Hastie renown. Lord Fraser dismissed Mr. Hastie's action for damages for loss of appointment as Principal of the College and Superintendent of the Scotch Mission in Calcutta, but without costs. Against this judgment Mr. Hastie reclaimed to the First Division. Mr. Hastie has now been offered £1,250 to withdraw his action. We hope the redoubtable if irascible champion of purity in the bosom of the Church, will now have and give peace. A man of such splendid parts and accomplishments, with energy to match, purged of alloy in the fiery crucible of experience, can never want occupation. There are no limits to his capacity for usefulness. If he but give such translations as that of Kant he published some two years ago, he will not have lived and studied in vain.

WE have noticed above the magnificent offer of two million francs by Prince Ferdinand for a Bulgarian University at Sophia. One could scarcely expect such munificence to be easily or soon matched. But Royalty in Europe seems to have awakened to a sense of its responsibilities. Here is Ferdinand out-Ferdinand, by not an offer only, like those of some of our Rajas and would be Rajas, but by an accomplished fact, and that by a lady. The Swedish Princess Eugene has sold her family jewels to construct a hospital for cripples. The magnitude of this philanthropy will hardly be estimated rightly by humans of the masculine gender. But even males understand what it is to part with heirlooms and family regalia. Considering the natural passion of the fair sex for jewels, this royal lady of Sweden has shown a startling self-denial. The act is at once unparalleled and noble beyond conception. Since the wife of another Ferdinand paid for the means for the discovery of America, the world has not heard of such a liberality.

THE People's Friend, of Madras, publishes a letter from Calcutta in which the writer takes the trouble to inform the paper that a firm under the name of Chakravarti and Co., of Mirzapore Street, Calcutta, has no existence. There is at any rate no shop at the address given, but instead a lot of women who knew nothing of rings (the article advertised for sale for cash) being sold there. The house was in the occupation of a native compositor.

Notwithstanding this caution, we find in the same issue an advertisement of a Chakravarti & Co., hailing from Calcutta, but without any specific place of business, offering Brazilian diamond rings of pure gold and electric diamond rings of pure silver, with the interesting piece of information attached—"The use of electric rings destroys all sorts of diseases." Madras is an enigma—the home of anomalies. The stronghold of the ultraCongressists, it is at once the seat of Credulity and Theosophy and the Head Quarters of an Agnostic and Atheistic propaganda, as well as the centre of an active Christian movement. For all that, we can hardly believe that the intelligent conductors of the People's Friend pin their faith to the Electric Ring Panacea. They only believe, as we take it, in cash payment—to themselves. They have been paid for the advertisement in question and they consider themselves bound to publish it. This seems fair enough, at first sight. Is it so? Is it fair to their readers and the public at large? Are they not participes criminis in the transaction?

LAST week we exhibited to our readers the woeful state of mind of our contemporary of the Indian Mirror, on the subject of the Marquis of Salisbury's flippant characterisation of Dadabhai Nowrojee as a "black man." Poor man! he is "still harping on my daughter!" That Premier's dire offence has not yet been purged and our contemporary is as miserable as ever. Indeed, the offence is accumulating by mere flux of time. Having been an insult to not Parsees only, through all time from Rustam and Darius downwards, nor to Indians in general likewise, but to all Asia, it has come to be an outrage on the Queen and Parliament of Great Britain. Of course, it is a subversion of the Great Indian Charter of 1858.

We find in the Bengal Times the following quotation from the Indian Mirror :—

"Queen Victoria declared through the medium of the Royal Proclamation of 1858 that she regarded all her subjects alike in her august sight. But there is her chief adviser of the Crown, who has violated most wantonly both the language and the spirit of the Proclamation, and instituted distinction and a difference between her Indian and English subjects."

NOTWITHSTANDING the extraordinary sensation caused in the Punjab by Bhimji, the Congress Missionary, with his open air meetings of thousands of enthusiastic listeners, it seems he has not been able to conquer the defection of the Mahomedans and Sikhs in general, or to make them accept the movement. There are neither Mahomedan nor Sikh delegates returned from Lahore. A "Representative Sikh" wrote to the Civil and Military Gazette, that "No Sikh (he who is a disciple of Guru Nanak and Guru Gobind Singh) will ever join any seditious movement, certain to produce mischief for the existing Government and the people of India."

The parenthesis is intended, doubtless, to exclude from the Faith such "representative Sikhs" as the excellent Sirdar Dayal Singh.

NOTWITHSTANDING the fictions wired to Calcutta, Orator Surrender Not's mission to Dacca with the object of muzzling the Mahomedan opposition and securing Mahomedan support to the Congress, was a disastrous one. The Orator met more than his match in Mejla Saheb (we beg his pardon for forgetting the Mirza's name)—a scholar and a poet—whose Urdu eloquence was more to the point than the Baboo Saheb's froth and foam in English. The promoters had counted on a packed meeting of Congressists, and this unexpected opposition paralysed them. In the uproar that followed, the Mahomedans were not slow to join. The apology of a Mahomedan chairman whom the astute men of the Congress, with an eye to effect at a distance, had pitchforked into the seat of command, proved no better than a chairman indeed, in the sense of the bearer of the burden rather than the sitter on the piece of furniture. Those who called him to that difficult position had not sufficient sense of propriety, or lost their heads over the excitement, and the Chair possessed no influence, or tact. Soon all order was lost. There remained no possibility of a hearing for anybody. The Resolutions were not even formally moved, seconded, and put to the meeting. The promoters declared them passed and were glad to get away. At one time the two parties were very near coming to blows. The Hindus relied on their numbers, but the Mussulmans would have given a good account of them and burned for the fray. The timely arrival of the District Superintendent prevented a collision. Accordingly our friend Surrender Not lost a chance of glory as a Hero or a Martyr. His imprisonment by the High Court for libelling one of Her Majesty's Judges was the means of making him. He went about exhibiting his wound and raising public subscriptions for which he has not accounted. The District Superintendent of Dacca robbed him of another splendid opportunity of raising the wind.

Seriously speaking, we confess we do not dislike these collisions. Our people must go through many such and more serious encounters, before they are worth anything. The best and purest contribution of the Congress is the life it has evoked—the interest in public affairs it is causing in the land.

We find in the Bengal Times the following from the Indian Mirror as a specimen of the latter's habitual recklessness of assertion:—

"The Mussulman community of Bengal are (sic) now more convinced than ever of the importance and utility of the Congress, and we are sure there are among them few, if any, who will support the anti-Congressionists at Dacca, who have formed themselves into a little party, under the distinguished leadership of Mr. Kemp of the Bengal Times?"

Mr. Kemp naturally resents that gratuitous charge against him. He never goes out of his legitimate sphere and has nothing to do with parties. We suppose the cause of the Congress people's annoyance with him to be that he attended the meeting which was held in favour of the movement at which Orator Surrender Not stumped, and gave a true account of the proceedings which utterly discredited the "great cause" so far as Dacca was concerned. We have never spared Mr. Kemp any more than he has spared us. But we hope we shall never be dishonorable foes.

The report given in the Dacca paper was honourable to the Editor. He was tooth and nail opposed to the Congress and the Congressists, yet he gave an absolutely impartial account, setting down nought in malice. We wish our politicians and writers would cultivate this capacity for truth.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1888.

THE CONGRESS OF 1888 IN SESSION.

Still it moves! The Congress is not dead, nor on the way to it. It not only lives, but lives well, and enjoys life into the bargain. It is far yet from the sick man to be summarily bundled out of existence, by criticism or even the frowns of the officials. The pulse of abounding life seems to leap in its veins. There is plethora rather than anæmia. The Congress, therefore, is safe, for the moment. That is the remark that will probably suggest itself to the impartial observer of the proceedings even from a distance.

It was a year of trial for it. Springing like the Ganges in obscurity, it was, like the sacred stream, going on swimmingly at a famous rate, leaping from rock to rock, past inconvenient hills and ridges, rubbing off their corners, dodging round unmanageable cliffs, to find its level to the plains, and penetrating and progressing through the country, until it threatened to reach the ill-explored regions of the grim Cimmerians, in the heart of the Continent. Then it met its first check. It was nothing,—a mere pugilistic encounter with Bhagirat, which attracted universal notice from the fame and skill of the combatants, but did not affect the result. That, indeed, was independent of the issue, and almost of the merits, of the duel. On the contrary, so far as the fertilising river was concerned, the momentary resistance only redoubled the hydraulic energy and the imprisoned waters burst the barrier and went dancing triumphantly down the land, to find its Nirvan meet in the bosom of the eternal sea. Even the interposition of the golden words of the Chief keeper of this land, proved of no more avail than the remonstrance of his Lieutenant. The resistless fury of the mad flood, in its grand sweep through the length and breadth of the Empire, carried everything before it, including the official tubs to the whale and the unofficial Parthingtonian mop to wipe off the descending Ganges!

In other words, the Congress not only lives but also advances. Type of that Democracy which De Tocqueville the Wise feared, as he confessed, irresistible, it gains ground. There is no checking it—no interfering except with extreme caution. Once the thin end is introduced, it passes through the whole length. The country is of too prodigious extent and enormous population, to be tapped in a trice. There are vast regions, and endless tribes and clans and classes and millions upon millions of men who, notwithstanding a numerous Press and the organised efforts of the Congress Propaganda to reach as far in, and as far down, as possible, are innocent of the existence of the Congress or of Mr. Hume. But that is no argument against the potentiality of the thing. There is a great deal of ignorance and, in consequence, apathy in every country, howsoever enlightened. A generation back, the inquiries in connection with the Census in Great Britain brought out the curious fact that there were many rural parts to which the names of the nation's darling heroes, Nelson and Wellington, had not penetrated, and others in which the inhabitants believed that His Majesty George III. was still king. Likewise, our Indian bumpkins are no more aware of the existence of Lord Lansdowne and his satraps and of the constitution of the Empire than of the Congress and its leaders: nay, they scarcely know the Queen-Empress, unless as the mother of His Lordship the Company Bahadoor, their sovereign. (The poor fellows are there right, after a sort!) The Congress, if it is maintained, is sure to descend to the subterranean regions below the lowest stratum of what is conventionally called "native society," where repose, in undisturbed unconscious giant strength, the millions. Herein lies the significance of the movement—its strength as well as weakness. It were useless obstinacy to shut eyes against the glaring. For better for worse, the Congress is progressing.—Within certain lines perhaps, but progressing it is and no mistake. It is bound to do so. And it will go on prospering to the end of the chapter, provided there are capable leaders to work it up.

Such a self-aggrandising institution, nourished with years, advancing with cumulative clat and increasing in number in geometrical progression, naturally improves in intensity and interest as it goes along. Time, the dread of almost everything earthly, is its best friend. It benefits by the hour as it were. Each anniversary is grander—every session more impressive—than its predecessor. The Bombay start was a comparative hole and corner affair, without notice to the country and, of course, without the sympathy of not very many outside the circle of the promoters. The following year, a more regular appeal to the country was made, and accordingly the Calcutta demonstration was grander, though it was here that the unfortunate defection of the Mussalmans introduced the fatal taint in the constitution of the movement. The next session at Madras was even more glorious, for carrying to a remote corner on the Eastern seaboard the patriots from all parts of an empire of continental dimensions. The fourth Congress now sitting at the capital of Upper India has, under all its manifold disadvantages, managed to keep up the continuity of progression.

The Allahabad meeting is a test of vitality. It was understood to be so practically, and it may well be claimed by its promoters to be a success. It was the result of a virtual trial of strength. Not only were the local Committee met by extraordinary and unexpected difficulties in arranging for the reception of so many representatives from different parts, near and far, but the appeal to the country to join the movement and send representatives was, for the first time, confronted by a powerful opposition. The difficulty was greatest at home. The Mahomedans had early walked out of the business. Their Associations had repeated at the Madras Congress their resolve during the Calcutta session. Although efforts were made, not wholly without success, to lead some stragglers of the Mahomedan persuasion to join, and a very able Mahomedan gentleman was luckily found to take the chair at Madras, it was clear enough to the most casual observer that the leading Mahomedans were conspicuous by their almost total absence. That was bad enough. To darken still further the prospect for Allahabad, the famous Sir Syud Ahmed Khan of Alighur ranged himself in battle array against the Congress. He offered it not only the combined opposition of all the Islamite Associations of every shade of interest or opinion, but all Islam. Nay, more. He threatened it with a confederacy of his brethren of the Faith with the Hindu nobility and gentry and wealthy classes, throughout the country, and all the native Princes and Chiefs of all creeds in the Empire. With this object, a Propaganda was started at his Head Quarters, Alighur. The Nizam of Hyderabad formally seconded him early and sent the Syud a cheque for expenses. Letters and articles and messages were issued in his name, while his literary man, the accomplished Mr. Theodore Beck, of the College, fired his strong artillery into the enemy's camp. The old man eloquent himself, with one foot in the grave, with marvellous energy if with questionable dignity, descended to "stump" the country against the Congress. Raja Siva Prasad, the great Hindu educationist, too, was uneasy at the innovation. Men like Pandit Sreekishen of Lucknow felt aggrieved. The Talookdars of Oudh showed signs of alarm at the pretensions of the movement. The Baron of Bhingra flung himself into the struggle with powerful pamphlets and trenchant letters to the Times. His brother chiefs repudiated the Congress. The feeble old Maharaja of Benares, led by Raja Siva Prasad, declaimed against it. And last not least, the Sikhs would have nothing to do with it. As if all this was not sufficient to fill the Congressists's cup of misery, they, by very wilfulness, invited the ill will of the officials and even the head of the Local Government himself. Mr. Allan Hume is a sort of Hercules with his especial labours of no mean arduousness. His enemies, if such he have, could not help being struck by the extent, strength and elasticity of back of this modern Atlas. He bears the load of a continent with all its zoology, donkeys, dromedaries, zebras, bears, wolves, foxes and all! Notwithstanding all that, the Congress men, from the first, evinced a strange desire to array the officials against them, when their interest lay the other way. In especial, they burned for a fray with the chief of the officials. They did everything to fasten a quarrel with him. From the outset, they accused him of malice against them and their object. Even if there were any ground for suspicion, it was the part of wisdom to pretend ignorance, and subdue him with caresses. Instead, they invented calumny and repeated the most absurd charges. He was not only inimical to their aspirations, but was in league with their enemies. He had in fact set up Sir Syud Ahmed, and was actually forcing the leading men of his jurisdiction to war with the Congress. He condescended to contradict the statement, but it was never given up. It is not a little creditable to the magnanimity of the English race that, even under such ill usage, men like Sir Auckland Colvin and Lord Dufferin do not return evil for evil, nay, that they can hold the balance of justice even. Mr. Hume was influenced by the ugly rumours brought to him and he proceeded, in characteristic British fashion, to get to their bottom, and, in doing so, unwillingly inflicted harm on his cause. With magnificent audacity, not to say incredible rashness, he formally challenged the criticism of the Lieutenant-Governor, a challenge which could scarcely be declined, and was not likely to be declined, by so wellknown a knight of the quill. There was a fight of giants. The result is well known. The ruler suffered a loss of dignity, but the Congress was exposed to attack in its tenderest part—the part of honour. Of course, this indiscreet controversy having been thrust upon him, naturally reduced Sir Auckland Colvin to the rôle of reconnaissance,—an attitude of watchfulness and impartial observation. He is virtually forced, we take it, to abandon his capital during the Congress session. At a time when so many men of distinction are at his capital, the ruler is away, camping in the country. It is easy to say, he need not be. He knows the men he has to deal with, having already suffered from one set. This is the only way he could prevent all possible cause for misunderstanding. Of course, his present attitude too may be used for political capital between the factions.

Yet for a' that, and a' that, what a success! What a grand demonstration! What a fairy scene at Lower Castle! What a gathering of representatives of the various parts of the land! What a combination of all that is best in the land! What a focussing of lights! What a galaxy of stars! As might be expected, the Delegates at this Congress outnumber by far those at any previous occasion. The three hundred and odd who attended the opening Congress at Bombay, have swelled to the thousand and odd hundreds of Allahabad.

In the presence of the national Witenagemots we will not damp the enthusiasm of the moment and the pride of the country, by base prying and suspicion or chemical analysis. We will only say that Raja Siva Prasad played a plucky part and Mr. Allen a surprising one, and that Mr. Yule's address was worthy of the occasion. The quiet retired merchant has suddenly developed into a full-fledged publicist and statesman.

A LOVING POLICE.

IT is difficult to make love and be wise, said the wise Burke. It seems not possible even for the almighty Police of India to love too well and avoid being spoony. In fact, the tenderness of the divine passion is apt, under the rude manipulation of our civil defenders, to degenerate into the horrors of tragedy rather than the vanities of comedy. A painful romance of real life which may yet end in a tragedy, is reported in the Evening News. In the District of Chybassa, in the Lieutenant Government of Bengal, lives an Afghan merchant. A native of Cabool, he left his native country many years under the protection of our Government and settled in Chybassa, where he married a respectable Mahomedan lady by whom he has a daughter. The latter is now a little girl of fourteen years and odd months. Although a Purda—screened—lady, she had somehow been seen by the head of the Police of the District and charmed him. In the case of a less exalted specimen of humanity, the matter would have rested there. There could be no closer connection even of an irregular kind, far less proper union, between the Nazarene and the daughter of Islam. But in this unhappy land, more than in any other, the Police is a power. The Police Sahib set his heart upon the girl and the Police is a law unto itself. A Judge or Commissioner or even Magistrate could only nurse love in secret and wait for opportunities of meeting, lurk in back gardens like Herman Agla for a chance comfort, or at most pine away in despair like Yusoff. The District Superintendent of Chybassa resolved on the possession of his inamorata's person. He had all the resources at command for executing his resolution, and he was too mad with love to stint them on such a mission. He was not only a District Superintendent but a famous one for wild vigour, having earned his laurels in that line in another District. He is, in fine, the hero who shot the tame deer of the Hindoo lady of Rungpore, whose manager had refused him her hunting elephant for a shooting party. He told off a Head Constable with the appropriate name of Joseph (the same as Yusoff) with the assistance of some notorious bad characters under Police surveillance to go and capture his Zuleika and bring her to his residence. So this precious Policeman with his worthy escort went and executed the order. The distracted father repaired to the nearest Police Station to complain. He charged the District Superintendent with carrying away his daughter and concealing her in his house, and urged the Sub-inspector in charge of the Police Station to search there. The Sub would do no such thing. He next applied to the Deputy Commissioner who is the Magistrate of the District, Mr. Renny. The latter told him to make a formal complaint in court. That was no easy matter for the poor man in this Law- and Police-ridden country to do. None of the legal practitioners would for fear write out a complaint against the formidable District Superintendent. He could get one drawn up accusing only the head constable and the Ghasias under surveillance who accompanied him. Such as it was, it was presented, but no notice was taken of even this moderate document. The persevering father next repaired to Ranchi to the Commissioner of Chota Nagpore. That functionary directed the Deputy Commissioner to inquire into the complaint. Meanwhile Mr. Renny had left the District on transfer to another. Fortunately for the worried Pathan, Mr. Renny's successor was an officer well-known for his justice and firmness—Colonel W. L. Samuels. The new Deputy Commissioner took up the matter in the proper spirit, and has made his report to the Commissioner. The Superintendent J. C. Stack has been suspended.

We know nothing about the merits of the case. But such a serious statement demands prompt notice. The Police in India, particularly in the remote parts, wield an enormous power, and one of the anxious cares of Government should be to watch that that power may not be abused. We are not of those who think that the Police are all bad. We ourselves know many excellent officers whose conduct we have had the opportunity of judging. But the helplessness of an ignorant and spiritless people is a great temptation to misbehaviour. There is a vraisemblance in the previous account which disposes us in its favour. The refusal of the village attorney (mookteer) to have anything to do with the complaint against the District Superintendent, is characteristic. So is the indifference of the magistrate to a complaint against the Police. Things are not so bad as in the olden days, when the magistrate or criminal judicial officer was the chief constable or Police officer. Nevertheless, the Magistrate is still the head of the Police. Naturally, the magistracy has a great deal of sympathy for the Police, though, no doubt, some few magistrates have a contrary bias. Herein lies the raison d'être of that cry that has been heard in all directions for the separation of the judiciary from the executive. Unless the magistracy and the Government are careful, the cry will gain volume.

We hope Government will enquire into this case. It is one of a dangerous character. Nothing exasperates the people so much as an invasion of their home and its veiled inmates, except an attack on their religion. It is lucky that this Afghan has been already acclimated. He has proved himself a wonderfully good boy, allowing himself to be knocked from pillar to post, in search of the seemingly unknown quantity of British justice. But there is a limit to the patience of the most loyal respecter of law and system. We fear this man has nearly reached the limit. He may yet make short work of the "vakil Raj" and the Reign of a mysterious Law in Chybassa.

LORD DUFFERIN'S FAREWELL.

LORD DUFFERIN completed the century of brilliant addresses, by which he enlivened the spirits of Her Majesty's Indian lieges during his administration, with a crowning speech at the Byculla Club, before finally leaving our shores. That it was brilliant, goes without saying, indeed, considering who gave it. It was the finest thing he ever delivered, and that is saying a great deal for it. Even in lifeless print, it is charming to read. It must have been simply overpowering to listen to it direct from the master's lips!

How finely it commences :—

"I stand before you in the position of a soldier called upon to fire a salute, but who has already expended all his gunpowder. (Laughter and cheers.) I have not even so much as a cartridge left in my pouch. (Laughter.) Nay, I am no longer even a commissioned officer, and am liable to be strung up as a franc-tireur if I begin discharging rhetorical fireworks in your midst. (Laughter.) Even were it otherwise, your younger sister—for it is in that light I understand that Calcutta is very properly considered on this side of India—has cheated you of your birthright. (Laughter.) Following a very ancient example, she came and beguiled me with a savoury dish in the form of a haggis (laughter), and has stolen your blessing, that is to say, if you considered a political speech of an hour and a half a blessing after dinner, which it certainly is not to the person who has to deliver it. (Laughter.)"

What an arch turn it takes, to put the hosts in good humour by a sympathetic allusion to the depreciation of the Indian coinage, with a delicate allusion to the drain on the speaker's own purse during his vicerealty, notwithstanding the princely pay of the post :—

MISLEADING THE PUBLIC OF INDIA.

"For all that, I am glad of this opportunity of correcting a palpable mis-statement which crept inadvertently into my St. Andrew's deliverance, and which is now misleading the public of India. It was a gross error of figures; but however humiliating, as an honest man I am bound to correct it. I then stated that in the East two and two have a tendency to make five. I have now had time to square my private accounts, and I find that, as far as the rupee is concerned, so far from two and two making five, the very reverse is the case, and that they only make three. (Loud laughter.)"

That exquisite exordium is followed up with equal spirit. Here in a sentence is dashed off in vivid lines the

FIRST IMPRESSION OF INDIA.

"Probably, of all the variegated scenes that pass in succession before the eyes of an Indian Viceroy during the four or five years that he remains in this country—full of colour and picturesque splendour, as they all are,—the one which is the most ineffaceable, which makes the deepest impression upon both his physical and mental vision—is that which presents itself to his gaze when he first sights your historic shores. (Cheers.) Having traversed many thousand miles of barren ocean, he suddenly finds himself secure within the arms of one of the most magnificent harbours of the East."

By this the wizard has well got the heart of Bombay in his grip. He pursues his advantage as he proceeds to take his hearers into his confidence in regard to

THE CARES AND RESPONSIBILITIES OF A VICEROY.

"Standing on the threshold of his new life, about to assume a weight, of cares and responsibilities such as is imposed on the shoulders of no other public man in the world—he looks abroad with a feeling of awe upon the new realms he is called on to govern. A display of military pomp, greater even than that which surrounds the Monarchs of Europe accentuates the solemnity of his landing, and when he passes through the thoroughfares of your city, ennobled by buildings which any Western Capital might envy (cheers), he sees on every side, crowding every window and balcony, and thronging every street, lane, and alley, such innumerable multitudes of men and women gazing at him with earnest and expectant eyes, that he shrinks appalled at the thought that it is for the safety and welfare of these thousands, and for other thousands, nay, millions, similar to these—yes, almost for their daily food,—that he, with his limited experience and finite capacities, has become answerable to his Sovereign and to the people of England. (Applause.) The thoughts which pass through his mind, gentlemen, on that occasion are never forgotten, and would be sufficient almost to overwhelm him were it not that the kindly greetings, the loyal addresses, the encouraging promises of support and of indulgent recognition which at once begin to pour in upon him from your Rulers, your Citizens, and your Corporate and other associated Bodies, re-invigorate his spirits, and give him the assurance that, after all, his lines are cast in pleasant places, and that his future work will lie in the midst of a kindly and sympathetic community, while it is shared and lightened by a Public Civil Service that has neither its like nor its equal in the world. (Loud cheers.) But, perhaps only second to these profound impressions, are those which he experiences at the end of his term, when he finds himself again among you on the eve of bidding goodbye to those who so warmly welcomed him on his first arrival. (Applause.)"

"Between the two events, though comprising after all but a short period of time, if merely counted by years, there stretches what in its retrospect almost seems a lifetime—so full has it been of varied experiences of continuous anxiety and of unremitting effort. The vague and only half-smised troubles and difficulties which rose to his imagination then have since translated themselves into harassing realities. The labour, the worry, the need for constant vigilance, which he anticipated would be great, he has found infinitely more constant and imperative than anything known to his past experience, while, in addition to the cares inseparable from the ordinary work of administration, many an unexpected crisis, thunderbolts out of a clear sky occasioned by circumstances which could not have been foreseen or controlled, have been superadded to task his patience, his endurance, his courage, and his skill to the utmost. (Loud applause.)"

That is a noble picture which will never be forgotten, in Bombay at any rate. It will compare with any in the language. It reminds one of Lord Brougham's famous description of the anxieties and disappointments which are the penalty of the ambition of Ministers.

He ends as he begins and proceeds, in the same harmonious strain of worthy thought expressed in golden words.

REWARD OF ACCOMPLISHED LABOUR.

"Well then, gentlemen, happy is the man who, however conscious he may be that he has fallen short of his own ideal; that he has failed in some measure to accomplish all the good he might have desired; or completely to remedy the evils with which circumstances called upon him to contend—happy is the man, I say, who, coming back to you at the end of his term, receives at the hands of those who originally welcomed him, such hearty greetings as you and my other friends in this part of the world, both English and Native, have been pleased to accord to me. (Loud cheers). And still happier is he if his conscience does not forbid him to hope that your favourable verdict will perhaps receive the imprimatur of history, for it is the future alone that can disclose the effect of a Ruler's actions, or gauge the breadth and depth of the foundations he may have laid for further improvement. (Applause.)"

The whole is rich and every part of it delicious. There is not a superfluous word or grating or idle thought or an improper or inadequate expression.

Not the least valuable of Lord Dufferin's legacies is the record of his spoken eloquence. His last speech is his most finished utterance. Apart from its literary skill, the charm of it is principally derived from the soul that breathes in it. There is a vein of unfeigned tenderness throughout which is irresistible.

State Paper.

No. 169.

From P. Nolan, Esq., Secretary to the Government of Bengal, on Special Duty,

To the Secretary to the Government of India, Revenue and Agricultural Department.

Dated Calcutta, the 24th October 1888.

Sir,

I have the honour to submit the following report as to the measures which may be adopted with advantage for the purpose of facilitating emigration from the over-populated districts of Bengal to Burma, a subject on which I was deputed to confer with officers of the Burma Commission under the orders contained in your telegram dated the 21st July. These orders reached me at Darjeeling, where I was at the time on leave of absence, and, according to an arrangement made with the Administration of Burma, I proceeded to Rangoon by the steamer leaving Calcutta on the 7th August, having previously consulted the references available in your office and in that of the Bengal Government. A memorandum of discussions in Rangoon, at which Mr. Fryer, Financial Commissioner, Mr. Hodgkinson, Commissioner of Pegu, and Mr. Hall, Director of the Department of Land Records and Agriculture, assisted, is appended to this report. After the subject had been examined in this manner, I went to Mandalay at the desire of the Chief Commissioner, and there had the advantage of receiving an expression of his opinion on our proceedings. The recommendations which I have now the honour of laying before the Government of India are those unanimously adopted at the Rangoon meetings, and afterwards accepted by Sir Charles Crosthwaite. I am also authorised to say that the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal entirely approves of the scheme put forward.

2. In order to explain the proposals, it is necessary, in the first place, to make it clear that there is in this case no question of opening out a new field for emigration, as the movement of the labouring classes from Bengal to Burma has been established for a considerable time, it is conducted on a great and increasing scale, and works in a most satisfactory manner. What is wanted is that, without any great change in its character, it should be accelerated and guided so as to produce the greatest possible amount of good. This is a fact which should be fully realized, as the framers of previous schemes for emigration to Burma seem to have under-estimated the extent, and to have imperfectly appreciated the advantages of the spontaneous movement of the population, with the result that they acted as if they were introducing a new system, instead of aiding in the development of a beneficial force already at work.

3. In 1881 there were in Lower Burma, according to the census returns, 174,000 persons belonging to Upper India by recent descent, as indicated by the mother tongue, of whom 108,000 had actually been born in the land of their origin. Of the Hindustanis by race, 51,000 were females, of those by birth 25,000. The presence of so many females, and of so many persons born in Burma of Indian parents, indicates that a considerable part of this immigrant population had become domiciled. In 1882-83, the year following that in which the census was taken, the number of emigrants to Burma from India generally (separate figures for Bengal are not available) was about 72,000, and it is estimated that half of these remained permanently; in 1883-84 it was 83,000, of whom 43,000 settled in the country. The following statement, presented by Mr. Hall to the meeting at Rangoon, shows the immigrants arriving in Rangoon during 1885, 1886, and 1887, but does not include those who were landed at other ports, or who came by land:—

The table indicates an addition of twenty thousand to the Bengalee population of Burma in three years, but this gives a very inadequate idea of the facts, as the figures do not include the large emigration from Chittagong to Arracan. They are, however, sufficient to show that the number of persons from Upper India resident in Burma has considerably increased since the date of the census, and cannot now be estimated at less than a quarter of a million, of whom about 150,000 are probably settled in the Province.

4. I find the general opinion in Burma to be that the province requires, and can conveniently find employment for, a much larger number of emigrants; and this belief is abundantly justified by past experience, inasmuch as Lower Burma, since its annexation, has shown a wonderful capacity for supporting, in increasing comfort, a population multiplying at a rate without precedent in the old world. The following table, taken from the Census Report of 1881, gives the available information on this head:—

YEAR.	Popula- tion of Arakan.	Year.	Popula- tion of Pegu.	Year.	Population of Martaban.
1826 ...	100,000	1825	150,000

1852	191,476	1852	543,824	Until 1862 Toungoo was included in Pegu, and Martaban was a separate division.
1862	394,264	1862	2,020,634	Martaban is here included in Tenasserim; Toungoo is still included in Pegu in the figures for 1862.
1872	600,727	1872	2,747,148	In 1872 both Toungoo and Martaban were, as at present, included in Tenasserim.
1881	825,741	1881	3,736,771

It will be seen that not only was annexation in the case of the different districts of Lower Burma followed by a rapid increase in the number of the population, but also that this progress still continues, and that the growth was at the rate of 32 per cent. during the period of eight years and a half which elapsed between the census of 1872 and that of 1881. In the face of this rapid addition to the supply of labourers, wages have not fallen, but, on the contrary, have rather tended to increase. Comparing the returns of the half-year ending the 31st December 1873, the earliest period to which the compilation before me relates, which those for the corresponding portion of 1887, it appears that wages have risen in four of the eight districts therein specified, and fallen only in one.

5. It seems fair to anticipate that the introduction of a settled government will eventually produce in Upper Burma effects similar to those which have resulted from the same cause in the provinces ceded in 1826, and will thus give scope for further emigration from Bengal. The immediate result has been to check the flow of population from Upper to Lower Burma, which in 1886-87 was merely nominal, including only 374 persons. At the date of the last census Lower Burma contained as many as 316,000 immigrants from Upper Burma, so that, even if the effect of the change of government goes no further than to enable the latter province to provide for its own population, the supply of labour from that quarter will be closed, and this will create a further opening for emigration from Bengal.

6. The area of Lower Burma as shown by the Survey Department, is 55,820,902 acres, of which less than one-twelfth (4,561,672 acres) is cultivated, and the remaining 51,259,230 acres lie waste. There is a concurrence of opinion that much of this waste is fertile land, which has only to be cleared and tilled to yield good crops, but the authorities differ greatly in the views which they entertain as to the extent of the area which should be so classified. The annual report for 1886-87 gives 23,407,250 acres available for cultivation, while Mr. Hall, basing his opinion on recent returns made by district officers, and on settlement reports, would greatly curtail this estimate, and considers that in ten districts, with regard to which he possesses information, the lands available amount to 3,641,483 acres only, of which 2,308,483 acres require merely to be cleared, 1,333,000 acres require bunding and draining. Mr. Hall's estimate excludes large tracts of good soil merely because they are situated in the hills, and probably differs from that previously accepted in treating as reclaimable only land which can immediately be brought into cultivation at a profit. The discrepancy, wide as it is, has no present importance, inasmuch as all agree in considering that there are several millions of acres of waste land, which is a supply more than sufficient for the probable requirements of the next fifteen years. Mr. Hall's estimate, when completed for all the Province, will probably amount to six millions of acres capable of supporting in comfort four millions of persons, and the present rate of reclamation appears to be about 100,000 acres a year; so that, were it quadrupled, the period indicated must elapse before the best lands are all taken up. The most promising tract is that about to be opened by the railway from Rangoon to Mandalay, where Mr. Mylne has selected his ground, and particularly the waste lands in the Toungoo district. In this district Mr. Hall finds no less than 1,203,814 acres available for immediate reclamation.

Holloway's Pills.—In the complaints peculiar to females these Pills are unrivalled. Their use by the fair sex has become so constant for the removal of their ailments that rare is the household that is without them. Amongst all classes, from the domestic servant to the peeress, universal favour is recorded to these renovating Pills; their invigorating and purifying properties render them safe and invaluable in all cases; they may be taken by females of all ages for any disorganization or irregularity of the system, speedily removing the cause and restoring the sufferer to robust health. As a family medicine they are unapproachable for subduing the maladies of young and old.

7. The area available for reclamation in Upper Burma has not been estimated in figures, but in many districts it is considerable. It is said, for instance, that in Kyaukse large areas of land cultivated in recent times and advantageously situated on the banks of irrigation canals are now lying waste, and that the south-east of Alôn, in Lower Chindwin, is a wonderfully fertile tract which, if properly treated, could support five times its present population. There is also a great deal of reclaimable waste in the Shwebo, Yeu, Upper Chindwin, Myengyon, Toungdvengyi and Muktila districts, Yeu being specially commended on account of the suitability of its climate to natives of India.

8. The main attraction of Burma as a field for immigration is doubtless the comparatively high wages which can be obtained there. The following statement, compiled from the returns published by the Government of India, shows the average monthly wage of an able-bodied agricultural labourer in Chittagong, the district of Bengal from which emigrants depart in the greatest number, in the Behar districts, and in Burma, excluding Kyook Phyoo, to which no immigrants go—

These tables give a bird's-eye view of the difference between Behar and Burma in regard to the remuneration of labour, and the case in favour of emigration is strengthened if we descend to particulars, as is done in regard to Burma in Mr. Hall's note, appended to the proceedings of the 17th August, and as to Bengal in my letter to the Government of India, No. 81T--R, dated 30th June 1888. In Behar the demand for labour on any terms seldom extends beyond eight months of the year, while in Burma, though there is a busy season and a slack, yet, as temporary immigrants come over for the former, the permanent resident can always secure work. In Behar the cost of maintaining a labourer, resident can always secure work. In Behar the cost of maintaining a labourer, when fed by his employer, is estimated at only 9 pies a day, or less than a rupee and-a-half a month: in Burma at four to five rupees a month. This difference is not due in any appreciable degree to the prevalence in Burma of higher prices, but to the more generous scale of living in that province and the superior condition in which labourers expect to be maintained. Moreover, it appears that in Behar the actual wages paid in kind are of lower value than those entered in the returns. Thus, while the statement shows that the labourer receives in Patna from four rupees to five a month, the Collector of that district writes:--

"The condition of those who support themselves entirely by labour is rather worse than that of the better class of petty cultivators. They are almost always paid in kind, the usual allowance of a grown man being 2 to 2 half seers of the coarsest and cheapest grain, value about one and quarter annas. Women receive about half this rate, but their employment is less regular. Ordinarily, male labourers do not find employment for more than eight months of the year.

"A wage of one and quarter annas per day would be about Rs. 2-6 per mensem; but taking an average of Rs. 2 per mensem throughout the year, the annual earnings of an adult would be about Rs. 24; his wife's earnings might be Rs. 6--total Rs. 30, which is not enough to give two adults and two children a full supply of the coarsest food, with sufficient clothing and a hut to shelter them. The Sub-divisional Officer of Behar estimates the earnings for a labourer at 2 annas per diem, or Rs. 4 per mensem; but even this rate, which I think an over-estimate, would only yield Rs. 32 for the eight months during which labour is generally to be had.

"The conclusion to be drawn is that of the agricultural population, a large proportion, say 40 per cent., are insufficiently fed, to say nothing of clothing and housing. They have enough food to support life and to enable them to work, but have to undergo long fasts, having for a considerable part of the year to satisfy themselves with one full meal in the day."

9. To the Chittagong emigrants the difference between the wages current in their own district, which in this respect is the best in Bengal, and the Burma rates means an appreciable increase in comfort. To the Behari it is often a matter of life and death, the remuneration he receives, when in employment, not being sufficient to support life in a healthy state, if he has to provide for a family, much less to permit of his making provision for the period when he can get no work. At the rate allowed to prisoners in the Behar Jail, the maximum wage in kind mentioned by the Collector of Patna, --two seers and-a-half a day,--is just enough to find grain for the food for two adults, leaving no margin for salt, clothing, or other minor expenses. But it must frequently happen that the breadwinner has more than one adult dependent on him, at least temporarily; and then there are the seasons when employment is irregular, or cannot be had. The general opinion of the District Officers and of the Superintendents of Jails, who have special means of observation, is that the working classes in those parts are inadequately fed, and this view has been adopted with natural reluctance by the Government of Bengal. To the labourer working under such conditions, emigration to Burma comes as a rescue from one of the greatest of human evils--the hopeless struggle to rear a family on wages which will not purchase sufficient food even of the coarsest kind.

10. I have frequently been surprised to observe the large price which Behar artisans who have made money, as, for instance, carpenters returning to their own country from a successful visit to Derjeeling, are willing to pay for the tenant's interest in land situated in their native villages, though that interest is generally only the right to hold on an insecure tenure at a high rate of rent. In Burma any labourer can in a few years earn sufficient to establish himself as a cultivator, paying only the public revenue, assessed on all alike at a moderate rate, and absolutely free from all danger of disturbance. This is a consideration which has great weight with the inhabitants of Chittagong, who contribute a large proportion, perhaps a majority, of the Bengal emigrants, and though the advantage may seldom be present to the minds of the less prosperous settlers from Behar, it nevertheless extends equally to them, and must be appreciated in the end. In his own country the agricultural labourer cannot hope to rise a step in the social scale, the only prospect before him is to live a life of penury, bequeathing a similar fate as an inheritance to his posterity. In Burma, if he be industrious and frugal, he gradually acquires property, and his children are started with the fair prospect of a prosperous career.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder
 Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet
 (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as representation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad

 story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder;
 and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen
 could give individual instances of Bengalee
 faithfulness almost unique in history, taking
 all the circumstances of our relation to India
 into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both
 courageous in the expression of his opinions,
 and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared
 speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five
 members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body
 of men—small for that large province—who
 are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young,
 but grave and aged; some have, in the course
 of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

In the forefront of this little band is the author of this book of travels, Baboo Sambhu
 Chunder Mookerjee—a writer of high repute,
 as I have said, also an administrator, as the
 reader will see from the title-page to this book.
 A keener, yet a kinder satirist, one might seek for and not find. His use of the English language has astonished many an educated
 Englishman; and the quality of his reading is shown by his marvellous power of quotation;
 not merely from authors like Shakespeare, and Milton, and Macaulay, and men eminent in science, but from out-of-the-way old ballads,
 and little-known old pamphlets, in the application of which he leaves one wondering—first,
 how he obtained the productions at all, and
 secondly, how, having obtained them, he learned to apply them so appositely to the
 subjects which he intends them to illustrate.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened
 the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens
 the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the river's banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a
 Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice.
 A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and,
 though the fair maid and he are divided by
 race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face,
 without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much
 might be said, and still leave much more to
 say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing
 in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles
 over their disputes, while he astonishes them
 by his command of the English language, and
 even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of
 his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in
 its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but
 of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to quack, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled, to leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell:

 [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one
 that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen,"
 ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor
 Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah
 dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that
 bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian;
 not English. Where an English artist's mind
 would be filled with European ideas, the mind
 of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class
 of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive
 and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

On the eve of one of his journeys, our author was placed in a dilemma of a kind
 not unknown to travellers in India, but not on that account the less stupid. He wished to go by a particular boat, and took time by the forelock for that purpose. The fare was at first stated as 90 rupees, to pay which he offered "a new crisp, fresh British India" note
 for 100 rupees. "It was," he adds, "fresh from the Currency Office, and had been received
 only the day before from another Government department." The rest of the story is
 thus told: [Extract.]

The humour of the little sketch is worth
 something. I can fancy the author laughing
 even in his dismay; for he can laugh well at others, and equally well at himself. I shall only venture on one more passage; and I give
 it as showing the spirit of the man who dares
 to call his newspaper Prince and Peasant.
 He desired to return to his home in Bengal,
 and to bid adieu, for a time at last, to Independent Tipperah, where he had been located
 "some two years." He received the Maha-rajah's permission to return home; but still he
 could not get away. [Extract.]

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of
 courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers
 and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "It seive flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest,
 the man whose plans are the wisest as plans;
 but the man who, with plans or without them,
 gives confidence to the people, and confidence
 not merely in his justice, but also in his con-siderateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has
 relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once
 more recall, as I easily and very vividly can,
 the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as
 known to me many years ago. I see him, as
 I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra
 Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-
 abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika;
 and I feel and say, with all earnestness and
 sincerity, that among these are men whom
 the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side.
 They are men on whom no really generous
 word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times
 with men of kindred occupations at home,
 and I think that they are as a rule, by far
 the truer gentlemen in good manners, and
 often in very much more than mere manners.
 May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless
 their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINI DASSY (Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression. It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the author.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohini's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world-mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem.—The Calcutta Review.
